LAS, J. This is a petition to rehear as reported in 124 N. C. 749, 33 S. The difficulties of the case apparent- from the fact that the concurring which, under the otherwise even of opinion, had the peculiar effect lling the judgment of the court, did concur in its opinion. The case ted to us did not involve the ab- ht of the state to improve its float- navigable streams, and to charge s as would fairly represent their in- value as public highways to those received the benefit of such improve- t simply the right of the state to de- plaintiff of the use of his natural without some corresponding benefit ature of compensation. The domi- rinciple apparently controlling the t of the court is thus expressed in the g opinion on page 759, 124 N. C., e 171, 33 S. E.: "The term 'float- am' implies an easement in some se the stream for purposes of trans- . Whether this easement belongs to ral public or is appurtenant to the lands it is difficult to say. If it all, it must belong to the riparian s a natural easement. Whether it him solely or in common with oth- needless now to discuss. If it is ything to anybody, it is a valuable ance to his land, of which he cannot ved without adequate compensation. this compensation must be in mon- ay be in the increased conveniences him by reasonable improvements up- tream, need not now be considered, as no compensation whatever appears to have been given to him, and no substantial improvements have been made which would increase the facility of transportation. I speak of the riparian owners as a class, each of whom has the easement, where it exists, as far as the floatability extends. If he owns the easement, then the state cannot charge him with the simple use of it. I concede the right of the state to establish a highway on water or land. * * * I also admit that where the state has made, or caused to be made, valuable improvements of a local nature, it may charge a reasonable compensation for the use of the increased facilities and benefits afforded by such improvement. But this is in the nature of a toll, and not a tax, and presupposes some corresponding benefit to him who pays the toll. Where there is an utter failure of consideration, why should the toll be paid? But it is said to be in the nature of a special tax levied upon the property to be benefited. But on what property is it levied? Not on the logs; for they have not been benefited, nor even assisted, in their journey. Moreover, a tax must possess some element of uniformity, and, if levied locally for a special purpose, its disbursement must be confined to its creative objects." This we understand to be the general tenor of the opinion of the court, which says on page 751, 124 N. C., and page 169, 33 S. E.: "It is true that the legislature may by proper enactment provide for the improvement of such water way for the benefit of navigation. But the legislature cannot impose duties upon the commerce upon such waters for the purpose of 'building public bridges, and of cleaning out fords, public and private, across' such water courses." The plain meaning of this is that such duties, whose imposition upon commerce can be justified only by their reciprocal benefits, cannot lawfully be diverted to a purpose, public or private, utterly foreign to their original object, nor can we give our approval to any law which permits such unjust diversion. As the purpose of a special tax or toll is the only justification for its imposition, it cannot lawfully be imposed where such diversion is permitted. We presume that a city can impose general taxes for the improvement of its streets, even if the bulk of it is spent in some one locality. It seems equally true that it can levy special assessments in different localities for the purpose of making special improvements within those localities. This is permitted upon the principle that, where money is spent for the benefit of those who paid it, they are not injured, as the nature of the improvement is supposed to be worth its cost. But can a city levy special taxes in one particular section to be spent in an entirely different section? Or can it impose a special assessment upon one piece of property for the exclusive benefit of another? Surely not. And yet this has been done in the case at bar. A heavy assessment has been levied on these logs without any corresponding benefit to them or their owner. No improvement has been made in the floatability of the stream of which they have had any advantage. At best, the money which they paid would be devoted to the future improvement of the stream, even if none were used in building bridges or cleaning out private fords. Their owner may not have any more logs to float down, and, if he did, he would probably be called on to pay toll for the floatage. This right of floatage he already possessed, as we have held this to be a floatable stream. It did not come to him by grant from the state, nor was it created by the decision of this court. All that this court did or could do was to declare its existence as a natural easement,—the right inherent in the general public to use a natural highway. It was said that this right belonged to the riparian owner, but it was not said that he was its exclusive owner. If it exists, it certainly belongs to him in some capacity and to some extent. If it is a local highway, he is entitled to its use by virtue of his riparian ownership; and, if it is a public highway in its broadest sense, he is equally entitled thereto as one of the general public. This right cannot be taken from him without just compensation in some form or other, and this is the essence of our decision.

There seems to be an idea that an easement can exist in the general public without belonging to the individual. The general public, in such a sense, is a pure abstraction. As an artificial entity, it cannot use the highway, as it can neither ride nor walk, having neither feet nor hands. The easement is available only to the individual, and, if he has the right to use it, then he has the easement.

Again, it is suggested that the state owns the highway separate and apart from the individual, to whom it may forbid its use without any form of compensation. This is probably a survival of the old idea that the highways belonged to the king, in whom in fact was vested the ultimate fee to all land. While, for purposes of government, we must still regard the state as an artificial entity apart from the individual citizen, and while certain kinds of property must be reserved by the state to be used in a certain manner and for certain specific purposes free from all private interference, yet after all the state is but the trustee for its people, and, within the necessary limitations of the trust, the privileges of the citizen are inherent and of common right. Thus the right of the individual to use the highway does not come from the permission of the state, but rests upon the primary object for which the highway was established,—the use of the public. The power of the state to regulate the highway is an entirely different matter, but rests upon the same general principle,—the ultimate welfare of the people Suitable highways are absolutely necessary to all people, and the more free, intelligent, and progressive a people become, the greater will be their demand for highways suitable to their development and commensurate with their advancement. Such highways it is the duty of the state to establish, and with this duty go the corresponding powers necessary to its performance. Such powers, however, although ample and largely within the discretion of the legislative body, cannot ignore the vested right of the citizen. Such rights, on the other hand, are not permitted to lie "in cold obstruction across the pathway" of the state, but are subordinate to the paramount right of eminent domain. By condemnation, with compensation, any right of property can be taken for a public purpose.

We do not deny the right of the state to improve floatable streams, including the one in question, and to regulate their use, even if it interferes with the natural easement hitherto enjoyed by the public. When, however, one is deprived of his vested easement, which is the result, pro tanto, if he is made to pay for its use, he must be given some compensation in money or in kind. This compensation must be actual and present, and not merely speculative and prospective. Where the easement is in the nature of a toll, the benefit must be contemporaneous and reasonably coextensive with the payment. When we say that the state can do this, we mean it can do so directly, or by means of such agencies as it may deem best suited to accomplish its public purposes. We do not deny the power of the state to intrust such work to a private individual or corporation, nor the right of such private party to charge such reasonable tolls as would return a fair profit; but there may be some doubt whether public agencies would be entitled to any profit beyond the interest on the investment, and the cost of maintenance, operation, and repair. On this point we express no opinion, as it is not before us, in our view of the case. All that is now before us is the judgment of the court below continuing until the trial of the action the injunction restraining the sheriff and tax collector "from proceeding in any way under the assessment against the plaintiffs mentioned in the pleadings, and also from interfering with the floatage of logs by the plaintiffs down said Catawba and Johns rivers, by the assessment or imposition of toll, or the levying or collecting of any tax or toll on the property of the plaintiffs, or by the sale of any property of the plaintiffs under any assessment or otherwise."

The learned counsel for the defendant is mistaken in supposing that we overlooked the case of Commissioners of Burke Co. v. Catawba Lumber Co., 116 N. C. 731, 21 S. E. 941, to which we presume he refers. That case was cited in the dissenting opinion, and referred to in the concurring opinion, but is

K, J. (dissenting). We are saved ussion whether this is a floatable r not; for it was held in Commis- f Burke Co. v. Catawba Lumber Co., 731, 21 S. E. 941, that the Catawba that part of it which is embraced in te now before us, was a floatable This act (Acts 1897, c. 388) recites sion, and provides for the regulation se of the stream for floatage pur- n State v. Glen, 52 N. C. 321, it that floatable streams are "public by water," like navigable streams; difference being that in floatable the bed of the stream is capable of the riparian owners for such uses as conflict with the paramount public the use of the stream for floatage. rian owner, as such, can have no t common to all others, except over of the stream, to the center, within daries. He can have no possible riparian owner, above or below his there the riparian rights of the oth- come in. Consequently, as riparian has no right whatever above or be- line to the use of the stream for any more than a landowner over nd a toll road or canal or other high- . The riparian owner has rights of but not as a riparian owner, and ny other citizen has the right to the public highway, and on the same is granted to all others, whether ree or on payment of toll. By the of location, a riparian owner may have greater need to use the stream for floatage or for navigation (when it is navigable) and greater ease of access. But anyone else, who can get his logs to the stream either by the use of public roads crossing the stream or by permission of some riparian owner to cross his land, when he places his logs in stream, has the same right to use the stream. The stream being a public highway (State v. Glen), he owes no duties or tolls to any riparian owner, and no riparian owner has any superior rights to his, any more than landowners adjacent to any other public highway have superior rights to the use of the highway. All public highways are alike in this: that their regulation, and the terms on which they may be used, rest with the people at large, who express, and can express, their will only through their representatives in the legislature, unless when some question is presented direct to them at the ballot box by what is now termed a "referendum." Whether this or any highway shall be free, or whether tolls shall be paid, and, if so, what tolls, is a matter for the legislature, not for the courts, to decide. The riparian owner loses no property rights. He has none beyond his upper and lower lines and to the thread of the stream, and within those limits he has the bed of the stream for such use as he can make of it, but subject to the superior right of the sovereign to the use and regulation of the stream for all its citizens alike. The lawmaking power is confided by the constitution to the general assembly, and no act of theirs can be held invalid unless it plainly and palpably violates some provision of the state or federal constitution. No provision of either can be pointed out that restricts the power of the general assembly to regulate the use of public highways or to exact tolls for the use of them. There is no requirement of either instrument that work must be done by the sovereign on public highways by water before tolls can be exacted, and that thereafter tolls can be exacted only to the precise amount of public funds so expended. Whether or not this would be a desirable restriction upon the power of the lawmaking body intrusted with general legislation, the people have not seen fit to place it in the constitution, and no one else can place such restriction there. The supreme court of the United States has uniformly held that the power of a state legislature to regulate the use of floatable streams and prescribe tolls upon logs is unlimited by the United States constitution, save when such stream lies in two states, and even then the lower state can place tolls upon logs between any two points in it, and also as well upon logs coming from a state higher up, unless congress has legislated on the latter subject. In a very recent decision in the United States (Lindsay & Phelps Co. v. Mullen [filed Jan. 15, 1900] 20 Sup. Ct. 325, Adv. S. U. S. 325, 44 L. Ed. —), it is said, speaking of the Manistee river:

"The state can authorize any improvement which in its judgment will enhance its value as a means of transportation from one part of the state to another. The internal commerce of a state—that is, the commerce wholly confined within its limits—is as much under its control as foreign or interstate commerce is under the control of the general government; and, to encourage the growth of this commerce and render it safe, the states may provide for the removal of obstructions from their rivers and harbors, and deepen their channels, and in other ways. * * * And, to meet the cost of such improvements, the state may levy a general tax or lay a toll upon all who use the rivers and harbors as improved. Regulations of tolls and charges in such cases are mere matters of administration, under the entire control of the state." What the improvements shall be, and what the rate of toll; whether the tolls shall be greater or less than the cost of the improvement; and whether the agency shall be directly by the state through special commissioners, or, as here, by the agency of the boards of commissioners of the riparian counties; or whether the agency shall be by means of chartered "navigation companies" or contractors (for all these methods have been tried); and whether the state shall raise a fund by tolls to be applied, when raised, to making the improvements, or shall first advance the necessary funds out of money raised by general taxation; and, further, if the tolls prove insufficient, whether the deficiency shall be made good out of the public treasury; or whether, if the tolls shall be more than sufficient, the surplus receipts (like the receipts of the federal government from port dues and the like) shall go into the general treasury; or whether such surplus shall go, as directed by this act, to building bridges over the stream to take the place of the fords deepened for floatage,—all these matters rest with the representatives of a self-governing people, who, from time to time, will change the tolls and regulations as experience may dictate. There is no hint in the constitution (state or federal) that the general assembly is restricted from legislating as to the regulations and tolls upon public highways by water. Still less is there any indication that the wisdom of the courts is so far superior to the will of the people, expressed through the lawmaking body, that the judiciary shall virtute officii supervise and correct legislation, whether wise or unwise (in its estimation), when such legislation is enacted within the limits not forbidden to the general assembly by the constitution.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). He doubts the power of the general assembly to enact that part of chapter 388 of the Acts of 1897 which has given rise to this litigation, but its unconstitutionality does not clearly appear to his mind, and therefore he does not concur in the opinion of the court.

STATE v. MEDLIN.

HOMICIDE—SELF-DEFENSE—WITHDRAWING FROM CONFLICT—INSTRUCTION.

Defendant requested the following instruction: "If the jury find from the evidence that the prisoner willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation shot at the deceased, with intent to take his life, * * * and, after having made the first assault, turned and fled, * * * with the intent of wholly withdrawing from the conflict in good faith, and with no design to continue it, and the deceased knew that all danger from the prisoner had passed, and the deceased then went to the window and shot at the prisoner, still holding his pistol drawn on the prisoner, and the prisoner turned and shot the deceased, killing him, such killing would be in self-defense and excusable: * * * provided, at the time of firing the fatal shot he reasonably apprehended his own life was in imminent peril, and that further retreat would be fatal to him." Held, that such instruction was properly refused, because it assumes that deceased was killed by the last shot fired, excluding the possible effect of the previous shots, and also that the "deceased knew that all danger from the prisoner had passed," whereas there is no evidence to support either of these assumptions.

Appeal from superior court, Gaston county; McNeill, Judge.

Drayton Medlin was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Osborne, Maxwell & Keerans, for appellant. Jones & Tillett, Brown Shepherd, and the Attorney General, for the State.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an appeal on a conviction of murder in the first degree. There is but one exception, which is to the refusal of the court to give the following instruction: "If the jury find from the evidence that the prisoner willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation shot at the deceased, with the intent to take his life, and the deceased shot at the prisoner, in the tower, in self-defense, and the prisoner, after having made the first assault as above set forth, turned and fled from the deceased, down the steps out of the tower, closing the door after him to prevent the deceased from shooting him, and further retreating from the tower some 15 or 20 steps, with the intent of wholly withdrawing from the conflict, in good faith, and with no design to continue it, and the deceased knew that all danger from the prisoner had passed, and the deceased went to the window and shot at the prisoner, still holding his pistol drawn on the prisoner, and the prisoner turned and shot the deceased, killing him, such killing would be in self-defense, and excusable, under the law, and the verdict should be, 'Not guilty:' provided, at the time of firing the fatal shot he reasonably apprehended his own life was in imminent peril, and that further retreat would be fatal to him." We have given this case most careful consideration, as we try to do in all cases, and as we always do in those involving the life of a fellow being. Whatever doubts we have are resolved in favor of the prisoner whose life is in our hands, unless, upon mature reflection, it clearly appears that those doubts are purely the result of human sympathy, unsupported either by reason or precedent. In such cases we cannot permit personal feelings to interfere with the proper execution of the law, whose ultimate object in punishing the guilty is the protection of the innocent. In cases of murder, in our sympathy for the accused we cannot entirely forget the victim, or the living who may become the victims of unpunished crime. We do not think that the prisoner was entitled to the instruction asked, under all the circumstances of his case. It is drawn with great skill and care, and appears to be correct as an abstract proposition of law; but it assumes, in favor of the prisoner, facts and evidence that do not appear to us. In the first place, it assumes, or might well have been understood by the jury as assuming, that the deceased was killed by the last shot fired by the prisoner. This entirely excludes the possible effect of the previous shots, which the jury might have believed, from the evidence, caused the death of the deceased. Therefore, even if the remainder of the prayer had been proper, as to the last shot being fired in self-defense, it was not proper to say that therefore "the verdict should be, 'Not guilty,' " without some further qualification. It seems to us that even if the last shot had been admittedly fired in self-defense, and had inflicted a mortal wound, the prisoner would still have been guilty, if any of his previous shots had mortally wounded the deceased. Those shots were, by the very terms of the prayer, admittedly fired without excuse or palliation; and, if either of them had produced a mortal wound, the prisoner would have been guilty of a crime that would have ripened into murder upon the death of the deceased, if they had proximately contributed to his death. This rule would be different if it were shown that the last shot was the exclusive cause of death, or by itself the proximate and immediate cause. State v. Scates, 50 N. C. 420; State v. Hambright, 111 N. C. 707, 16 S. E. 411. But of this we find no evidence, and certainly none that would justify the court in assuming it as a fact. It is well settled in this state that the killing with a deadly weapon implies malice, and that, where it is admitted or proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the prisoner is presumed to be guilty of murder, at least in the second degree, and the burden then rests upon him of proving such facts as he relies on in mitigation or excuse. State v. Byrd, 121 N. C. 684, 28 S. E. 353; State v. Booker, 123 N. C. 713, 31 S. E. 376.

Aside from this, we do not think that the evidence justified the prayer. We see no evidence tending to show that "the deceased knew that all danger from the prisoner had passed," nor can we find either in the citations furnished to us by the learned counsel for the prisoner, or in our own investigations, a single precedent holding that the prisoner, under circumstances similar to those of the case at bar, had so far "withdrawn from the conflict" as to relegate him to his right of self-defense. The counsel cited us to State v. Hill, 20 N. C. 491; State v. Ingold, 49 N. C. 216; State v. Brittain, 89 N. C. 481, 500; State v. Hensley, 94 N. C. 1021, 1036; State v. Wilcox, 118 N. C. 1131, 23 S. E. 928; 1 Hale, P. C. 479, 480; Whart. Hom. 213; Kerr, Hom. 201, 202; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 870, 871; Horr. & T. Cas. 213, and notes; Stoffer v. State, 15 Ohio St. 47. None of these authorities appear to sustain his position. Some of them relate to chance-medley, where the party attacked had never lost his right of self-defense, but in all cases where the prisoner pleaded se defendendo he was required to show that he had "retreated to the wall." Hale says (omitting the citations): "But now suppose that A. by malice makes a sudden assault upon B., who strikes again, and, pursuing hard upon A., A. retreats to the wall, and in saving his own life kills B.; some have held this to be murder, and not se defendendo, because A. gave the first assault. * * * It seems to me that if A. did retreat to the wall upon a real intent to save his life, and then merely in his own defense killed B., that it is se defendendo. * * * But if, on the other side, A., knowing his advantage of strength or skill or weapon, retreated to the wall merely as a design to protect himself under the shelter of the law, as in his own defense, but really intending the killing of B., then it is murder or manslaughter as the circumstances of the case require. * * * Regularly it is necessary that the person that kills another in his own defense fly as far as he may to avoid the violence of the assault before he turn upon his assailant." East and Hawkins both think it would be murder, but Sir Michael Foster appears to agree with Sir Matthew Hale. Wharton says, on page 213: "In cases of personal conflict, in order to prove this defense, it must appear that the party killing had retreated, either as far as he could, by reason of some wall, ditch, or other impediment, or as far as the fierceness of the assault would permit him." Bishop says, in section 869: "But he [referring to Lord Hale] goes on to explain, and so do the other old writers, that the assailant's life can be taken only when no other means of escape are open. Such, likewise, is our own modern law." Kerr says, in section 179: "In those cases where the assailant by his own conduct had, before the homicide was committed, given notice of his desire to withdraw from the combat, and had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle, and the homicide was necessary to save himself from great bodily harm, it might be excusable." And again, at the head of section 180: "The killing must appear to be the last resort for safety." The same author, in section 181, says: "The weight of authority now is that when a person, being without fault in a place where he has a right to be, is violently assaulted, he may, without retreating, repel force by force; and if, in the reasonable exercise of his right of self-defense, his assailant is killed, he is justifiable." Clearly, this section does not apply where the assailant is the slayer, as in the case at bar. Clarke, Cr. Law, p. 155, says: "Self-defense is no excuse for a homicide, if the accused brought on the difficulty, and was himself the aggressor. If, however, after bringing on the difficulty a person in good faith withdraws, and shows his adversary that he does not desire to continue the conflict, and his adversary pursues him, he has the same right to defend himself as if he had not originally provoked the difficulty, but the withdrawal must be in good faith. If he withdraws, and gives his adversary reasonable ground for believing that he has withdrawn, it is sufficient. * * * It follows from what has already been said that where the original aggressor ceases the attack, and shows that he has abandoned it, and the person assailed renews the difficulty, he becomes in turn the aggressor, and cannot plead self-defense if he kills the original aggressor to save his life." The matter is very clearly treated in McClain, Cr. Law, §§ 308–310. In the last section the author says: "As appears from the preceding section, one who voluntarily enters into a combat, or is the original aggressor, cannot excuse a subsequent homicide committed in consequence thereof, on the ground of self-defense, it being his duty to withdraw; but there must be allowed room for repentance, and abandonment of the evil and unlawful purpose, and if the defendant, though originally in the wrong, does thus abandon his purpose, he may afterwards exercise the right of self-defense. The withdrawal, however, must be in good faith * * *; and the fact of change of purpose must be known to the other party [citing State v. Edwards, 112 N. C. 901, 16 S. E. 821]. Perhaps this duty to withdraw does not exist where the danger has become such that a reasonably prudent man would consider that withdrawal would imperil his life. But a distinction must be introduced between the duty to withdraw, here referred to, and the duty to retreat, discussed in the next section; for in the cases now under consideration the party who seeks to avail himself of the right of self-defense has been originally in the wrong, and it is doubtful whether he ought to be excused for killing in self-defense before a definite withdrawal, no matter how dangerous such withdrawal might be."

Perhaps the best expression of the rule we have found applicable to the case at bar is in Stoffer v. State, 15 Ohio St. 47, justly considered a leading case, in which the subject is learnedly and reflectively considered. The court says on page 53: "While he [the assailant] remains in the conflict, to whatever extremity he may be reduced, he cannot be excused for taking the life of his antagonist to save his own. In such case it may be rightfully and truthfully said that he brought the necessity upon himself by his own criminal conduct. But when he has succeeded in wholly withdrawing himself from the contest, and that so palpably as at the same time to manifest his own good faith, and to remove any just apprehension from his adversary, he is again remitted to his right of self-defense, and may make it effectual by opposing force to force, and, when all other means have failed, may legally act upon the instinct of self-preservation, and save his own life by sacrificing the life of one who persists in endangering it." Can the case at bar in any aspect be brought within this rule? Let us take the prisoner's own testimony, which is contradicted by other witnesses, but which we will assume to be true for the purposes of the argument. He testifies that he had a dispute with the deceased about the time and pay of his daughter. Next morning he put his pistol in his pocket, and again went to see the deceased. They had another dispute, in which both he and the deceased cursed each other and bandied opprobrious epithets. He then went home, and soon after returned to the office of the deceased. The following are his own words, as they appear in the record: "I went on to the mill, with my little girl behind me. When I got to the tower door Mr. Sherrill was standing in the door, with his back against the south door, facing,—with his face towards me. He says to me, 'Mr. Medlin, if I was you, I wouldn't have any fuss with Brown.' I said, 'Oh, hell! I didn't come here to have any fuss.' I walked into the door, and turned to the right, and stepped on a platform about one step high, and then I stepped two or three steps up the steps. When I got up two or three steps I could see Mr. Brown getting up out of a chair. I could not see the chair. He was raising up when I first saw him, looking right at me. I stepped one step after I saw him, and Brown was getting up, with both hands in his pockets, and when he got up I saw that he was drawing his pistol out of his right pants pocket. I saw the white-metal piece on the butt of the pistol, between his fingers. When I saw that, I stepped one step down and reached for my pistol, and says to Brown, 'Don't.' Then I jerked my pistol out as quick as I could get it out. When I jerked it out of my pocket, I nearly let it fall out of my hand, and I grabbed it with both hands. I throwed it up with both hands in front of my body. By that time Brown was coming over with his pistol, and throwing it right down in my face. I shot then. I saw that he was going to shoot, and I shot, and then Brown shot. I kept going backwards down the steps. I saw that Brown was making an effort to shoot again, and I shot again as quick as I could. When I shot the second time I was near the bottom of the steps,—I think, on the platform. I wheeled. As I turned round to run out the door, somebody shot at me. I don't know who it was. I ran out the door, and jerked the door shut behind me. When I got on the outside I thought of my daughter, and turned round to find her. She jerked the door open behind me, and jumped out of the door, and hallooed: 'Lord have mercy! what is the matter, pa?' While I was standing there I heard somebody coming down the steps, running. I looked inside the door, and Mr. Brown by that time had got to the last step, stepping onto the platform, and turned to come out in the door. Just as he came in front of the door I told him to stop, and he didn't stop, but was raising his pistol to shoot again, and I shot at him. When I shot he jumped back and slammed the door to. My little girl was down about the corner of the tower then. I said to her, 'Get out of the way,' and started for home. She followed me. I was going in a sort of a run. When I got 20 or 25 steps from the tower, I heard somebody say: 'Yonder he goes. Shoot him.' I turned my head, and just as I turned my head somebody shot at me again. As I turned round, I saw George Ballard leaning out of the window upstairs. While I was looking I dropped my eyes, and saw Mr. Brown standing in the window downstairs, with his pistol in both hands. The smoke was boiling out of the window, as if he had just shot. I threw my pistol back and shot at Brown, and ran on. I looked back again, but did not see Brown any more. As I shot the last shot, I saw him throw his hand on his left breast and stagger back. That's the last I saw of Brown." It thus appears from the prisoner's own testimony that he took no chances, but anticipated every action of the deceased. He went around to the office of the deceased, Brown, with whom he had recently quarreled. He drew his pistol because Brown looked as if he intended to draw his pistol. He fired because Brown looked as if he was going to fire. As he was going down the steps backwards, he shot again because Brown looked as if he was making an effort to shoot. After getting out of the factory, he turned around and shot again because Brown would not stop when he told him to stop. After getting 20 or 25 steps from the factory, but how far from the place where he fired the last shot is not stated, he turned again because he heard some one say: "Yonder he goes. Shoot him." After he turned his head around, somebody shot at him, and then he again shot at Brown. We rarely find a more perfect specimen of Parthian tactics. Two things here are worthy of note: He turned around before the shot was fired, and he does not say that it was fired by Brown. He says Brown was "standing in the window with his pistol in both hands," and that "the smoke was boiling out of the window as if he had just shot." It is common knowledge that, if Brown had shot in such a position, the smoke from his pistol would have been carried out of the window with the discharge. The prisoner certainly had not "succeeded in wholly withdrawing himself from the contest," if, indeed, he had made any effort to do so, as he was constantly turning and shooting as he retreated. We are at a loss for any evidence whatever that he had done anything to "remove any just apprehension from his adversary." The last word he addressed to him but a few seconds before was a peremptory order to stop, followed by a pistol shot. He is not certain that Brown himself fired but one shot at him, while he admits he fired four shots at Brown. None of the shots hit him, or came any where near him, as far as we can see. If he was in any danger when the last shot was fired at him, he would have been in less danger if he had kept on running, instead of stopping and turning around to await and return the shot. He had not retreated to the wall, or a ditch, or anything that could stop him; and, if he had continued running, he would soon have been out of any effective range of the ordinary pistol. In any event, a man in the open would be safer running than stopping and exchanging shots with a man in a building, who by stepping aside could have fired out of the window with perfect aim, and but little exposure of his own person. We must remember that the prayer itself is based upon the assumption that the prisoner had been the aggressor, and therefore the duty rested upon him, not simply of retreating, but of wholly withdrawing, from the contest, as far as possible, before he could resume his right of self-defense, of which he had voluntarily devested himself by his original assault.

Of all the cases cited by the defendant, that of State v. Ingold goes furthest in his direction, but even that falls far short of sustaining his contention. In that case this court says: "There is manifest error in the first proposition of law laid down by his honor: 'If the prisoner willingly entered into the fight, and during its progress, however sorely he might be pressed, stabbed the deceased as described by the witnesses, his offense, at least, would be manslaughter. By 'sorely pressed' we understand being put to the wall, or placed in a situation where he must be killed or suffer great bodily harm, or take the life of his adversary. Supposing there was evidence to raise this point, the offense, according to all the authorities, was excusable homicide, which Foster calls 'self-defense, culpable, but, through the benignity of the law, excusable'; citing Fost. Crown Law, 273, 274; 1 East, P. C. 279; 4 Bl. Comm. 184; 1 Hale, P. C. 482. Indeed, as the deceased made the first assault with a deadly weapon, i. e. 'a stone about the size of a goose egg,' thrown with violence at a short distance, and following it up by pushing the prisoner against the jam of the fence, gave him two blows, and then caught him with his hand about the mouth, having him against the fence, bent over on the side, before the prisoner struck him at all, if the necessity for killing existed, which his honor assumed, it would seem to have been rather a case of justifiable homicide." This short statement shows the utter dissimilarity of that case from the one at bar. In that case occurs the following sentence, illustrating, among others, not only the profound legal knowledge of the great chief justice, but also his intimate acquaintance with the mainsprings of human action. He says on page 222: "It is true, while they were holding him in the piazza, he flourished his knife, and swore 'one of us has to die before sunset'; but every one who has witnessed scenes of this kind knows that such 'rearing and charging and popping of fists' are far from evincing a deliberate purpose, particularly when the opponent is a much stouter and more able-bodied man. The barking of a dog shows that he thinks it safer to bark than to bite." This illustration was very apt where used, but scarcely applies to the case at bar. The popping of a pistol, especially when aimed with a deadly intent, means far more than the popping of fists; and the barking of a Colt's revolver has a compass beyond the gamut of a barking dog. We regret to say that we see no evidence, beyond a scintilla, that the prisoner had in good faith wholly withdrawn from the contest before he fired his last shot, and certainly none that "the deceased knew that all danger from the prisoner had passed." The record says that there was "evidence tending to show: That the prisoner armed himself with a pistol, and returned to the tower for the purpose of shooting the deceased, drew his pistol as he went up the steps leading to the second story of the tower, where he had left Brown, took aim at him with his pistol, fired once at him while deceased was sitting in his chair. That Brown returned the fire. Prisoner fired again, and inflicted a mortal wound upon him. After firing the second shot, the prisoner turned and fled down the steps. Brown pursued him to the ground floor of the tower. Prisoner got out of the tower, and Brown, the deceased, went to the window on the lower floor, fell, and died from the wound inflicted as above stated." The record further says that: "The prisoner introduced evidence tending to show that the shooting occurring in the upper story of the tower was done in self-defense. Upon this evidence his honor charged the jury as requested by the prisoner." As the prisoner appears to have had a fair trial,—so much so that he has complained of nothing except the single exception already considered, to which he was not entitled,—we are constrained to affirm the judgment of the court below. Affirmed.

HINKLE et al. v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

CARRIERS—DAMAGE TO CATTLE—NOTICE OF DAMAGES—NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Where a shipper, suing a carrier for damages resulting from failure to seasonably transport and safely deliver cattle, shows that they were delivered in a damaged condition, and after an unreasonable delay, the burden is on the carrier, if the shipment was under a special contract, to bring the injury within its exception, and to show that it was not caused by its own negligence.

2. Where a contract for shipment of cattle stipulates that, as a condition precedent to shipper's right to recover damages for their injury, he will give written notice of his claim to the carrier before removal from destination, the shipper's failure to give a formal written notice of his intention to demand compensation will not preclude recovery, where he signed a receipt for the cattle at destination under protest, because of their damaged condition.

Appeal from superior court, Caldwell county; Allen, Judge.

Action by Hinkle, Craig & Co. against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action to recover damages for injuries to a carload of cattle resulting from delay in transportation. The complaint, among other allegations, contains the following: "(3) That on or about the 4th day of November, 1896, the plaintiffs shipped from Lenoir, N. C., to Hickory, N. C., over the railroad of the Chester & Lenoir Railroad Company, thirty head of cattle; that said cattle were shipped from Lenoir, N. C., on Wednesday, November 4, 1896, at 2 o'clock a. m., and reached Hickory at about 4 o'clock a. m., of the same morning, and were at once turned over to, and received by, the defendant for further transportation; that defendant company, instead of transporting said cattle promptly and expeditiously, refused to carry them on a through freight train which passed Hickory at 8 o'clock a. m. of the same morning, bound for points in the direction of Norfolk, on the defendant's road, although requested and urged to do so by plaintiffs, but instead allowed them to remain in the cars of the Chester & Lenoir Railroad Company from 4 o'clock a. m. till 3 o'clock p. m., at which time they were placed in defendant's cars by plaintiffs at their own expense, and remained in said cars of defendant from 3 o'clock p. m. until 10 o'clock p. m. of the same day before they were removed from Hickory; that said defendant then carried them on a local freight train, which traveled much more slowly than a through train instead of transporting them on a through train, as it should have done; that said cattle did not reach Norfolk over defendant's railroad until Saturday, the 7th day of November, 1896, having been on the road nearly or quite three nights and four days, although the distance is less than four hundred miles, as plaintiffs are informed and believe. (4) That plaintiffs allege that defendant company had ample notice of the date upon which the said cattle would be delivered to it for transportation, so as to have had cars ready for their prompt shipment." The plaintiffs further alleged, in substance, that on account of the unreasonable delay in shipment the cattle were injured, and lost greatly in weight, and consequently depreciated in price; that they were forced to incur the additional expense of feeding them en route and keeping them over Sunday at Norfolk; and that they thereby lost what is known as the "Saturday market," when cattle bring a higher price than at any other time. These allegations are denied by the defendant on information and belief, who sets up the further defense, "that no notice in writing was given to defendant of any claim for damages to plaintiffs' stock, as set forth in said contract, and for the failure to serve such notice, as defendant is advised and believes, plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action."

The following are the material facts of the statement of the case on appeal: "The plaintiffs offered evidence tending to support the allegations of their complaint; among other evidence, that the cattle were shipped from Hickory, N. C., on Wednesday, and were not received in Norfolk until the following Saturday. They admitted the execution of the contract for the shipment of his cattle, which was exhibited to them, and closed their case. The defendant offered in evidence said contract, which contained, among others, the following stipulations: 'Now, in consideration of said railroad agreeing to transport the above-described live stock at the reduced rate of ——— dollars to Norfolk, and a full passage to the owner or his agent on the train with the stock, the said owner and shipper does hereby assume and release the said railroad from all injury, loss, and damage or depreciation which the animal or animals, or either of them, may suffer in consequence of either of them being weak, or escaping, or injuring himself or themselves or each other, or in consequence of overloading, heat, suffocation, fright, viciousness, and from all other damages incidental to railroad transportation which shall not have been caused by the fraud or gross negligence of said railroad company. And it is further agreed that, as a condition precedent to the right of the owner and shipper to recover any damages for any loss or injury to said live stock, he will give notice in writing of his claim therefor to the agent of the railroad company, actually delivering said * * * to him, whether at the point of destination or at any intermediate point where the same may be actually delivered before said stock is removed from the place of destination above mentioned, or from the place of delivery of the same, and before said stock is intermingled with other stock. And this agreement further witnesseth that said owner and shipper has this day delivered to said company the live stock described, about to be transported on the conditions, stipulations, and understandings above expressed, which have been explained to, and are fully understood by, the owner and shipper.' This contract was duly executed by the plaintiffs and by the railroad agent at the point of shipment. The plaintiffs admitted that they had not given the notice in writing stipulated for in the above contract. They testified, however, in rebuttal, that their agent, upon the receipt of the cattle in Norfolk, signed a receipt for the same under protest, owing to their bad condition. Upon this evidence the defendant moved the court to dismiss the complaint. Motion refused, and defendant excepted. Defendant further requested the court to charge the jury that if the jury believed the evidence the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, and to answer the issue, 'No.' This motion was refused, and defendant excepted. The court charged the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover such damages to their carload of stock as they had shown by their evidence. And to this charge of the court the defendant excepted. The issue submitted was as follows: 'Were the plaintiffs endamaged by the negligence of defendant; and, if so, in what amount?' The jury answered this issue, 'Yes; in the sum of $225.' The defendant moved for a new trial on the ground of misdirection by the court, and to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury as requested by the defendant, and because the court submitted the case to the jury upon the evidence. Motion refused, and defendant excepted. There was a judgment according to the verdict. The defendant assigns as error (1) the refusal of the court to dismiss this action at the close of the evidence; (2) because the court refused to charge the jury that, if they believed the evidence, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, and to answer the issue, 'No;' (3) to the charge of the court that, if the jury believed the evidence, plaintiffs are entitled to recover such damage to their carload of stock as they had shown by their evidence; (4) because the court refused to grant a new trial."

DOUGLAS, J. (after stating the facts). This case was submitted to us on printed briefs for the plaintiffs, but was argued in behalf of the defendant, both orally and by brief. It is perhaps proper to say that almost the entire brief of the defendant was devoted to proving a proposition that we have no disposition to deny; that is, that a common carrier can, by special contract, reasonably limit its common-law liability. But we cannot admit the assumed corollary that thereby it ceases to be a common carrier, or ipso facto reverses the legal burden of proof. It is well established that, where the negligence of the defendant is the primary cause of action, it must be alleged and proved by the plaintiff; but here it is merely incidental to the cause of action,—in fact, it arises as a matter of defense. We must not lose sight of the real cause of action, which is the injury resulting from the failure of the defendant to seasonably transport and safely deliver live stock received by it as a common carrier. The plaintiffs' case is fully made out when they have shown that the cattle were received by the carrier, and not seasonably and safely delivered; that is, not delivered at all, or delivered in a damaged condition, and after an unreasonable delay. The burden is then upon the defendant, and, if it wishes to escape any part of its common-law liability by showing a special contract, it must affirmatively prove such contract, and bring the injury clearly within the terms of its exemption. These principles have been so recently and so fully discussed by this court in Mitchell v. Railroad Co., 124 N. C. 236, 32 S. E. 671, that any further elaboration seems needless, at least for the present. The essential principle is tersely and strongly stated by Chief Justice Faircloth in Morganton Mfg. Co. v. Ohio R. & C. Ry. Co., 121 N. C. 514, 28 S. E. 474, where, speaking for a unanimous court, he says: "Among connecting lines of common carriers, that one in whose hands goods are found damaged is presumed to have caused the damage, and the burden is upon it to rebut the presumption." The rule is well stated in Greenl. Ev. (14th Ed.) § 219, in the following language: "And, if the acceptance was special, the burden of proof is still on the carrier to show, not only that the cause of loss was within the terms of the exception, but also that there was on his part no negligence or want of due care." That this rule, which at first was seriously questioned, is receiving almost general acceptance, would appear from the recent work of Elliott on Railroads, where the author says, in section 1548, on page 2403: "There is some conflict among the authorities as to the burden of proof in such cases; but the prevailing rule, where the owner or his agent does not go with the stock, is that when the animals are shown to have been delivered to the carrier in good condition, and to have been lost or injured on the way, the burden of proof then rests upon the carrier to show that the loss or injury was not caused by its own negligence." This rule, which is the natural result of the prima facie liability of the common carrier, is further strengthened by the universal acceptance of the principle that, where a particular fact necessary to be proved rests peculiarly within the knowledge of a party, upon him rests the burden of proof. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 41; Best, Ev. § 274; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 79; Starkie, Ev. § 589; Rice, Ev. § 77; Selma, R. & D. R. Co. v. U. S., 139 U. S. 560, 567, 11 Sup. Ct. 638, 35 L. Ed. 266; State v. McDuffie, 107 N. C. 885, 888, 12 S. E. 83; Govan v. Cushing, 111 N. C. 458, 461, 16 S. E. 619; Mitchell v. Railroad Co., supra. Some of the earlier cases appear to take the view that a common carrier ceases to be such when it makes a special contract, and becomes a private carrier for hire. Whatever foundation may have existed for such an idea in the earlier days of the law, when common carriers were private individuals, and carried their shipments in wagons or boats on the ordinary public highway, without receiving or asking any special privileges, has long since disappeared. A railroad company is, at least, a quasi public corporation, exercising one of the highest prerogatives of the sovereign, that of eminent domain. It is purely a creature of the law, and has no existence outside of its public capacity. It is a common carrier by virtue of its charter, and not by any supposed usage or contract with the shipper. Its character as such is fixed by its contract with the state, and cannot be waived either by the corporation or the shipper. It may limit its liability to a certain extent by special contract, but cannot change its character. All such contracts of limitation, being in derogation of common law, are strictly construed, and never enforced unless shown to be reasonable. Any doubt or ambiguity therein is to be resolved in favor of the shipper, and it has further been held that the burden of proof rested upon the carrier of showing that all such stipulations and exemptions were reasonable. Compania de Navigacion la Flecha v. Brauer, 168 U. S. 104, 118, 18 Sup. Ct. 12, 42 L. Ed. 398; 4 Elliott, R. R. § 1424; Cox v. Railroad Co. (Mass.) 49 N. E. 97; Railroad Co. v. Reeves (Tex. Sup.) 39 S. W. 564; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 326. Stipulations in a bill of lading are similar in their nature to conditions in a policy of insurance. It is well settled by the highest authority that if a policy is so drawn as to require interpretation, and to be fairly susceptible of two different constructions, the one will be adopted that is most favorable to the insured, and against the construction which would limit the liability of the insurer. Imperial Fire Ins. Co. v. Coos Co., 151 U. S. 452, 14 Sup. Ct. 379, 38 L. Ed. 231; London Assurance v. Companhia de Moagens do Barreiro, 167 U. S. 149, 17 Sup. Ct. 785, 42 L. Ed. 113.

In the case at bar it does not appear necessary for the plaintiffs to resort to the burden of proof, as the unreasonable detention is in itself evidence of negligence. It appears from the evidence that the cattle were four three nights—that is, 84 hours—in their destination, a distance of 400 the present day, the transportation ock over a great trunk line of rail- n average rate of less than five hour cannot be considered reasona- ce, in the total absence of explana-

Montgomery and Furches, JJ., dissenting.

On rehearing. Reversed.

For former opinion, see 32 S. E. 968, 124 N. C. 591.

DOUGLAS, J. This is a petition to rehear the case reported in 124 N. C. 591, 32 S. E. 968. It was then decided by a bare majority of the court, and now we find it impossible to come to a unanimous decision, and difficult to come to any decision at all, under the circumstances; and, in view of the fact that there is grave doubt in our minds whether the essential principle of proximate cause was properly explained to the jury, we think that substantial justice will be best subserved by granting a new trial.

We may regard it as settled law that the negligence of the driver of a public conveyance is not imputable to a passenger therein, unless the passenger has assumed such control and direction of said vehicle as to be considered practically in exclusive possession thereof. In other words, the possession of the passenger must be such as to supersede for the time being the possession of the owner, to the extent of making the driver the temporary servant of the passenger. The contrary doctrine, that the negligence of the driver was imputable to the passenger, seems to have had its origin in the English case of Thorogood v. Bryan, decided in 1849, and reported in 8 C. B. 115. For a time this celebrated case bade fair to receive general acquiescence, but was subsequently doubted, and finally directly overruled in the recent English case of The Bernina, 12 Prob. Div. 58. In the meantime the doctrine had met but scant favor in this country, and was distinctly repudiated by the supreme court of the United States in Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366, 6 Sup. Ct. 391, 29 L. Ed. 652, decided in 1886, in which it was held that the passenger could not be held accountable for such negligence. The same conclusion had been announced by the supreme court of New Jersey in Railroad Co. v. Steinbrenner, 47 N. J. Law, 161, 54 Am. Rep. 126, where the principle is elaborately discussed. So far we have no trouble, but there is an essential difference between the contributory negligence of the driver and his primary negligence. Contributory negligence presupposes the negligence of the defendant, causing the injury, to which the negligence of some one else has contributed. Strictly speaking, contributory negligence applies only to the plaintiff, or some one whose negligence is legally attributable to the plaintiff. If the plaintiff was injured through the negligence of the defendant proximately concurring with that of the plaintiff's driver, then he can recover, as the negligence of his driver is not imputable to him unless, as stated above, he had assumed such complete control over the vehicle as to control its management. On the other hand, if the defendant's negligence was remote, and did not proximately, either immediately or by a direct line of causation, produce or concur in producing the plaintiff's injury, he cannot recover, not because he is responsible for the negligence of his driver, but because the defendant has not been guilty of any actionable negligence. Again, if the negligence of his driver was the sole, proximate cause of his injury, he cannot recover from the defendant, but must look to the driver or the driver's master. This would be the primary negligence of the driver. Again, if the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the plaintiff in negligently jumping out of the buggy, or negligently sitting therein so as to fall out from some otherwise inadequate cause, he cannot recover, as this would be his own negligence.

We have endeavored briefly to lay down the principles that should govern a new trial, but the testimony may so materially alter the application of these principles, or bring new ones in requisition, that it is impossible to anticipate the course of the trial. For the reasons stated above, a new trial must be ordered. New trial.

MONTGOMERY, J. I dissent from that part of the opinion of the court in which a new trial is granted. My views are fully set forth in the opinion of the court as reported in 124 N. C. 591, 32 S. E. 968.

FURCHES, J., also dissents.

STRAUSS v. MUTUAL RESERVE FUND LIFE ASS'N.[1]

MUTUAL BENEFIT ASSOCIATIONS — INCREASE OF ASSESSMENTS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

1. Where assessments in a mutual insurance association are to be on the entire membership, and proportioned among the members according to the age of each, the association, after receiving large sums in assessments from a member, cannot, without his consent, so alter the contract as to place him in a class of members whom it requires to pay on the basis of the age attained by each at the date of the assessment, while other members continue to be assessed as of their age at entry.

2. Where a mutual life association violates its contract with a member, the damages to which he is entitled are the amount of premiums and dues paid by him, with interest from the date of each payment.

Action by Joseph Strauss against the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

[1] Rehearing pending.

Shepherd & Busbee, J. W. Hinsdale, and Sewell Tyng, for appellant. W. W. Clark, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful cancellation of a policy of insurance. The record comprises over 500 pages, with a large number of insertions, amounting in the aggregate to perhaps 600 pages of printed matter. The case was fully and ably argued at length, and we have been favored with well-prepared and exhaustive briefs; and yet we see but one simple point essential to the determination of the case: Can a mutual association, by whatever name it may be called, or whatever may be its purposes, enter into a contract with one of its members, and, after receiving large sums upon said contract, alter its essential terms, without the consent of the member, so as practically to destroy its value? We think not. The plaintiff became a member of the plaintiff association in 1883, and received a policy in the form of a certificate of membership, wherein it was expressly agreed that assessments should "be made upon the entire membership in force at the date of the last death for such a sum as the executive committee may deem sufficient to cover said claims; the same to be apportioned among the members according to the age of each member as per table indorsed" on said certificate. It appears from the findings of fact that the plaintiff paid all demands made upon him up to the year 1898, and call No. 96. This last call he refused to pay on the ground that it was exorbitant and contrary to the express terms of his policy. It seems that by successive resolutions, none of which were amendments to its constitution, the association has placed in a separate class all members who entered prior to 1890, and requires them to pay on the basis of the age attained by each at the date of each assessment, while other members continue to be assessed only as of their age of entry. That the result of such discrimination is injurious to the plaintiff clearly appears from the 16th, 18th, 21st, and 22d findings of fact, as follows: "(16) * * * That since the last resolution of 1898 the plaintiff and all who joined said company prior to 1890, and who held policies similar to plaintiff's, were assessed at their full attained age, and rates applicable to such age, whereas persons who became members since 1890, and who held policies under what is styled the 'Ten-Year Class' and the 'Five-Year Class,' are only assessed at their age of entry; and plaintiff is thereby assessed at a higher amount than if the entire membership were assessed at rates of their attained ages." "(18) That call number 96, made on plaintiff in 1898, and pursuant to the resolutions of said year, is larger in amount than it would have been had all the members of the association been assessed at their full attained ages." "(21) That the present value of plaintiff's policy, assuming that the rates were properly established and the members lawfully classified, was, at the time he ceased to be a member of said company, only a nominal sum, as by said classification and rating the amount of policy discounted to such time would not exceed the present value of premiums which would be due and payable for the period of plaintiff's expectancy. (22) That if the entire membership of the company had been rated and assessed at their attained ages, and no distinction made among the classes, then the present value of plaintiff's policy would be more than the present value of the premiums, and the policy have a substantial present value; but there are no data given from which said damage can be estimated or even approximated." Upon his findings of fact, the court below concluded, as matter of law, that the assessment made in pursuance of the resolutions of 1898 was "in violation of defendant's constitution and excessive and invalid"; that the defendant, having ceased and refused to recognize the plaintiff as a member on account of his having refused to pay such excessive and invalid assessment, had broken its contract, and had become liable to the plaintiff in damages, to be measured by "the amount of premiums and dues paid by plaintiff prior to call 96, with interest thereon from date of each payment." Judgment was rendered accordingly. In it we see no error. All that we decide in the present case is that the defendant has violated its contract with the plaintiff in a material matter, whereby the plaintiff, having suffered substantial injury, is entitled to substantial damages. We do not decide that a mutual insurance company, or any other kind of insurance company, cannot issue policies of divers kinds and classes, if so authorized by its charter; nor do we decide that a member of a purely mutual association is not bound by all reasonable by-laws and changes lawfully made therein. We are not considering the enforcement of a contract inequitable on its face, but the violation of a lawful contract by attaching thereto, without the consent of the plaintiff, conditions which utterly destroy its value. It is evident that, if the resolution of 1898 is binding upon the plaintiff, he would in any event be eventually forced out of the company by the constantly increasing premiums.

There is one fact that does not clearly appear from the record, and upon which counsel themselves seem to differ, which, while not essential to the determination of this case, seems worthy of notice: On the hearing it was contended that the defendant association had the right to subsequently rearrange its members into classes, so as to make each class bear the burden of insuring its own members. If by that the association claims the right to place all its members who entered before 1890 into a distinct class, entirely separate from the other members, and make them raise exclusively among themselves enough to pay all the death claims that may occur among their own number, we cannot admit the right, unless such was the understanding when the original contract was made. What would be the result? Suppose certain men start a mutual association, and support it through all its infant struggles into a vigorous and enlarged growth. In course of time the new members would naturally outnumber the old ones. Suppose they should say to the old members: "You are getting old, and therefore your insurance is more costly than ours. We will place you in a class by yourselves, and make you insure each other without any help from us. It is true you have borne the heat and burden of the day, and we are resting in the shade of the tree you have planted, but that makes no difference to us. Insure yourselves or leave." Of course, as one by one died off, the burden would be greater upon the survivors, as a death claim of $1,000 bears more heavily upon 20 men than it would upon 100. Finally 2 would be left. When one died, the other would have to pay his entire policy, and then pay his own policy at his own death. Would this be insurance, and could it be said that any claim which would lead to such a result is sound in principle? It may be that the association has provided for such cases, but it is apparent that if any class of men is set apart, and no new blood permitted to enter, it will eventually die out. If a man voluntarily goes into such a contract with his eyes open, we are not inclined to help him; but his valid, existing contract cannot be changed into such a contract without his consent. Whatever may be the power of a mutual association to change its by-laws, such changes must always be in furtherance of the essential objects of its creation, and not destructive of vested rights.

It is admitted that the measure of damages followed by the court below is the established rule in this state. Braswell v. Insurance Co., 75 N. C. 8; Lovick v. Association, 110 N. C. 93, 14 S. E. 506; Burrus v. Insurance Co., 124 N. C. 9, 32 S. E. 323. But it is contended that this rule was established purely in contemplation of old-line companies, and was not intended to apply to mutual associations. Whatever may have been the inception of the rule, we see no better one to adopt, and, as at present advised, must follow our own precedents. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

PRICHARD et al. v. COMMISSIONERS OF MORGANTON et al.

HEALTH — TOWN COMMISSIONERS — BURNING DWELLINGS — CHARTER — ACTION — COUNTY COMMISSIONERS — SUPERINTENDENT OF HEALTH—NUISANCE—COMPLAINT — DEMURRER — NEGLIGENCE — PLEADING FICTITIOUS STATUTE.

1. Priv. Laws 1885, c. 120, § 37, providing that the town commissioners of Morganton, to prevent the spreading of contagious diseases, "are permitted to cause to be destroyed or disinfected such furniture or other articles which shall be believed to be tainted," does not give such commissioners power to burn a dwelling house to prevent the spreading of smallpox; and hence the commissioners, in their corporate capacity, are not liable to an action therefor.

2. Under Code, § 707, subd. 22, providing that county commissioners shall make rules, regulations, and by-laws for preventing the spread of contagious diseases, such commissioners have no power to burn a dwelling house to prevent the spread of smallpox; and, such an act being outside the scope of their powers, the commissioners, in their corporate capacity, would not be liable to an action therefor.

3. Under Acts 1893, c. 214, § 22, providing that, where the county superintendent of health declares that a nuisance exists on premises, it shall be abated at the expense of the town or county, a complaint to recover for the burning of a dwelling house by the county commissioners to prevent the spread of smallpox, which fails to allege that the same was declared a nuisance by such superintendent, is demurrable.

4. Since Priv. Laws 1885, c. 120, § 37, authorizing the town commissioners of Morganton to destroy tainted furniture or other articles, to prevent the spread of contagious diseases, gives no power to burn a dwelling house to prevent the spread of smallpox, they are not liable therefor, in their corporate capacity, unless such burning was done in the negligent enforcement of their authorized duties; and a complaint in an action against the commissioners for recovery in tort on that ground, which does not allege such negligence, is demurrable.

5. Where a complaint pleads a statute which has no existence, and is not a law of the state, a demurrer to the complaint admits only the facts alleged therein, and has not the effect to admit the existence of the statute.

Faircloth, C. J., and Furches, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Burke county; Bowman, Judge.

Action by Nancy Prichard and others against the commissioners of Morganton and others to recover for the burning of a dwelling house as a health precaution. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

S. J. Ervin and Avery & Ervin, for appellants. J. T. Perkins, for appellees.

MONTGOMERY, J. The plaintiff Nancy Prichard, a tenant in dower, brought this action against the commissioners of the town of Morganton, the board of commissioners of Burke county, and R. T. Claywell and Robert Ross, as their agents and servants, to recover of them damages for burning the house in which she lived, and certain personal property therein, as a nuisance, because of alleged smallpox taint and infection, for injury and damage to growing crops on the same, and for unlawfully and wrongfully depriving her of her liberty by seizing and carrying her to a pest house for smallpox patients, and keeping her there for weeks, in restraint of her freedom and contrary to her will. The persons entitled to the remainder interest in the real estate are the other plaintiffs in this action. The commissioners of Morganton, for one cause of demurrer to the complaint, say that the complaint fails to allege that the tortious acts complained of were within the scope of the powers conferred on said corporation by its charter, and that it appears on the face of the complaint that the acts complained of are not within the scope of the powers of the corporation, and, for another ground of demurrer, say that, if the acts complained of had been done under the express direction of the town commissioners, the conduct of the commissioners would have been ultra vires. The board of commissioners of the county demurred to the complaint, and, among the grounds assigned, these two seem to be the chief: (1) "That the acts alleged to have been done by these defendants, and constituting the plaintiff's cause of action against these defendants, are not within the scope of the corporate powers and duties conferred upon or delegated to these defendants by law; (2) that said acts are not alleged to have been done or performed under or in pursuance of any order, resolution, or direction of these defendants, and these defendants are in no way liable." The defendant Claywell demurred because the complaint alleged that he was merely acting as the agent of the other defendants, and that there was imputed to him, as an individual, no unlawful or wrongful act.

We have examined the charter of the town of Morganton (Priv. Laws 1885, c. 120), and find no authority given to the town commissioners to burn or destroy any house or residence. In section 37 the town commissioners are authorized to take such measures as they may deem effectual to prevent the entrance into the town, or the spread therein, of any contagious or infectious diseases; and under those powers they are permitted to cause to be destroyed or disinfected such furniture or other articles as shall be believed to be tainted or infected with any contagious or infectious diseases, or which there shall be reasonable cause to apprehend will generate or propagate diseases, and may take all other reasonable steps to preserve the public health, and for this purpose may use any money in the treasury. That statute certainly does not even purport to give to the town commissioners the right to burn a house in which a family infected, or thought to be infected, with a contagious disease, resides. The right of the commissioners to destroy the property, indeed, is not admitted by the plaintiffs, but it is intimated that they acted under the authority of the act of 1893, c. 214, § 22; but upon examination of that section it appears that reference is there made to the powers and duties of the superintendents of health of the several counties. No powers or rights are there given to the town commissioners or to the board of commissioners of the county. It is there provided that, in cases where the county superintendent of health declares that a nuisance exists on premises, it shall be removed or abated at the expense of the town, city, or county in which the offender lives, in case of his inability to remove it, with the proviso that the expense chargeable to the town, city, or county shall not exceed $100. In reference to the powers conferred by law upon boards of county commissioners, we find that, by subsection 22 of section 707 of the Code, they can establish public hospitals for their several counties in cases of necessity, and make rules, regulations, and by-laws for preventing the spread of contagious and infectious diseases, and for taking care of those afflicted thereby; the same not being inconsistent with the laws of the state. By no reasonable construction of that subsection of the Code can it be held that the boards of county commissioners can burn a residence house to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases. A proper disinfection would be the extent of their powers in respect to property thus tainted or infected. It is not alleged in the complaint that the acts complained of were ordered by the county superintendent of health; nor does the cause of action, as stated in the complaint, proceed upon the idea that the property was destroyed by the defendants under a method allowed by law, and that the plaintiff is entitled to compensation for its loss. The action is one purely in tort.

It is well settled in this state that counties (that is, the boards of county commissioners in their corporate capacity) are not ordinarily liable to actions of a civil nature for the manner in which they exercise or fail to exercise their corporate powers. They may be sued only in such cases and for such causes as may be provided for and allowed by the statute. Counties are not, in a strictly legal sense, municipal corporations, like cities and towns. They are, rather, instrumentalities of government, and are given corporate powers to execute their purposes; and they are not liable for damages, in the absence of statutory provisions giving a right of action against them. White v. Commissioners, 90 N. C. 439; Manuel v. Commissioners, 98 N. C. 9, 3 S. E. 829. There is, however, a distinction between the liability of a county for failure to discharge corporate duties, and that of a town or city for such a failure. Towns and cities are, as a general rule, liable in damages for the negligence of their officers and agents when specific duties are imposed by their charters and special statutes, when the damages are caused by their failure to discharge such duties and fo exercise the powers conferred to that end, or when the town authorities are acting within the scope of their authority in the management of their property for their own interest, or in the exercise of powers voluntarily assumed for their own advantage: and that, notwithstanding the work they are engaged in will inure to the benefit of the municipality. But it is said in Moffitt v. City of Asheville, 103 N. C. 237, 9 S. E. 695, "Where a city or town is exercising the judicial, discretionary, or legislative authority conferred by its charter, or is discharging a duty imposed solely for the benefit of the public, it incurs no liability for the negligence of its officers, though acting under color of office, unless some statute expressly or by necessary implication subjects the corporation to pecuniary responsibility for such negligence." But the plaintiff does not complain of a negligent act of either of the defendants. The alleged cause of action is a positive act in tort,—the burning of a residence house as a sanitary measure. The board of commissioners of the county, as representing officially the county, are not liable to the demand of the plaintiff, for the reason that there is no statute in existence which makes them so, either expressly or by necessary implication. The town commissioners, as representing the town community, are not liable, for the reasons: First, that the act complained of was for the interest of the state at large; and, second, because they unreasonably exceeded the powers conferred on them by the charter of Morganton, or by any special statute in aid thereof.

The case is before us on demurrer, and, of course, the facts concerning the burning are to be taken as true for the purposes of the demurrer. If, however, it be a fact that the house in which the plaintiff lived was burnt as alleged in the complaint, it was a most high-handed and unreasonable act on the part of those who did it, and was done without the semblance of authority. But she is not without redress. Her remedy will doubtless suggest itself to her counsel. The propositions of law which we have laid down seem to be admitted in the plaintiff's brief, and a recovery is sought upon the effect of the defendant's demurrer to the complaint. In the sixth allegation of the complaint it is alleged that the board of town commissioners burnt the house under some statute or provision of law which they claimed authorized them to assess and burn, and pay for the damage an amount not exceeding $100. Only the facts are admitted by the demurrer. Parties to an action cannot by complaint and demurrer enact a law. There is no such statute as the one referred to in the complaint, and the defendants' demurrer cannot have the effect to admit that there is such a statute and law in force.

If the complaint be treated as containing only one cause of action, the demurrers ought to have been sustained; for the demurrers were directed against the whole complaint, though there was only one allegation that was demurrable,—the one which charged that the residence house of the plaintiff was burned. Cowand v. Meyers, 99 N. C. 198, 6 S. E. 82. If the complaint be treated as embracing more than one cause of action, as we will treat it,—all growing out of the same matter, and therefore not demurrable on that account,—we think that the demurrers were good against that cause of action which set forth the burning of the plaintiff's house, and damages therefor. The other causes of action were not demurrable, and the demurrers should have been overruled as to them. There was error in the particular we have pointed out. Modified and affirmed.

FURCHES, J. (dissenting). The plaintiff Nancy Prichard alleges that she is the widow of Z. T. Smith, deceased, and that the other plaintiffs are the children and heirs at law of said Smith; that as such widow she was entitled to dower upon the lands of her said husband, which was laid off and assigned to her in a house and lot in the town of Morganton, in which she and her family were living; that there were other buildings on said lot, and a growing crop of corn, and a garden with vegetables growing therein; that, besides these, she owned and had in said house clothing, bedclothing, tableware, and other domestic articles and furniture; that on or about the last of May, 1899, the defendants Robert Ross and R. T. Claywell, under the pretense that the plaintiff had smallpox, or had been exposed to the disease of smallpox, and claiming that they were authorized to do so by an order of the board of commissioners of Morganton, sustained and approved by the board of commissioners of Burke county, came to her house, arrested her, and carried her to a pest house, set fire to and destroyed her house and the other outhouses on the lot, and also burned and destroyed her clothing, bedclothing, tableware, and household furniture, when in fact she did not have smallpox, nor does she believe that she had been exposed to that contagious disease. To recover damages for this treatment,—the loss of houses, and the loss and destruction of her personal property,—she brings this action against the defendants, Robert Ross, R. T. Claywell, the board of commissioners of Morganton, and the board of commissioners of Burke county. To this complaint the defendants demurred, thereby admitting the facts stated in the complaint to be true; and, taking these facts to be true, as we must do, it would seem that the plaintiff is entitled to damages from somebody. One ground of the demurrer is the misjoinder of causes of action—too many causes joined together in one action. But it appears that they all grew out of one wrongful act, or are connected with the same, and that the complaint is not demurrable on that account. Benton v. Collins, 118 N. C. 196, 24 S. E. 122; Solomon v. Bates, 118 N. C. 311, 24 S. E. 478. It is claimed in the demurrer that Ross and Claywell are not liable because they were only the agents and servants of the other defendants. Admitting that this defense can be raised by the demurrer in this case (which we do not admit), it could not protect them, unless their employers had the right to commit this trespass upon the plaintiff's, and to destroy their property. And, while this is so,—must be so,—the other defendants claim that they had no right to order this trespass and destruction of property, and demand protection on that account. So it is manifest that both of these contentions cannot be true, nor can both these defenses be good. This is sufficient to justify the court in overruling the demurrer. But are the other defendants liable? The complaint alleges that this trespass and destruction of plaintiff's property were done by order of the board of commissioners of Morganton, sanctioned by the commissioners of Burke county. But it is contended that they had no right to make such order; that it was ultra vires, and they are not bound by it. But it is provided in section 37, c. 120, Priv. Laws 1885 (Charter of the Town of Morganton), "that the board of commissioners may take such means as they may deem effectual to prevent the entrance into the town or the spreading therein of any contagious or infectious diseases, * * * may cause any person in the town believed to be infected with such contagious disease or whose stay may endanger the public health, to be removed to some place within or without the town limits, may cause to be disinfected or destroyed such furniture or other articles which shall be believed to be tainted or infected with any contagious or infectious disease, or of which there shall be reasonable cause to apprehend will generate or propagate diseases, and may take all other reasonable steps to preserve the public health, and for this purpose may use any money in the treasury." It would be very hard to believe that the draftsman of this act did not think he was giving the commissioners of Morganton plenary power to deal with contagious diseases; and it seems that they so understood it when they made this order, as it appears from the complaint that they have had the plaintiff's damages assessed at $100, and have offered to pay plaintiff that amount. But it is contended that the commissioners were limited to that amount. This cannot be so,—that the act authorized the commissioners to destroy property, and limited the plaintiff's damages to $100, or any other amount less than the value of the property destroyed. If this contention of defendants were true, it would allow the defendants to assess their own damage. This cannot be so. It is further contended that this act does not extend to the destruction of houses. I do not agree to this contention. If that were true, what becomes of damage for her clothing, the bedclothing, tableware, and other articles of household furniture destroyed? Has the plaintiff no remedy for this trespass and destruction of property? I cannot so hold. As there was no statute called to our attention that authorized the county commissioners to destroy property in Morganton, it is probable that they are not liable. The demurrer should have been sustained as to them, but was properly overruled as to the others. This was written as a tentative opinion, and, although the opinion of the court has been modified since it was written, it is filed as a dissenting opinion.

FAIRCLOTH, C. J. I concur in the dissenting opinion.

RUTTER et al. v. ANDERSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. June 12, 1900.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—INTENT OF TESTATOR—DEVISE TO WIFE—POWER OF SALE.

1. The rule which controls all others in the interpretation of wills is that the intention of the testator, to be gathered from the entire will, must govern.

2. A., the owner of a tract of 35¼ acres of land, of very small value, makes the following will: "First, I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Lucinda J. Anderson, my farm, of thirty-five and one-fourth acres, on which I now reside, situated in Grant district, Wetzel county, West Virginia, and adjoining the lands of Charles Gilbert and others, to have and to hold the same to her for and during her natural life; or my wife, Lucinda J. Anderson, may sell said farm and live on the proceeds, if necessary; and, second, I give to my wife, Lucinda J., all of my personal property of every kind, including horses, cows, household and kitchen furniture of every kind and description, of my personal property; and, further, my wife, Lucinda J., is to pay my son, J. R. Anderson, all the money that I owe him at this present time, and to pay all of funeral expenses." Held, the facts and circumstances of the case make it clear that the intention of the testator was to authorize and empower Lucinda to sell and convey the said land in fee simple if the same should be necessary for her support and maintenance.

Appeal from circuit court, Wetzel county; R. H. Freer, Judge.

Bill by Hannah J. Rutter and others against Lucinda J. Anderson and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wiley & Keifer, for appellants.

McWHORTER, P. On the 20th day of March, 1894, William H. Anderson, the owner of a tract of 35¼ acres of land in Wetzel county, together with his wife, Lucinda J. Anderson, executed a deed of lease of the oil and gas in and upon said land to the South Penn Oil Company; said company to deliver in the pipe line, to the credit of lessors, their heirs and assigns, free of cost, the equal one-eighth part of all the oil produced and saved from said premises, and to pay $300 per year for the gas from each and every gas well drilled on the premises, the product of which should be marketed and used off the premises. On the 18th day of January, 1895, said W. H. Anderson executed his last will and testament, as follows: "First, I give and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Lucinda J. Anderson, my farm of thirty-five and one-fourth acres, on which I now reside, situated in Grant district, Wetzel county, West Virginia, and adjoining the lands of Charles Gilbert and others, to have and to hold the same to her for and during her natural life; or my wife, Lucinda J. Anderson, may sell said farm and live on the proceeds, if necessary; and, second, I give to my wife, Lucinda J., all of my personal property of every kind, including horses, cows, household and kitchen furniture of every kind and description, of my personal property; and, further, my wife, Lucinda J., is to pay to my son, J. R. Anderson, all the money that I owe him at this present time, and to pay all of funeral expenses." On the 2d day of March, 1895, in consideration of one dollar paid, said Lucinda J. Anderson conveyed by deed to J. R. Anderson, his heirs and assigns, "the one-eighth part of the oil and gas produced and saved" in and under said tract of land, and on condition that the grantee should within six months after a well should be drilled for oil and gas, and be properly completed, tubed, and tested for oil, at his election, either pay to the grantor the sum of $200 personally, or deposit it to her credit in a bank designated, or release and reconvey to the grantor the oil and gas rights so conveyed. The South Penn Oil Company drilled two wells on said tract, one of which was dry, and the other a small producer. Hannah J. Rutter and others, heirs at law of William H. Anderson, deceased, filed their bill in equity in the circuit court of Wetzel county against Lucinda J. Anderson, widow of said decedent, Lavina Anderson, widow of J. R. Anderson, who was one of the heirs at law of William H. Anderson, Sherman L. Anderson and Clyde Anderson, infant children of said J. R. Anderson, deceased, and Lavina Anderson, South Penn Oil Company, a corporation, and Eureka Pipe-Line Company, also a corporation, alleging that under said will the said widow, Lucinda J. Anderson, took nothing except a life estate in the said tract of 35¼ acres; that the remainder in fee simple is vested in the heirs at law of William H. Anderson, who are entitled to all the royalties arising under the lease to the South Penn Oil Company made by Anderson in his lifetime; and that Lucinda J. Anderson, the widow and tenant for life, had no right or power to sell or convey the said royalties to said J. R. Anderson,—and praying "that said royalties of oil and gas arising by virtue of said contract of lease made by said W. H. Anderson, deceased, and South Penn Oil Company, may be declared to be the absolute property of the heirs at law of said W. H. Anderson, deceased, and that the same may be apportioned and divided among them share and share alike," and that the South Penn Oil Company be required to disclose and show the amount of oil and gas produced from the premises, and the amount of oil run into the pipe lines of the Eureka Pipe-Line Company, and that said last-mentioned company be inhibited and restrained from delivering and paying over to said Lucinda J. Anderson, or to the estate or the heirs of J. R. Anderson, any portion of said royalties; that the same be decreed to be paid over to plaintiffs and others, the heirs at law of said W. H. Anderson, deceased. The defendant Lavina Anderson answered the bill, denying the material allegations thereof, and showing what payments had been made to Lucinda J. Anderson, on account of the purchase of said royalties by J. R. Anderson, and by herself as administratrix of said J. R. Anderson, and averring that Lucinda J. Anderson had the right to convey the royalties as she did to J. R. Anderson, or to convey the land itself, under the provisions of the will, if it should be necessary for her maintenance, and that the estate of J. R. Anderson had a right to collect the royalties. The South Penn Oil Company answered that it had no interest in the royalties, and was willing to deliver the same to whoever might be entitled thereto; that it had been delivering the same to Lucinda J. Anderson, the widow of the lessee, who, as respondent supposed, was entitled to the same under the will of her deceased husband. The infant defendants, Sherman L. Anderson and Clyde Anderson, by their guardian ad litem. filed their answer, to all of which general replications were entered, and the bill was taken for confessed as to the other adult defendants. On the 6th of December, 1897, the cause was referred to a commissioner to ascertain and report what amount of oil had been extracted and taken from the land in controversy, and the value of same, when taken, and by whom, and who had received the royalties thereof; also, who were entitled to said royalties, and in what amounts. The depositions of defendant Lavina Anderson and W. H. Showalter were taken and filed in the cause, by which depositions they show that the land, in most part, was poor and rough, of very little value for agricultural purposes, being steep hillside, and cut up by ravines, hollows, and gutters, and the soil not very productive, and that the value of the personal property left by W. H. Anderson was about $60; that the sale of the royalties by Lucinda J. Anderson was necessary for her support and maintenance. The commissioner made his report under the order of reference, reporting that defendant, Vina Anderson, as administratrix of J. R. Anderson, had been receiving the royalties of all the oil taken from said tract of land, and had received up to May 13, 1897, the sum of $136.36 for royalties, but was unable to ascertain and report the amount extracted subsequently. On the 2d day of February, 1899, the cause was heard. The court confirmed the said report of the commissioner, there being no exceptions or objections thereto, and ascertained that there had been sold of the royalty oil from said tract amounting to $136.36, which had been paid to defendant Vina Anderson, and that there was yet in the pipe line of Eureka Pipe-Line Company, up to December 31, 1898, 364.67 barrels of oil from the royalty turned over and delivered to said pipe-line company by the South Penn Oil Company under its lease from said W. H. Anderson, which was the property of said Vina Anderson as administratrix of the estate of J. R. Anderson, and that she was authorized to sell the same, as well as the royalty to be produced from said land; that, by virtue of the terms of W. H. Anderson's will Lucinda J. Anderson only took a life estate in said tract of 35¼ acres of land, and that the will did and does not empower, authorize, or give said Lucinda J. Anderson power to alienate or sell the said land, or any part of or interest therein, in excess of her life estate, even though such alienation or sale be necessary for her support and maintenance; that the operations (drilling, etc.) took place under a lease executed by W. H. Anderson in his lifetime, and, although oil was produced after the death of the said Anderson, said lease was and is a valid lease; that said life tenant or her assignee, J. R. Anderson, was entitled to the whole of said one-eighth royalty of oil and gas from said tract, being the production under said lease lawfully produced by virtue thereof, subject, however, to the debts of said W. H. Anderson, deceased; that the royalty deed executed by Lucinda J. Anderson to said J. R. Anderson, dated March 2, 1895, filed with complainant's bill as Exhibit C, conveyed to J. R. Anderson the one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced from said tract, and is a valid and subsisting royalty deed, and that Lucinda had the right, authority, and title to make said royalty deed, and directed the Eureka Pipe-Line Company to deliver and place to the credit of Vina Anderson, administratrix of the estate of J. R. Anderson, deceased, one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced and saved from said tract, except such oil as was theretofore produced, and sold therefrom, and that plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief prayed for in their bill, and refused to grant relief, but let the bill stand, and gave defendants judgment for their costs, and awarded them execution therefor. The defendant Vina Anderson, widow of J. R. Anderson, and as his administratrix, appealed, assigning as error:

1. In referring the cause to a commissioner to ascertain and report what amount of oil had been extracted from said land, etc. Whatever was the effect of the will of W. H. Anderson,—whether it vested in Lucinda J. Anderson the title to said land in fee, or only a life estate,—she was entitled to the whole of the royalties under the lease executed in the lifetime of the testator by virtue of the will, and was competent to sell and convey her interest, and she or her assignee or vendee was entitled to the same. "The tenant of an estate for life, unless reed by covenant or agreement, has a to the full enjoyment and use of the and all its profits during his estate n, including mines of oil or gas open his life estate begins, or lawfully d and worked during the existence of estate." Koen v. Bartlett, 41 W. Va. 3 S. E. 664, 31 L. R. A. 128 (Syl., point The devisee under the will, or her grantieing entitled to the whole of the royalwas not required to account for same, ere should not have been an order of ence for that purpose. The plaintiffs no interest therein.

That the court erred in decreeing that da only took a life estate in said tract d, and that she could not alienate said or any part of it or interest therein, d her said life estate, even though such ition be necessary for her support and enance. "The rule which controls all s in the interpretation of wills is that tention of the testator, to be gathered the entire will, must govern." Boyd v. an, 36 Ill. 355; Houser v. Ruffner, 18 a. 244; Pue v. Pue, 1 Md. Ch. 382; James uden, 14 Ohio St. 251; Smith v. Bell, 6 8, 8 L. Ed. 322. W. H. Anderson was up in the seventies," and his wife a little ger, but rapidly approaching old age, she would no longer be able to battle the world, and having no property in wn right to rely on, while they to- r had managed to get this little farm ¼ acres of rough, hillside land, of thin cut up with ravines and gutters, worth ittle if any more than $10 per acre. naturally, the first care and greatest tude on the part of the old man in makis will was to provide, as far as his property would do so, for his widow er declining years. Indeed, judging the language of the will, he had no object in view, as he made no provias to remainder, and made no residuary e; his whole purpose and intent were vide for her. Knowing that his estate l be liable for his debts, having given s personal property to his wife, which ecord shows amounted to $60 to $75, he ed her with the payment of his debts the payment of his funeral expenses. nly debt he owed, it seemed, was to n, J. R. Anderson. Being fully aware e producing capacity of the farm, no oil opment having then been made thereon, estator knew it was at least very doubtwhether his widow could pay the debt xpenses required by the will to be paid, upport herself from it. Hence he did ntend to confine her to a life estate in, but clearly intended to, and did, her the power to sell and convey any n thereof, or the whole of it, if it d be necessary for her maintenance and rt. The language of the will, in the of all the facts in the case, clearly ines this. The second or added clause in the first clause of the will, referring to the real property, giving it "to her for and during her natural life," "or my wife, Lucinda J. Anderson, may sell said farm and live on the proceeds, if necessary," beyond all question, intended, in case the use of the property did not furnish the necessary support, to fully empower her to sell and convey in fee simple the said farm in order to provide such support, and it should be so construed. Liston v. Jenkins, 2 W. Va. 62; Magers v. Edwards' Adm'r, 13 W. Va. 822; John v. Barnes, 21 W. Va. 498. "When two clauses are irreconcilably repugnant, in a deed the first, and in a will the last, prevails." 2 Minor, Inst. (4th Ed.) 1059; Blair v. Muse, 83 Va. 238, 2 S. E. 31. That the product of the soil would not furnish the necessary support is proven, and in no way questioned.

It is assigned as error that it was decreed that plaintiffs were not entitled to the relief prayed for, and giving defendants judgment for costs, and "then allowing the said bill to stand and continue the said cause." I fail to see the object in retaining the bill, as its only purpose was to set aside the deed from Lucinda Anderson to J. R. Anderson for the royalties, and to have the said royalties divided among the heirs of W. H. Anderson, deceased; plaintiffs having utterly failed to show themselves entitled to any relief whatever, or that they have any interest, except that which is contingent upon the death of Lucinda J. Anderson, leaving the tract of land undisposed of under the power given her by the will of W. H. Anderson. The decree entered on the 2d day of February, 1899, is affirmed in so far as it decrees the deed from Lucinda J. Anderson to J. R. Anderson, conveying the royalties, to be a good and valid royalty deed, and refuses to grant the relief to the plaintiffs prayed for in their bill, and entering judgment in favor of defendants for their costs; and in all other respects, the said decree is reversed and annulled, and plaintiffs' bill dismissed.

BRANNON, J. I think the power to sell and consume proceeds of the land, given by the will, passed a fee, as stated in the Wilmoth Case, 34 W. Va. 426, 12 S. E. 731.

ROOT-TEA-NA-HERB CO. v. RIGHTMIRE et al.

EQUITY—PROCESS — APPEARANCE — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—KNOWLEDGE OF GRANTEE.

1. Where a party files his petition, in the nature of an original bill in a chancery suit, praying to be made a party plaintiff, and that the defendants to the suit, being named in the petition, be made defendants thereto, and such defendants appear to said petition and demur, and demurrer is overruled, and on the record waive their right to answer or further plead thereto, it is not error to proceed upon said petition in the cause without process issued thereon; the waiver of right to answer or further plead being, in effect, a waiver of process.

2. Under chapter 74, Code, a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, who had no notice of the fraudulent intent of his immediate grantor, or of the fraud rendering void the title of such grantor, is protected.

3. E. V. R., a married woman living with her husband, purchased and had conveyed to her a house and lot. She borrowed from a building and loan association $500, which she used principally in paying for and improving the property, and, together with her husband, executed a deed of trust on the property to secure the loan, which was evidenced by bond, and payable in monthly installments. Shortly afterwards judgment creditors of the husband, of whose claims the said loan association had no notice at the time of the loan, instituted a suit to set aside the conveyance to E. V. R., as being in fraud of their rights, and succeeded in setting it aside as to their judgments. Held, the deed of trust was the prior lien, and, the court having no power to change the terms and conditions of the trust as to the maturity of the loan secured, it could only decree the sale of the property, subject to the trust debt to satisfy said judgments.

Appeal from circuit court, Tucker county; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by the Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company against Emma V. Rightmire and others. Decree for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. B. Maxwell and W. G. Conley, for appellants. J. Hop Woods and A. B. Parsons, for appellee.

McWHORTER, P. By deed dated October 5, 1894, N. E. Canfield and her husband, J. C. Canfield, conveyed to Emma V. Rightmire certain lots of land in the town of Parsons in consideration of $700, of which $380 was paid in cash, and $320 to be paid to A. Currence by said Rightmire; said Canfields retaining a lien on said property to secure the payment of said money to Currence. On the 14th day of January, 1895, said Rightmire and R. F. Rightmire, her husband, executed a deed of trust to J. C. Stoddard and A. C. Dubois, trustees, on said property, to secure to the Washington National Building & Loan Association the payment of $500 borrowed from said association, which money so borrowed was used in paying off the Currence lien, and on debts made for work and material performed and furnished in improvements on the property, except $84.85 paid to Mrs. Rightmire, and $7.50 to the local attorney of said association. At the February rules, 1896, Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company, a corporation, filed its bill in the circuit court of Tucker county, setting up a judgment for $417.32 obtained on the law side of the same court on the 27th of November, 1895, against said R. F. Rightmire; alleging that said judgment was recovered on notes of said Rightmire dated May 17, 1894, given under a purchase of goods made in October, 1893, and alleging that the purchase of the property was made from Canfield by said R. F. Rightmire, and the deed procured by him fraudulently to be made to Emma V. Rightmire, his wife, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors, and especially the plaintiff in the collection of its said debt; that said Emma had full notice and knowledge of the said fraudulent intent and purpose on the part of her husband, and participated in the fraud; that she had no separate estate or property of any kind, and the property was paid for wholly by her said husband, except what was paid out of the money so borrowed from the said Washington Building & Loan Association; that said R. F. Rightmire was indebted to other creditors in large amounts of money, and it was his object and purpose to defraud them, as well as plaintiff, in having said deed made to his wife, said Emma V. Rightmire,—and prayed that said deed of Canfields to Emma V. Rightmire be set aside and annulled, as having been made in fraud of plaintiff's rights; that said property be sold to satisfy its said debt; that the true amount yet due the said building and loan association be ascertained, etc.; and for general and special relief. Emma V. Rightmire filed her answer, denying that her husband had paid any part of the purchase money for said property, but claiming that the property was purchased, paid for, and improved by her with the money she borrowed from the building association, and with the help of her two sons, and that she still owed said association, except what she had paid on the dues, etc., and owed the Union Manufacturing Company, a corporation, for materials for the improvements, and denied all fraud and knowledge of fraud, and averred that the amount due the Union Manufacturing Company was agreed to be paid in payments of $10 per month. At the December rules, 1896, the Union Manufacturing Company filed its bill to enforce its mechanic's lien against said property for materials furnished, claiming a balance of $261.25, and making the parties to the suit of Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company parties defendants, and exhibiting its statement and account of its said lien; alleging that it furnished the materials charged for for the improvements put upon said property; that, at the time it so furnished the materials for which it has its lien, it had no intimation that there was any such claim as that set up by the plaintiff in the other suit; and that, if the Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company should succeed in setting aside the conveyance as to its claim, the said mechanic's lien should be first paid. On the 13th of March, 1897, Samuel V. Woods, by leave of court, filed his petition praying to be made a party plaintiff in case of Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company, and making all the parties to said suit, named in the caption of his petition, parties thereto; setting up a judgment recovered in the circuit court of Barbour county on the 4th of April, 1894, against R. F. Rightmire, for $130.03, with interest from that date and costs, $3.75, cking the said deed of October 5, m Canfields to Emma Rightmire, as t and void as to his said judgment, of the fact that said property was d and paid for by said R. F. Right- d, for the purpose of hindering, de- nd defrauding his creditors (especial- ner), he had procured the deed for perty to be made to his wife, said . F. e being then insolvent) operated, by section 2, c. 74, Code, as a security e creditors of said R. F. Rightmire, perty therein conveyed was his prop- if said deed of the Canfields was hinder, delay, and defraud petition- ther creditors of said R. F. F. And the defendants nam- id petition appeared and demurred petition, in which petitioner joined, rounds being assigned, the demurrer ruled, and the defendants, and each waived their right to answer or fur- d to said petition. The cause was on to be heard upon the bill taken essed as to R. F. Rightmire, the answer of E. V. Rightmire, general n thereto, etc., upon depositions of , and upon said petition; and the s of opinion, and so decreed, that from N. E. Canfield to E. V. Right- October 5, 1894, was taken in the E. V. Rightmire for the purpose of , delaying, and defrauding plaintiff tioner Woods in the collection of ts, and set the same aside, and de- at the land conveyed thereby was be sold to satisfy said debts, and re- e cause to a commissioner, to ascer- condition of the title to said proper- he liens thereon, their amounts and , and to whom owing, giving to the ot due the Washington Building & Loan Association its proper priority, just as though the said deed of October 5th had not been set aside as to plaintiff's debt, but subject to the opinion of the court to be thereafter rendered upon the question of law and fact raised in respect thereto in the allegations of said petition, and to report the annual rental value of said property, and any other pertinent matter, etc. On the 19th day of June, 1897, the Washington Building & Loan Association tendered its answer, showing amount due on its debt on 12th June, 1897, to be $428.65; that its deed of trust is the first lien on said property; that, in case the deed of October 5th should be held to be fraudulent, Woods' lien would be fourth in priority; denying the fraudulency of said deed, and insisting that, if the property should be sold, it must be sold subject to the deed of trust of respondent, on the terms set forth in the deed of trust. The suits of Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company and of Union Manufacturing Company against Rightmires and others were consolidated. The commissioner filed his report. Emma V. Rightmire excepted to the original report, and asked that the alternate report made at her instance be affirmed, allowing to her the sum of $89.10 paid by her to the building and loan association, which should be second in priority to the lien of the association, and $75 paid by her on the mechanic's lien, which should have the same priority as the original mechanic's lien. The Washington Building & Loan Association excepted to the report because it says the evidence shows clearly that there was due it on its claim $428.65 as of June 12, 1897, while the commissioner allowed a less amount. And S. V. Woods excepted because he was not given his proper priority; that the deed of October 5, 1894, to Emma V. Rightmire being set aside restored the property to R. F. Rightmire, when his judgment would take precedence over the trust deed, over the Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company's judgment, and over the mechanic's lien debt reported as to the lots, but not as against the building constructed on the lots.

The cause was finally heard on the 4th day of December, 1897. The court overruled all the exceptions to the report of the commissioner, and confirmed the report, and ascertained the first lien to be that of the Washington Building & Loan Association, for $424.71; the second lien, a balance of $199.73 due on the mechanic's lien of the Union Manufacturing Company; the third, the judgment of Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company for $495.17; and the fourth lien, the judgment of Samuel V. Woods for $158.76; with interest on each of said sums from June 12, 1897,—and decreed the sale of the property to satisfy the same, if not paid within 30 days from date of the decree.

Defendant Emma V. Rightmire appealed from said decree, assigning several errors: First, that the court erred in considering Exhibit J with the bill of Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company, because the same was not a proper paper for consideration of the court in ascertaining the solvency or insolvency of the defendant R. F. Rightmire. This paper was simply the alleged report of the Bradstreet Commercial Agency touching the commercial standing of the said defendant R. F. Rightmire, dated Cleveland, October 16, 1893, made an exhibit with plaintiff's bill. There was no exception to the consideration of it, and I am unable to see how it could, in any event, have influenced the mind of the court prejudicially to the rights or interests of the appellant.

The second, third, and fourth assignments all refer to the petition of Samuel V. Woods: First, that it was error to permit the petition to be filed without process against the principal defendant, R. F. Rightmire; second, in not remanding the same to rules as to said defendant, as he was never represented by counsel in the case, as shown by the record, and never had a day to answer the allegations of said petition; and, third, in decreeing the debt due to petitioner, Woods, without first giving said R. F. Rightmire a time to appear, and a day to answer the allegations of the petition. The record shows that on the day the petition was filed, praying "for process against the defendants named therein, and thereupon the said defendants, by their counsel, W. B. Maxwell and Lipscomb & Lipscomb, appeared and demurred thereto, and this petitioner joined in said demurrer, and, no grounds being assigned in support thereof, the same is overruled; and thereupon the said defendants, and each of them, waived their right now to answer, or further plead to said petition," etc. This petition distinctly makes R. F. Rightmire a defendant thereto, and "the defendants named therein appeared by counsel" and demurred, and they, and each of them, waived their right to answer or further plead to said petition. The object of process is to secure the appearance of the defendants in court. When that is done by general appearance, the function of the process is accomplished; and, unless there is some ruling of the court touching the validity of the process or return of service, the same is not made or considered a part of the record. A defendant cannot voluntarily appear and demur to a petition, and waive his right to further plead or answer thereto, and then take advantage of the fact that no process issued against him.

The fifth assignment is that "the court erred in setting aside the deed of N. E. Canfield to E. V. Rightmire, dated October 5, 1894, as fraudulent and void as to the creditors assailing it." "In case of a purchase by a wife during coverture, the burden is upon her to prove distinctly that she paid for the thing purchased with funds not furnished by her husband. Evidence that she purchased amounts to nothing unless it is accompanied by clear and full proof that she paid for it with her own separate funds. In the absence of such proof, the presumption is that her husband furnished the means of payment." Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122; Herzog v. Weiler, 24 W. Va. 199; McMasters v. Edgar, 22 W. Va. 673; Stockdale v. Harris, 23 W. Va. 499; Seitz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 580, 24 L. Ed. 179; Hutchinson's Ex'x v. Boltz, 36 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. 267; Brooks v. Applegate, 37 W. Va. 373, 16 S. E. 585. It does not appear that Emma V. Rightmire had any separate estate. All that she paid on account of the property was a part of what she borrowed from the building and loan association, the team of horses she got from her husband, and some little help she got from her sons, who worked in the tannery; and, in accounting for the disbursement of the money she borrowed from the loan association, in her testimony she says: "I paid to different parties,—Mr. Currence, Mr. Gibson; and I paid some money back to my husband, I owed him." How much she paid her husband, or for what she owed him,—whether for the team of horses, or money advanced by him on the property, or for other purposes,—does not appear. In her examination in chief, when asked to "state how you purchased the property in controversy, and whether or not any of the money or property of R. F. Rightmire has gone into said property," she answered: "I bought the property of N. E. Canfield, and I procured a loan from the Washington National Building & Loan Association. I kept the dues paid to said loan association, with my own money. None of R. F. Rightmire's money or property has ever gone into this property." This is her whole testimony in chief. The court did not err in setting aside said deed of October 5, 1894, from N. E. Canfield to E. V. Rightmire, as to plaintiff's and petitioner's claims.

The sixth assignment is "that the court erred in decreeing the mechanic's lien of the Union Manufacturing Company, held by assignment by Ruth M. Ryder at the date of final order, to be a lien upon the house and lot of E. V. Rightmire, because the account filed with said lien was never sworn to by any person for said corporation"; and, as to this assignment, counsel for plaintiff Root-Tea-Na-Herb Company says there is some confusion as to whether or not there has been a compliance with the statute as to verifying the account claimed to be a mechanic's lien, but thinks "the court will probably conclude that the affidavit shown was sufficient. However, there is a fatal defect in this mechanic's lien, to wit, it is not shown on the face of the lien, or in the bill of the Union Manufacturing Company, or anywhere in the cause, that the claimant of the lien ever filed an account, verified by affidavit, with Mrs. Rightmire, within 35 days after furnishing the material, as required by statute, and for that reason the lien ceased to exist. And this appellee now assigns said error, and which is covered by the last exception of Mr. Woods. Code 1891, c. 75, § 3." As to appellant's said assignment, the Union Manufacturing Company began, November 20, 1895, furnishing material under contract made directly with E. V. Rightmire, the owner of the property, and continued until March 24, 1896, when it ceased to furnish the same. On the 18th day of May, 1896, J. H. Ryder, manager of said company, filed with the clerk of the county court of Tucker county such statement and account under his oath as is required by section 4, c. 75, Code, giving in said statement a sufficient description of the property to be charged with the lien, and the owner's name, and seems to have in all respects complied with the statute. As to the appellee's assignment, the material having been furnished to the owner under a contract made directly with the owner, is not affected by section 3, but the lien is created and completed under sections 2 and 4, and was properly filed within the time required by section 4.

Assignments 7, 8, and 9 refer to the exceptions of appellant to the commissioner's report. Appellant excepts to the commissioner's report, but points out no error in the report, except by inference, in claiming that she ought to be allowed the payments made, aggregating $89.10, on account of the loan from the building and loan association, and $75 on account of the mechanic's lien of the Union Manufacturing Company, and subrogated to the rights of such creditors. The deed was set aside only as to the debts of plaintiff and petitioner, and the payments made by her, for which she claims the right of substitution, were upon her own debts, made and created by herself in the purchase and improvement of said property, and she will have the benefit of such payments. Petitioner, Woods, insists that, R. F. Rightmire being insolvent when the property was purchased, and the property being his, the deed of trust given to secure the building and loan association operated to create a lien, as of that priority and date, for the ratable benefit of all his then existing creditors, and in support of this proposition cites Refining Co. v. Quinn, 39 W. Va. 538, 20 S. E. 576, and Kurner v. O'Neil, 39 W. Va. 515, 20 S. E. 589. These authorities cannot apply, as against the claim of the Washington National Building & Loan Association, because it stands in relation of purchaser of the property from Mrs. E. V. Rightmire, who held the legal title, and there is no allegation in any of the pleadings, nor does it otherwise appear in the record, that it had notice either of any rights of R. F. Rightmire in said property, or of the claims of either plaintiff or petitioner. Neither of their judgments had been recorded, and there is nothing in the record to show that the bona fides of said deed of trust was in any way questioned by any one. "Under our statute against fraudulent conveyances, etc. (Code 1891, c. 74), a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, who had no notice of the fraudulent intent of his immediate grantor, or of the fraud rendering void the title of such grantor, is protected." Bump, Fraud. Conv. §§ 304, 497, 499; Blackshire v. Pettit, 35 W. Va. 547, 14 S. E. 133; Goshorn's Ex'r v. Snodgrass, 17 W. Va. 717. It is claimed by the trust creditor, the building and loan association, that its trust deed is the first lien upon the property, and that in case the deed of October 5th from N. E. Canfield to Mrs. Rightmire be set aside as to the creditors of R. F. Rightmire, and the property be directed to be sold, it should be sold subject to the deed of trust. The debt secured by the deed of trust, and evidenced by bond, was not yet due, and was payable in installments in the future. The debt was contracted and the trust executed in good faith, the payments had been kept paid up according to the contract, and it was error to decree sale for the whole amount yet unpaid, and still not due. "Where the owner of real estate has executed a valid deed of trust upon the same to secure the payment of a loan (which is evidenced by note or bond) contracted to be paid in installments, which have not yet matured, when a creditor obtains a judgment against the grantor in said trust deed, and proceeds to enforce his judgment lien in equity, he can only subject the equity of redemption; and the court has no power to change the terms and conditions of the deed of trust, as to the maturity of the loan thereby secured." Wise v. Taylor, 44 W. Va. 492, 29 S. E. 1003. As to the exception of the building and loan association to the report of the commissioner, where it is claimed that the claimant proved a balance of $428.65 yet unpaid, while the commissioner allowed a less amount, the fact is that the record shows that the commissioner allowed a greater amount, viz. $434.71, while the court decreed the sum of $424.71, or $3.94 less than claimed, while the commissioner allowed $6.06 more than claimed. As the court did not directly pass upon the exception, and it is a mere matter of calculation, it is left open for the circuit court to act upon it. The first lien upon the property is the trust deed of the said building and loan association, which is not yet due and payable; the second, the mechanic's lien; the third, the judgment of petitioner, Woods (being a judgment many months prior to the judgment of plaintiff); and the fourth is plaintiff's judgment. For the reasons herein given, said decree of March 13, 1897, is affirmed, except as to that part of the decree which holds that the land embraced in the deed mentioned is liable to be sold to satisfy said debts, without qualification, but the same is so modified as to hold that the said land is liable to be sold subject to the trust deed of said building and loan association; and the decree of December 4, 1897, is reversed and set aside, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Tucker county, with directions to enter a decree of sale of the said property in accordance with the principles herein stated.

BAER et al. v. FORBES et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. June 12, 1900.)

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—"HEIRS."

1. It is an ancient rule of construction that the heir is not to be disinherited without an express devise or by necessary implication; such implication importing, not natural necessity, but so strong a probability that an intention to the contrary cannot be supposed.

2. The word "heirs" is a legal term having a definite meaning, and expresses the relation of persons to a deceased ancestor, and not a living, according to the maxim, "Nemo est hæres viventis."

3. It is a rule in the interpretation of wills that the testator is presumed to use technical words in their strict technical sense, unless there is something in the context indicating that he has used them in a different sense.

4. A testator devises his real estate to his wife during her life, and adds, "At the death of my wife all the property to go to my daughter, Isabella Mathews Baer, for the benefit of her heirs." The daughter, surviving the life tenant, takes the property in fee simple under the will.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Marshall county; Joseph P. Paull, Judge.

Suit by James M. Baer and others, by their next friend, against Hannibal Forbes and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Riley & Ritz, for appellants. Caldwell & Caldwell and J. Howard Holt, for appellees.

McWHORTER, P. James Mathews made the following will: "Being in feeble health, but sound in mind, I do hereby bequeath to my wife, Nancy Mathews, the following described property, viz.: Lot No. 4, North Wheeling, McClure's addition, on which is one two-story brick house containing seven rooms; lot No. 5, same addition, upon which is two-story frame house; lot No. 6, same addition, upon which is two-story frame house; likewise a farm in Webster township, Marshall Co., West Va., containing two hundred and fifty acres, more or less. My wife, Nancy, to be full heir to this property during her life, and to have full control of the income arising therefrom. I likewise authorize her to sell sufficient amount of said property to pay any debts I may now owe. At the death of my wife all the property to go to my daughter, Isabella Mathews Baer, for the benefit of her heirs. I declare this to be my last will and testament,"—which was duly probated in the office of the recorder of the county of Marshall on the 20th day of September, 1871. Mathews left surviving him his wife, Nancy, and his daughter, Isabella, then the wife of John Baer, and the mother of three children. She afterwards intermarried with H. F. Sinclair, by whom she had two children. Nancy, on the 15th of June, 1874, conveyed the tract of 250 acres to said Isabella, who in September of the same year conveyed the same to Luke McDermott, who executed a deed of trust conveying the same to Henry M. Russell, trustee, to secure a large part of the purchase money to said Isabella. Said trustee sold the same under the deed of trust, which was purchased by Hannibal Forbes, and conveyed to him by said trustee. On the 2d day of March, 1874, said Nancy, in her own right and as executrix of James Mathews and Isabella, conveyed the said Wheeling property, lots 4, 5, and 6, to Christian Gleasner, in consideration of $4,300. The children of Isabella, James Mathews Baer, Anna M. Baer, and Amelia Baer Jay, and Joseph Henry Sinclair and Frank Sinclair, infants, by their next friend, John R. Loomis, filed their bill in the circuit court of Marshall county against Hannibal Forbes, Luke McDermott, Christian Gleasner, and Isabella Sinclair, claiming the sole right to said property under the will of their grandfather James Mathews; that said Isabella was simply a trustee under said will for the benefit of the plaintiffs; that by the deeds she executed she conveyed no interest whatever in the property to said McDermott and Gleasner, and that by said pretended deeds and conveyances, and delivering possession and control of said property to defendants Forbes, McDermott, and Gleasner, said Isabella violated and abused her trust; and that since the death of Nancy Mathews she has still allowed said defendants to keep and hold the possession of said property, and rents, issues, and profits thereof, and she has not in any manner accounted to plaintiffs, or any of them, for such rents, issues, and profits, and that she should be required to account for the same since the death of her mother, Nancy; and that the pretended deeds executed by her to said defendants should be set aside and held for naught; and that said trustee Isabella should be removed or required to properly execute her trust under the provisions of the said will; and that, under the facts and circumstances set out in the bill, said will should be interpreted and construed defining the rights and interests of plaintiffs, and each of them, in and to the property devised; and prayed for relief according to the allegations of the bill, and for general relief. On the 12th of March, 1898, the defendants Forbes and McDermott filed their demurrer, and defendant Gleasner filed his demurrer and answer, in which demurrers plaintiffs joined, and the same were argued, and the court took time to consider of said demurrers; and on the 14th day of June, 1898, the court, having maturely considered the same, sustained said demurrers, and, the plaintiffs not desiring to further amend their bill, the same was dismissed, and judgment for defendants' costs. The plaintiffs appeal, and say the court erred in holding that plaintiffs have no interest in the property of question is as to the intention of the r in the use of the words, "At the of my wife all the property to go to ughter, Isabella Mathews Baer, for nefit of her heirs." It is earnestly led by appellants that Isabella, their , took nothing under the will for her- ut that she is simply a trustee, hold- ely and only for their benefit. It must ne in mind that Isabella was the only he sole heir at law, of her father. If nts' contention is correct, then the ild, the sole heir at law, is disinherited will of her father. "It is an ancient construction that the heir is not to be rited without an express devise or by ry implication; such implication im- , not natural necessity, but so strong ability that an intention to the con- cannot be supposed." Beach, Wills, Jarm. Wills, § 326; 29 Am. & Eng. aw, 352; Bender v. Dietrick, 7 Watts 7. In Graham v. Graham, 28 W. Va. is held (Syl., points 1, 2): "The heir t be disinherited unless it be done by terms of the will, or by necessary tion;" and, "the heir being favored there should be no strained construc- work a disherison when the words of l are ambiguous."

llants insist that no estate passed by nguage of the will to the daughter, , but that she was named as a mere to hold the legal title to the property benefit of her children. What was ention of the testator in the disposition property is the first matter to ascer- d then, as stated in Ewing v. Winters, Va. 23, 11 S. E. 718, "we are to inquire r that intention can be effectuated t violating or infringing upon any ttled and inexorable rule of construc- retofore recognized and established." ffs in their bill allege "that at the id will was executed, and long before, til the time of his death, the said John he first husband of the defendant Is- M. Sinclair, drank to excess, and was s and careless in the management of ncial affairs, and in fact would spend money he was able to produce from ult of his labors or from others; and e said James Mathews, the testator, ware and knew, at the time of the ex- of said will, of the habits of said aer, and his disposition to spend mon- knew that he had great control and ce over his wife, the defendant Isa- . Baer, now Sinclair; and the testator ew, at the time of the making and ex- of said will, that if he devise his y in fee to his daughter, or dispose a manner in which she, and through said John Baer, could get control of ne, that he would have expended the of his estate in a very short time." If these facts were all shown to be true, the tendency would be not to induce the testator to entirely disinherit his only child, who had been so unfortunate in her marriage, but would naturally make him more solicitous for her welfare in making disposition of his property. If the testator's purpose had been to guard against his reckless, drunken son-in-law, instead of placing the property in the hands of his daughter as trustee without bond or security, where the husband could have managed it without let or hindrance, if he had the influence over his wife as claimed, he would have placed it in the hands of some reliable person, who could not be influenced by him.

But to what extent can we consider these facts and circumstances, if they exist? In Barber v. Railroad Co., 166 U. S. 83, 17 Sup. Ct. 488, 41 L. Ed. 925, at page 109, 166 U. S., page 495, 17 Sup. Ct., and page 936, 41 L. Ed., Justice Gray in the opinion of the court says: "Evidence of extrinsic circumstances, such as the testator's relation to persons, or the amount and condition of his estate, may be admitted to explain ambiguities of description in the will, but never to control the construction or extent of devises therein contained." Couch v. Eastham, 29 W. Va. 784, 3 S. E. 23; Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68, 8 L. Ed. 322. It is contended by appellants that plaintiffs took under the will at the date of the death of Nancy Mathews, the life tenant; "that there are three periods at which they might take, namely, at the death of the testator, at the death of the life tenant, the wife, or at the death of the daughter; but we think the language of the will controls, and that is, 'At the death of my wife all the property to go,' etc. Therefore the heirs of the daughter, Isabella M. Baer, are her children living at the time of the death of the life tenant, Nancy Mathews;" and appellants cite authorities on the construction of the word "heirs," and the application of the word in speaking of the heirs of persons living, to sustain the right of plaintiffs to maintain their suit. They first invoke the case of Reid v. Stuart, 13 W. Va. 338. In that case, at page 348, Judge Green in the court's opinion says: "If the devise is a present one, to take effect immediately, and it is made to the heirs of a person known to the testator to be living, it is reasonable to construe it as intended as a devise to the children or heirs apparent; for if the testator did not mean, by the word 'heirs,' heirs apparent, then his devise could not possibly take effect immediately, and yet this is the expressed purpose of the testator. But this reasoning has no application when the devise to the heirs is not present or immediate, but is the limitation of a future estate, after some preceding estate. There is no necessity to construe the word 'heirs' as meaning heirs apparent in such a case to effect the expressed purposes of the testator. The strict legal signification may in such cases be attached to the word 'heirs,' and yet the purposes expressed by the testator be fully carried out; for the estate devised to the heirs is not intended to vest, or come into possession, till the termination of some present estate created by the same will, and, giving to the word 'heirs' its usual legal signification, the testator's will is not, as in the other case, necessarily defeated; for, though the party whose heirs are given such future estate be living, yet he may die before the particular estate ends, and must die at some time, and his heirs will then be in existence to receive the future estate intended by the will to be devised to them, to take effect at a future time." Also the case of Stuart v. Stuart, 18 W. Va. 675, is cited, also written by Judge Green. Syl., point 2, is as follows: "The rule construing the word 'heirs' used in a will in respect to living persons as merely designatio personarum is inapplicable to a devise of a future estate; such construction not being necessary in order to give effect to any clearly-expressed intention of the testator. In such case the word 'heirs' has its strict legal meaning, and means the parties who would on the death of the propositus inherit his real estate, and they take the real estate devised in the same proportions as such persons would as heirs."

This was not in any case a devise of an immediate estate in possession for the benefit of the heirs of Isabella Baer, but a devise of a future estate to her heirs, limited upon a preceding estate for life in Nancy Mathews. Therefore the word "heirs" must have its technical meaning, as held in Campbell v. Rawdon, 18 N. Y. 412, cited by appellants: "The rule construing the word 'heirs' used in a will in respect to a living person as merely designatio personarum is inapplicable to the devise of a future estate. In such case the word has its strict legal meaning, and carries the inheritance, unless a different intention appears clearly from the context." It is further said in Stuart v. Stuart, supra: "The word 'heirs' is a word of well-known legal signification, and when used in a will it ought to be given this strict legal meaning, unless from the context it clearly appears that it was used by the testator in a different sense. An instance where the courts have given to the word 'heirs' another meaning than its strict technical and well-known meaning is where a testator by his will makes a present and immediate devise to the heirs of a person known to be living, or where the devise is to heirs said in the will to be living. In such case it is apparent that the word 'heirs' must mean heirs apparent or children, and that without violating the clear intention of the testator it cannot be construed as used in its ordinary legal signification;" and citing James v. Richardson, 1 Vent. 334, Jones, 99, 3 Keb. 832; Burchett v. Durdant, 2 Vent. 311; Goodright v. White, W. Bl. 1010; Campbell v. Rawdon, 18 N. Y. 416; Conklin v. Conklin, 3 Sandf. Ch. 64. In Cushman v. Horton, 59 N. Y. 149 (Syl., point 1): "When the word 'heirs' is used in a will to point out legatees, the primary legal meaning of the word will be given it, unless the context shows the testator used it in a different sense; the question will not be determined on mere conjecture;" and in that case in the opinion it is said: "The word 'heirs' is a legal term, having a definite meaning, and expresses the relation of persons to a deceased ancestor, and not a living, according to the maxim, 'Nemo est hæres viventis.' Its primary import relates to the succession of real property,"—clearly recognizing the distinction between a devise to a living person's heirs, which is to take effect immediately on the death of the testator, and a devise of a future interest after a previous life estate; and Reid v. Stuart, above cited, holds that in the latter case the word "heirs" does not mean "children," but takes its primary technical meaning. 1 Greenl. Cruise, Real Prop. tit. 16, "Remainder," c. 4, §§ 19, 20. In Wallace v. Minor, 86 Va. 550 (Syl., point 2) 10 S. E. 428: "The word 'heir' has a well-known technical meaning. Technical words are prima facie to be taken in their legal sense, unless from the contents of the will it plainly appears that testator intended to use them in a different sense." In Allen v. Henderson, 49 Pa. St. 333, a testator gave to his "daughter E., in trust for her heirs until they are twenty-one years old, until which time she is to have the income arising therefrom for her support, and the support and education of her heirs, and, should she die leaving no heirs of her body, then said properties to revert to her brothers and their heirs." This was a devise to take effect in præsenti, and not in futuro. Yet the court says in the opinion: "And, notwithstanding the trust that is expressed, can it be doubted that an interest was intended to vest in her? The trust was an impossible one. She could not be trustee for her heirs. 'Nam nemo est hæres viventis.'" The court held "that the trust failed, and the devisee took an estate in fee tail, which by the act of April 27, 1855, became enlarged into a fee simple." As very pertinently suggested by appellees' counsel, suppose the testator had left out the name of Isabella Baer entirely, and made the devise to some one else, "for the benefit of Isabella's heirs," the trust must have failed for want of a cestui que trust. There is nothing in the other parts of the will that will throw light upon the question. By inserting the words "and her" between the words "her" and "heirs," so that it would read, "for the benefit of her and her heirs," the evident intention of the testator would be made clear, if, indeed, it is not sufficiently plain as it stands in the will. The decree of the circuit court sustaining the demurrer is affirmed.

WILSON v. BRADEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. June 12, 1900.)

FOREIGN JUDGMENT — EFFECT — REALTY — TRANSFER OF TITLE — EJECTMENT — EVIDENCE—ADVERSE POSSESSION—VERDICT.

1. A judgment or decree of a court of another state has no effect to pass title to or affect land in this state, nor can a sale or conveyance under it by a trustee or commissioner appointed by it do so.

2. A trustee appointed or substituted by a court of another state has no power as such to convey land in this state.

3. When a conveyance of land made by a special commissioner under a sale under a decree of a court is offered in evidence to pass title, it must be accompanied by either the whole record of the cause, or enough to show that the parties holding title affected by the deed, and also the land itself, were before the court, and that it was decreed to be sold, and was sold, and the sale confirmed by the court, and that authority was given by the decree to the commissioner to make the conveyance. The recital in the deed of these important facts is no evidence of them, against strangers to the deed, contesting its effect.

4. An outstanding title in a third person, in order to defeat the plaintiff's recovery in ejectment, must be a present, subsisting, legal title, not one barred by the statute of limitations, abandoned or otherwise lost. It must be one which the party owning it could now assert. The burden is on the defendant to show the present validity of such title.

5. One who is in actual possession of land, and sued in ejectment, cannot defeat recovery by showing that before the action he had conveyed his title to another.

6. Where there is an interlock between two tracts of land claimed under different titles, the possession under the junior claim outside the interlock does not give that claim possession of the interlock; but, if the junior claimant is in actual possession within the interlock, he has possession of the whole interlock, and the statute of limitations runs in his favor against the older title, if the claimant under the older title, though in actual possession of his tract, is not in actual possession inside of the interlock. If the claimant under the older title is in actual possession within the interlock, that possession extends to the whole interlock, except where the junior claimant is also in actual possession within the interlock, and then the possession of the junior claimant is limited to his inclosure, and the possession of the owner of the older title covers the residue of the interlock. The actual possession under the older title anywhere within its bounds gives actual possession of the whole tract, including the interlock, unless the adverse claimant is in actual possession of the interlock.

7. In ejectment, when a part of the land claimed in the declaration is found for the plaintiff, and a part for the defendant, the verdict must specify and describe the parts found for each by some method of description reasonably definite, such as is required of a declaration in that action.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to circuit court, Ritchie county; R. H. Freer, Judge.

Action by Henry S. Wilson against George W. Braden and John Deem. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Ayers & Ireland and W. N. Miller, for plaintiff in error. Freer, Robinson & Pierpoint and P. W. Morris, for defendants in error.

BRANNON, J. Henry S. Wilson brought an action of ejectment in Ritchie county circuit court against George W. Braden and John Deem, resulting in a judgment for defendants. Wilson claimed under a patent to Tilton, dated August 4, 1785. Braden and Deem defended under a patent to Dorsey Pentecost, Samuel Purviance, and Robert Purviance, dated October 15, 1784, and two patents, dated September 1, 1860, to Purviance and Williams as trustees for the estates of Robert and Samuel Purviance, and under possession. In order to connect with the older patent, of 1784, Braden gave in evidence a certain record of proceedings in the circuit court of Baltimore, Md. It showed a petition appearing to be an application in 1787 by Samuel Purviance for discharge as an insolvent upon surrender of his estate. It is purely ex parte, without process to any one. This land is not mentioned in the list of assets. This part of the record has no relevancy to the case, and is so indefinite that I should not have mentioned it as pertinent to the case. It appears from other parts of that record that James M. Camp, as special commissioner, acting under a decree of the circuit court of Augusta county, Va., in a case therein in 1838, directing certain land of Samuel and Robert Purviance to be sold, conveyed the land to Donaldson as trustee for creditors of said Purviances. How Donaldson became trustee does not appear. He resigned in the Baltimore court, and Williams was made trustee in his place, and he conveyed land to parties from whom the defendants purchased. The deed from Williams gives as his only authority for acting his appointment by the Baltimore court. This record does not suggest how the West Virginia land got into the hands of Donaldson, trustee. It does not appear that it was at all a subject-matter before the court in a suit, or in any wise calling for its action, and the court never assumed to pass any decree for its sale, or directing the trustee to convey. It only substituted Williams as trustee in place of Donaldson. The proceeding was wholly ex parte. No parties appear from the record. How, then, could it operate upon any parties? But, even if the court had the land and parties before it, that Maryland court could not itself sell, or by a commissioner, trustee, or other agent sell, land in Virginia, as no state can give its laws force outside of its territory; nor can the decrees of its courts operate upon land outside of it. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 722, 24 L. Ed. 565. As Judge Moncure said in Dickinson v. Hoomes' Adm'r, 8 Grat. 410: "It is undoubtedly true that real estate or immovable property is exclusively subject to the laws of the government in whose territory it is situated, and no writ of sequestration or execution, or any order, judgment, or decree of a foreign court, can be enforced against it." "In respect to immovable property, every attempt of a foreign tribunal to found a jurisdiction over it must be nugatory, and its decree must be forever incapable of execution in rem." Story, Confl. Laws, § 551; 1 Rob. Prac. 336. It is true that, if a court of one state or foreign country has a person before it subject to its jurisdiction, it may, by action direct upon him, affect property in another state or country by operating on the person, by compelling him to make a personal conveyance of the land there, or do any act which of itself, without regard to the decree, would affect the land according to the lex rei sitæ; but the cases so holding admit that the decree, in and of itself, does not affect the foreign property, but affects it only indirectly, by operating in personam to compel a transfer according to the decree, and that the courts of the state where the land is located may disregard the decree. If the conveyance is made pursuant to the decree, it is that, not the decree, which passes title. Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 160, 3 L. Ed. 181; Farley v. Shippen, Wythe, 135; Guerrant v. Fowler, 1 Hen. & M. 5; Dickenson v. Hoomes' Adm'r, 8 Grat. 410. If even this Maryland court had decreed a sale, or directed a commissioner to execute a deed (but it did not), it would pass no title. "A Virginia court has no jurisdiction over land in another state, and cannot by its order of sale or decree, or by deed of commissioners, merely as such, pass the title to such land. McLawrin v. Salmons, 11 B. Mon. 96. The court of one state has no power over land in another, except through the person of its owner. It cannot act for him in making a conveyance through a mere commissioner, but it may compel the owner himself to convey the land, and such conveyance will be as effectual in another state as if made at his own mere will." 1 Rob. Prac. 342. "A court of chancery, acting in personam, may well decree the conveyance of land in another state, and may enforce the decree by process against the defendant. But neither the decree itself, nor any conveyance under it, except by the person in whom the title is vested, can operate beyond the jurisdiction of the court." Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 26, 10 L. Ed. 873. Now, the court allowed this record to go in evidence to the jury for general purposes in the case. The jury might well have taken it as proving that defendants had the title conferred by the older grant, of 1784. That it was so used is shown by defendants' instruction No. 4: "If the jury believe from the evidence that defendant George Braden, or those through whom he claims, had or have the senior patent to the land in controversy, and the better and stronger title, and neither plaintiff nor defendant had any actual, open, notorious, visible, hostile, exclusive possession to the other, then the jury must find for the defendant George Braden." Thus Braden relied upon superior title under that senior patent, without regard to possession, and used that Baltimore record to connect himself with it, when it did not do so. We can imagine nothing more hurtful to the plaintiff's cause. Its use was not restricted to show color of title. It was not admissible for that purpose, even, nor necessary, as the defendant could use his mere deed and the junior patents for that purpose. Again, in this record is a deed made by Camp, as commissioner, under a decree of a Virginia court, conveying land to Donaldson as trustee. If Donaldson had any title, he got it by this deed, but not a letter of authority in Camp to make this deed is shown. The decree giving Camp power to convey does not appear. Not an item of the Virginia record was produced. This was essential to give any effect whatever to that deed. You must give in evidence, as a general rule, in such case, the whole record, but surely enough to show that the party holding the title to the land and the land were before the court; that that land was decreed to be sold, and was sold, and the sale confirmed, and authority given by decree to the commissioner to convey. That commissioner does not own the land. He has a mere naked authority, uncoupled with any personal interest. His authority to make the very deed for the very land he conveys must appear by the record. This has been so often held. Waggoner v. Wolf, 28 W. Va. 820. The recital in that deed of Camp's authority under decree is no evidence against third parties claiming adversely to it, and denying his authority to convey. Walton v. Hale, 9 Grat. 198. Yet this deed went in evidence for Braden to show title, to connect Braden with the old patent, and was used by the jury as such in connection with said instruction. That deed did not show title. It did not connect Braden with the patent of 1784. Braden's instruction No. 4, quoted above, was improperly given, because not pertinent to the case; no connection being shown by him with the senior patent, to enable him to stand on senior title.

Braden's instruction No. 5 was improper, as given in this case, because it puts as an element in its theory that the Purviances entered into actual possession under the patent of 1784, when no evidence showed that fact. It is also wrong in stating that Braden's possession would be referred back to that patent, when no evidence connected him with it.

Braden's instruction No. 7 is bad. It says that, even if plaintiff had possession until 1879 or 1883, yet, if thereafter Braden had adverse possession, the jury must find for Braden. Now, plaintiff claimed that under the evidence such possession as Braden had was obtained from Bradley, a tenant under the plaintiff's title, and that this fact made Braden a tenant of the plaintiff, so that he could not hold adversely to him. If such he fact, Braden's possession would be plaintiff's possession, not adverse to the ntiff, and could not ripen into title. Al- v. Bartlett, 20 W. Va. 46; Emerick v. ener, 9 Grat. 224. If, as assumed in the ruction, plaintiff had possession for the ntory period, that gave him title by pos- ion, though he had not superior title; even if the land was thereafter unoccu- , the plaintiff's title having thus become l by time, Braden could not devest it out he plaintiff, except by adverse posses- for 10 years. Industrial Co. v. Schultz, V. Va. 483, 27 S. E. 255. This instruction the jury that, if Braden had actual ad- e possession, the verdict must be for den; ignoring the question whether Bra- obtained possession from a tenant under plaintiff's title, thus discharging the jury n passing on that question. This is er- as often decided. Woodell v. Improve- t Co., 38 W. Va. 23, 17 S. E. 386. It is leading for a court, among a confusing ber of instructions, to give one taking certain facts; telling the jury that, if exist, the verdict must inevitably be a party, when there is evidence present- other questions of fact, which, if exist- militate against the facts stated, and y them the legal effect given by the in- ction. Braden says, "I obtained adverse session, and held long enough to give me ." The instruction then says, "If this o, the jury must find for Braden," when e stood Wilson, saying: "I grant that, stood alone; but Braden got his pos- ion from my tenant, and, though he calls possession adverse, it is not. He is my nt still." But his question is not put the jury in this important instruction. er instructions may put it, but each in- ction that turns only on one question, ed a "binding instruction," should put theories touching it, else it may mis- the jury. The question of how the pos- ion was derived was a material one in den's case, because upon it turned the stion whether such possession was ad- e or not.

eem's instruction No. 8 is bad. It says in ejectment, involving title to land, plaintiff must recover on the strength is own title, not on the weakness of his ersary's title, and that the "defendant defeat plaintiff by even showing an out- ding title in another, although the de- dant may have no title in himself." does not state the proposition as the rts uniformly state it. To enable a de- dant to defeat a plaintiff showing better than he shows, a defendant should not at the plaintiff merely because at some some one else had a superior title, when defendant has no connection with it, un- the outstanding title is "a present, sub- ng, operative, legal title, on which the er could recover if asserting it in an ac- . It is not for the plaintiff to disprove its validity." Industrial Co. v. Schultz, 43 W. Va. 470, 27 S. E. 255. There this subject is discussed. I add to the authorities there given Jackson v. Hudson, 3 Johns. 375, 3 Am. Dec. 500; McDonald v. Schneider, 27 Mo. 405; Peck v. Carmichael, 9 Yerg. 325. The last case holds that "an outstanding title, to bar recovery in ejectment, must be a present, subsisting, legal title, not one abandoned or barred by the act of limitations." This instruction omitted an important element of a legal proposition as stated by the courts. It failed to call on the jury to say whether the patent of 1784 was yet a live, good, superior title. Was it forfeited or sold for taxes, so that the plaintiff got it? Was it lost by possession under plaintiff's title,—the patent of 1785? Some evidence of plaintiff would tend to show this, yet the instruction does not call attention to this important matter under this legal proposition. It does not state the law correctly. Under it any title once good, but now lost, might be used. If a defendant comes into court, and for plea says that the plaintiff ought not to have and maintain his action because another title in some stranger is better than the plaintiff's title, should he not, in justice, be required to show it? He holds the affirmative on that point, and must he not show, not merely that there once was, but also that there yet is, such superior title? This instruction was plainly material and hurtful to the plaintiff. If this instruction was intended to apply to show title under Mrs. Deem's claim, it is improper in the case, first, because it was later in birth and inferior to the plaintiff's title. Deem showed no connection with the patent of 1784. He introduced a deed from Camp, as commissioner, to Webb, made under a decree of the circuit court of Augusta county, but introduced no record to authorize that deed, as shown above as to the deed from Camp introduced by Braden. It made no connection between Deem and the old patent. Deem's right, being thus junior to that of the plaintiff, must be shown to have become good by possession, and that would not require such instruction. Such title would not be an outstanding title in a third person, as that was the title under which Deem justified. In this view, the instruction was irrelevant.

Deem introduced a deed from Dilworth to himself, and followed this up with other documents to show that Deem conveyed the land to Clammer, and Clammer conveyed to Hester Deem, wife of defendant John Deem, and that she conveyed to Mary C. Braden. The effort was to show that the title was outstanding in Mary C. Braden, or that John Deem had no longer any title at the commencement of the action. The deed from Hester A. Deem is void, because the husband did not join in it, and this left the title in her; and presumably she and her husband were living on the land,—he, the head of the family, in possession. But I do not mention this as very material. If Deem expected to defend because his title had, before suit, been passed away, he could not do so, if in possession at the beginning of the suit; for the Code allows the person in possession to be sued. He represents his own title, or that of another under whom he claims, for the purposes of the suit. He is occupant detaining against the supposed rightful title, and, as between him and its claimant, he may be sued, and, if in the wrong, ejected. In view of this defense by Deem, Wilson asked the court (which refused) to instruct that Deem having employed counsel and defended the action, and given evidence that he was occupying and farming part of the land in controversy, it was no defense for him to show that before the suit he had conveyed the land away. It was error to refuse that instruction, for reasons above stated. Also, if Deem did not want to defend, why did he not enter a disclaimer? Why not surrender? As stated by Judge Green in Beckwith v. Thompson, 18 W. Va. 135, if he claimed no interest a verdict against him would take nothing from him but costs. He did not disclaim, but made full defense, and, being in possession, he could not defend on the score that he had parted with title before suit.

Deem's instruction No. 9, telling the jury that possession under the deed from Dilworth to Deem for the statute period would call for a verdict for Deem, is bad, in not saying that such possession under the Dilworth deed must be within the interlock, if Wilson was in possession of any part of his land, because, that being the older title shown, possession anywhere under it gave possession over the interlock, unless Deem had possession inside that interlock. Deem's instruction No. 10 is open to the same objection. These instructions do not have regard to that land in controversy,—the interlock.

Deem's instruction 12 is bad. It says that if Dilworth, who conveyed to Deem the land claimed by Deem, by deed dated November 1, 1872, had possession for more than 10 years before the time when the vendors of Wilson commenced operations of mining on their land, and that if Deem and his vendees had possession after November 1, 1872, then no act of vendors of Wilson could put plaintiff in possession of the land. Very indefinite. What does it mean? It is error to give an instruction that may not readily be understood by the jury. It bewilders, and may mislead. Dilworth had actual possession, say. The subsequent operations of Wilson's vendors, it is said, could not put Wilson's vendors in possession of the land in controversy. That depends. It was a question whether the Dilworth deed covered any of the land of the plaintiff. If it did not, the instruction would not be proper. There would be then no clash, and the possession of Dilworth and Wilson's vendors would have no bearing on each other. This instruction assumes or predicates its law upon the theory that the land of Wilson and that of Dilworth interlock. An instruction must not assume a controverted fact, and give a legal result therefrom. If the tracts do interlock, the instruction puts bad law. If Dilworth had first actual possession outside of the interlock, the Wilson title appearing older, Dilworth's possession would not include the interlock; but, if Dilworth had actual possession inside the interlock, then possession by Wilson's vendors, taken afterwards, or any time, not inside the interlock, would not displace Dilworth's possession in it. The instruction should have stated that if Dilworth's land covered any part of the land in controversy, and if his possession was inside the interlock, then the operations of Wilson's vendors would not change the right of Dilworth, or put plaintiff's vendors in possession of the land in controversy. If Dilworth did not have actual possession inside the interlock, then, when the owners of the Wilson title took possession, it gave them actual possession of that interlock, their title being senior. If the junior claimant has actual possession within an interlock, he has possession of the whole interlock, unless the senior claimant has also actual possession within the interlock; and in such case the possession of the junior claimant is limited to his inclosure, while the residue of the interlock is in the possession of the senior claimant. Garrett v. Ramsey, 26 W. Va. 345. This instruction may also be said to assume that Dilworth's possession was within the interlock,—a vital point,—and, if so, that is the objection to it; and, if it does not so assume, then it simply says that if Dilworth had possession, no matter whether inside or outside the interlock, the subsequent possession under the Wilson title would have no effect in limiting Dilworth's possession, but that, wherever it was, it would give title to the land in controversy, whereas such possession outside the interlock would not in any time give title.

Deem's instruction No. 13 touching the effect of the conveyance by Deem of the land before suit, is bad, for reasons above given. These conveyances, being younger, could show no outstanding, superior title. It was error to admit those deeds. They had nothing to do with the case.

I see no objection to the other instructions.

Another point of error made by Wilson's counsel is this: Wilson sued for a boundary of 2,500 acres. Braden claimed only 50 acres; Deem, 236 acres. The verdict was general for the defendants; not specifying the parts which the defendants claimed, nor saving to the plaintiff any part of the 2,500 acres. Wilson says there was no pretense, even, that he did not own the balance of the boundary, and that his claim was good to such balance, and that in any view the verdict should have specified the particular land the defendants were entitled to, and what s entitled to. Is this error? We think and that because of this defect the ent should have been arrested, and a trial granted. No proper judgment be given on such a verdict. Wilson for 2,500 acres, and the defendants not ng all of it, but parts, they should have med to all the land in the declaration bed, except those parts. That would reduced the controversy to those parts. did not do this, but pleaded not guilty all. This plea admits that the party g it is in possession of all the land or. 7 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 341, 342, citing . Strode, 13 Pa. St. 433; Hill v. Hill, . St. 521; James v. Brooke, 6 Heisk. Gibson v. Bank, 69 Me. 579. Beckwith mpson, 18 W. Va. 103, holds that this ispenses with proof that defendant was session of the land claimed, and calls plaintiff only to prove his right to pos-n,—his title. Thus, it holds logically he plea admits defendant's possession. by law, this general plea of not guilty, t disclaimer as to any part of the land, ithout being not guilty as to a particu-rt, admits the defendant to be in pos-n of all,—imports a claim to all; and, if rdict and judgment be for the defend-hey import that defendant has better o all the land, and would be res judi-gainst the plaintiff as to all the land, as I think he would be entitled to do, ld show that in fact the controversy nly as to a particular part. But years ards the defendant, from perishment dence, may be unable to show this, and clear right to demand that the record so speak and stand as a perpetual rial of what was actually tried and This seems very plain. It may be e practice is not uniform in this matter erent sections of the state. In some it is not observed. There ought to be l rule. Low v. Settle, 22 W. Va. 387, as this position. It held a verdict fa-lefective because it found that the de-t was entitled to hold a specified part land described in the declaration, and e had no title to any other land de-l in it, but did not find that the plain-as entitled to recover the residue, and re failed to find whether the defend-as entitled to hold that residue or not. f that verdict was bad, what shall be this one? That found for the defend-specific part, and that he had no claim balance, whereas in this case the ver-ecified no parts which the defendants ntitled to hold, but implied that they ntitled to all the land, and the plaintiff e. The verdict in this case is much ulnerable than the one in that case. , our Code brands this verdict. Chap-§ 23, says that, if the plaintiffs es-their right, "the verdict shall be for intiffs, or such of them as appear to ight to the possession of the premises, or any part thereof." This obviously means that, if a part only is recovered, that part shall be specified. That is the case here, as was really intended by the jury. Section 25 says that, "when the right of the plaintiff is proved to all the premises claimed, the verdict shall be for the premises generally, as specified in the declaration; but if it be proved to only a part or share of the premises, the verdict shall specify such part particularly, as the same is proved, and with the same certainty of description as is required in the declaration." These provisions mean that, when the plaintiff recovers all he claims, the verdict may be general; and, if the defendants hold all, it is general, but when the defendants hold a part the verdict should specify what parts they hold, and what part the plaintiff holds. If the defendants have separate parts, each should be specified. In Reynolds v. Cook, 83 Va. 817, 3 S. E. 710, the declaration claimed an entire tract, and the defendant claimed only a right to quarry limestone from it, and the verdict was general for the defendant; and the court reversed the judgment, saying that the verdict should have been for the plaintiff, except as to the right to quarry and remove limestone. It cited a section of the statute, the same as section 18 in chapter 90 of our Code: "The plaintiff may recover any specific or any undivided part or share of the premises, though less than he claimed in the declaration." The court said (and the same is here applicable) that "the verdict and judgment would conclude the plaintiff and his privies as to the title and right of possession established in such action as to the whole tract; for the statute in express terms enacts that 'any such judgment in an action of ejectment * * * shall be conclusive as to the title or right of possession established in such action upon the party against whom it is rendered,' "—the same, for our purpose, as section 35, c. 90, Code 1891. Callis v. Kemp, 11 Grat. 78, and Slocum v. Compton, 93 Va. 374, 25 S. E. 3, say that, where less land is recovered than demanded, the part should be described; and this is the same as to say that, when the evidence shows that plaintiff and defendant are each entitled to hold part of the land, each part should be described in the verdict. For this strong reason the motion to set aside the verdict should not have been overruled. Therefore we reverse the judgment, set aside the verdict, and grant the plaintiff a new trial.

MONTGOMERY v. COMMONWEALTH.

ASSAULT—TRESPASS—ATTACK BY OWNER—INDICTMENT—INCLUDED OFFENSE.

1. Where defendant committed a technical trespass on prosecutor's land, such fact did not authorize prosecutor to assault defendant with a deadly weapon to compel him to leave, and hence defendant was entitled to defend such assault without himself being guilty of assault.

2. Where the evidence, in a prosecution for malicious assault with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, or kill, failed to prove a malicious cutting or wounding with intent to maim as charged in the indictment, the defendant was not entitled to acquittal by reason of such fact, since under Code, § 4040, he might have been convicted of a simple assault.

Error to circuit court, Rockbridge county.

One Montgomery was convicted of a felonious assault, and brings error. Reversed.

Hugh A. White, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

HARRISON, J. The prisoner was indicted in the county court of Rockbridge county for felonious assault with intent to maim, disfigure, disable, and kill William E. Davidson. He was found guilty, and sentenced, in accordance with the verdict, to confinement in the penitentiary for a term of four years.

Upon petition for a writ of error and supersedeas, the circuit court of Rockbridge having refused to grant a new trial, the case is now before this court for review.

The salient facts established by the commonwealth are as follows: The prisoner went upon the lands of Davidson for the purpose of selling a gun to Reed Tyler, one of the hands on the place. While in conversation with Tyler and John Randolph, a tenant on the premises, Davidson, who was riding by, was called up by Randolph, who said to him: "Here is a man who says he is going to hunt anyhow." Davidson then told the prisoner that he could not hunt; that the land was posted to white and black. The prisoner replied that he was not hunting, but that he had seen no notices of posting, and if he had seen anything would have shot at it. Davidson then asked the prisoner what business he had, and was told that he had come to sell his gun, and that Reed Tyler had bought it. Davidson said, "If you have transacted your business, you must leave," and motioned his hand to him to go. The prisoner replied that he would go when he got ready. Davidson then dismounted, and started towards the prisoner, saying, "I will see about that." The prisoner, with his gun in hand, stepped back some 10 or 15 feet, saying, "If you hurt me, I'll shoot you, damn you." Davidson picked up a corn cutter recently ground and sharp, ran to the prisoner, and they clinched. In the scuffle the gun was discharged in the air, and Davidson received, it does not clearly appear how, a cut and some abrasions on the head. They fell to the ground, Davidson on top. After some scuffle, the prisoner cried, "Take him off," and they were separated. Davidson was not laid up by his wounds, and was "all right," as stated by his physician, at the time of the trial, which was within six weeks from the date of the affray.

The first error assigned is the action of the court in refusing certain instructions asked for by the prisoner, and giving of its own motion in lieu thereof the following:

"The court instructs the jury that W. E. Davidson had the right to require the accused to leave his premises, and that, if the accused refused to leave when so requested, the said Davidson had the right to use such force as was necessary to eject him from his premises."

The theory of the prosecution is that the prisoner, having refused to leave immediately upon being ordered to do so, thereby became a trespasser, and as such Davidson had a right to use any force necessary to remove him, even to the extent of assaulting him with a deadly weapon.

The prisoner contends that, if he was a trespasser at all, the trespass was of the most trivial character, as he was neither doing or threatening to do any harm to Davidson or his property, and that his act did not justify the assault made upon him with a deadly weapon, and that he had a right to defend himself from such assault.

The instruction as given contains the general rule, which is sound as an abstract proposition, that every man has the right to defend his person or property, but it ignores the well-settled and important modification of the rule that in defense of person or property one cannot, except in extreme cases, endanger human life or do great bodily harm. The law is clearly stated by a learned judge in State v. Morgan, 25 N. C. 186, 38 Am. Dec. 714, as follows: "When it is said that a man may rightfully use as much force as is necessary for the protection of his person and property, it should be recollected that this rule is subject to this most important modification, that he shall not, except in extreme cases, endanger human life or do great bodily harm. It is not every right of person, and still less of property, that can lawfully be asserted, or every wrong that may rightfully be redressed, by extreme remedies. There is a recklessness—a wanton disregard of humanity and social duty—in taking, or endeavoring to take, the life of a fellow being in order to save one's self from a comparatively slight wrong, which is essentially wicked and the law abhors. You may not kill because you cannot otherwise effect your object, although the object sought to be effected is right. You can only kill to save life or limb, or prevent a great crime, or to accomplish a necessary public duty." See, also, 1 Bish. New Cr. Law, §§ 839, 841, 850.

In the light of these elementary principles, and in view of the facts of this case, it is clear that the instruction given by the court was erroneous, calculated to mislead the jury, and very prejudicial to the rights of the prisoner. Conceding that the prisoner was a trespasser, and that he ought to nptly left the premises when orlo so, still this did not justify the ade upon him. Davidson, armed ecently sharpened corn cutter, adpon the prisoner, and saying that es the prisoner had the right to de-

Error to circuit court, Henrico county.

Action by one Trevett against the Prison Association of Virginia. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. R. Courtney and Pollard & Pollard, for plaintiff in error. Robert Stiles, for defendant in error.

KEITH, J. Plaintiff in error sued the Prison Association of Virginia in an action of trespass on the case, and in his declaration states that he is the owner of a tract of land in the county of Henrico, upon which he and his family reside and carry on a dairy and butter business in addition to ordinary farming operations, keeping a large number of cows, which renders a supply of pure water essential; that the water for the use of the stock is supplied by a stream which was pure and uncontaminated, and without pollution of any kind, and that the milk and butter from the cows which drank the water was free from any objection or odor, and commanded the highest price on the market; that the defendant in error, the Prison Association of Virginia, became the owner of a certain tract of land upon said stream above the land of the plaintiff, so that the water which passed through the plaintiff's land, and was used by his stock and family, came through the defendant's land; that the defendant established upon its land a school for the confinement of youthful criminals, known as the "Laurel Industrial School," and erected thereon numerous buildings for their accommodation, and collected and quartered therein several hundred persons, and furnished the buildings with washtubs, bathtubs, urinals, and closets, without the consent of the plaintiff, and against his protest, and emptied the refuse water, urine, and excrement therefrom into the stream, and thereby polluted the natural and pure water of the stream on plaintiff's lands below, and by reason thereof broke up and destroyed his dairy business, seriously injured the health of his family, impaired the healthfulness of his home, and greatly lessened the value of his property in the public estimation, and reduced its salable value in the market.

The second count is substantially identical with the first, except that it charges the defendant with having erected wash houses, urinals, and closets, and constructed sewers from them to the stream where it passes through the defendant's lands, and by means of the said contrivances the defendant emptied large quantities of impure water, urine, excrement, and fecal matter, which mingled with the water therein, and by the natural flow of the stream polluted the water of the branch in and upon plaintiff's farm below, from which his stock and milch cows had to obtain their daily supply of water to satisfy the demands of nature.

The third count is to the same effect, with the additional allegation that by reason of the impurities carried into it by means of the sewers erected by the defendant not only was the water contaminated, but that the atmosphere about plaintiff's home became impregnated with microbes of typhoid fever and malaria, and was made in every way injurious to health, and in consequence thereof the healthfulness of the plaintiff's farm was destroyed, and that of his family seriously impaired. By reason of the premises plaintiff claims to have suffered damage to the extent of $2,000, for which he sues.

The defendant demurred to this declaration, the demurrer was sustained, the suit dismissed, and a writ of error was obtained from this court by the plaintiff.

The first objection interposed by defendant in error is that it is not liable to be sued for its torts, and in support of this proposition relies upon the recent case of Maia's Adm'r v. Directors, etc. (Va.) 34 S. E. 617. It was there held that "an examination of the statutes creating and continuing this hospital shows that it was created and exists for purely governmental purposes, and is under the exclusive ownership and control of the state. It has no stockholders, no members even, except directors, having no interest in it or its affairs, who are appointed by the governor by and with the consent of the senate, and are in fact public, rather than corporate, officials, endowed with a corporate being for a more convenient administration of the duties imposed upon them by law, and are made liable to fines for any failure to perform their duties.

"The moneys necessary to defray the expenses of maintaining and caring for its inmates is provided by annual appropriations made by the general assembly out of the public treasury, and the manner of keeping and disbursing its funds is prescribed by statute. The directors are required to make quarterly reports to the auditor of public accounts showing in detail how they have been disbursed, and to report annually to the governor, for the information of the general assembly, the condition of the hospital, and the sums received and disbursed by them."

The prison association is not such a corporation. It is a voluntary association of individuals, who procured a charter for certain specified objects. It is not controlled by the state, but by its own corporate officials. It makes and enforces its own by-laws and regulations for the management of its affairs and property. It is invested with all powers, rights, and privileges conferred, and made subject to all the responsibilities, regulations, and restrictions imposed, by the common law and the statutes of this commonwealth upon corporate bodies. It may acquire and hold property, the value of the real estate held by it being limited to $100,000. Its general objects, it may be conceded, are of a benevolent character, as they look to the improvement of the government, discipline, and general management of prisons within this state, and the amelioration of the condition of prisoners, but for its services in this behalf it receives a reasonable compensation; and, while its officers are required "to make an annual report of their work to the general assembly of Virginia," that does not constitute it a public corporation, and give it immunity from responsibility for its torts.

In 1 Wood, Nuis. (3d Ed.) § 427, it is said: "The right of a riparian owner to have the water of a stream come to him in its natural purity is as well recognized as the right to have it flow to his land in its usual flow and volume. But in reference to this, as with the air, it is not every interference with the water that imparts impurities thereto that is actionable, but only such as impart to the water such impurities as substantially impair its value for the ordinary purposes of life, and render it measurably unfit for domestic purposes, or such as causes unwholesome or offensive vapors or odors to arise from the water, and thus impairs the comfortable or beneficial enjoyment of property in its vicinity, or such as, while producing no actual, sensible effect upon the water, are yet of a character calculated to disgust the senses, such as the deposit of the carcasses of dead animals therein, or the erection of privies over a stream, or any other use calculated to produce nausea or disgust in those using the water for the ordinary purposes of life, or such as impair its value for manufacturing purposes."

The great principle upon which the law as thus stated rests is that every man must use his own property so as to not injure that of another. It is true, as urged by counsel for defendant in error, that the operation of this principle is qualified by another maxim founded in natural law, that he who exercises only his own legal rights injures no one. The motive, good or bad, which influenced the action complained of is generally of no importance whatever; for it is well stated by an eminent writer upon this subject that, "Whatever one has a right to do, another can have no right to complain of." Cooley, Torts, p. 630, § 6. If, therefore, a lawful act is done in a lawful manner, though another may be injured by it, the law affords no remedy. It is damnum absque injuria.

As was said by the court in Merrifield v. City of Worcester, 110 Mass. 219: "Cultivating and fertilizing the lands bordering on the stream, and in which are its sources, their occupation by farm houses and other erections, will unavoidably cause impurities to be carried into the stream. As the lands are subdivided, and their occupation and use become multifarious, these causes will be rendered more operative, and their effects more perceptible. The water may thus be rendered unfit for many uses for which it had before been suitable, but, so far as that condition results from reasonable use of the stream in accance with the common right, the lower rian proprietor has no remedy.

When the population became dense, and ns or villages gather along its banks, the m naturally and necessarily suffers still ter deterioration. Roads and streets ing it, or running by its side, with their ers and sluices discharging into it their ace water collected from over large spa and carrying with it in suspension the e and light material that is thus swept off, abundant sources of impurity, against h the law affords no redress by action."

he wrong complained of in the declaration r consideration differs widely from that ition of water incident to the causes ad ed to in the foregoing quotation. Here charged not only that privies were erect r the accommodation of a great number of le, but also that the defendant "emptied se water, urine, and excrement therefrom the stream," and in other counts it is ged that this was done by means of sew specially constructed for that purpose. ies are prima facie nuisances, and, "al gh necessary and indispensable in con ion with the use of property for the ordi purposes of habitation, yet if they are or are allowed to remain in such a con n as to annoy others in the proper enjoy of their property, * * * they are ances in fact, and render the person erect r using them liable for all the injurious equences flowing therefrom."

The pollution of the water by artificial nage, which causes sewage to flow into eam, spring, or well, whether done by a icipal corporation or an individual, con tes a nuisance which entitles the own damages therefor; the rule being that unicipal corporation has no more right jure the waters of a stream or the prem of an individual than a natural person." ood, Nuis. (3d Ed.) §§ 427, 579.

Chapman v. City of Rochester, 110 N. 73, 18 N. E. 88, 1 L. R. A. 296, the de ant constructed certain sewers, and ugh them discharged not only surface er, but the sewage from houses, and the ents from a large number of water ets, in Thomas creek, above plaintiff's , so as to render its water unfit for use, covered its banks with filthy and un lesome sediment. "These and other s," said the court, "well warranted the clusion of the trial court that the act he defendant in thus empting its sew constituted an offensive and dangerous ance. * * * The filth of the city not flow naturally to the lands of the ntiff, as surface water finds its level, but rried thither by artificial arrangements ared by the city, and for which it is re sible. * * * The case comes within general rule which gives to a person in d by the pollution of air or water, to use of which, in its natural condition, he is entitled, an action against the party, whether it be a natural person or a corporation who causes that pollution."

The case of Mayor, etc., of Baltimore v. Warren Mfg. Co., 59 Md. 96, is instructive. The city of Baltimore asked an injunction against the defendants to restrain them from polluting Gunpowder river, the source of its supply of water for drinking and other purposes. The defendant was an upper riparian proprietor, and the charge against it was that it discharged, or knowingly suffered or permitted to be discharged, into said stream refuse water from its factory, impregnated with divers injurious ingredients and substances, put into the same by the defendants at its factory, whereby the water was rendered less pure and fit for use by man as drinking water. This charge was held to be too vague as to the nature and character of the defilement, but the additional charge that he erected, maintained, and used divers large privies and hog pens at or near said factory, the excrement and filth whereof the defendants caused or willfully suffered and permitted to be discharged into the waters of Gunpowder river, whereby the water of the stream was greatly polluted, was held to be cause for the injunction.

Tracing the law from the time of Lord Coke to more recent times, the court, speaking through Judge Alvey, declares that "all common-law authorities agree that a riparian owner has the right to the natural stream of water flowing by or through his land, in its ordinary natural state, both as to its quantity and quality, as incident to the right to the land on or through which the water course runs. * * * If, therefore," said the court, "the defendants, being upper riparian proprietors, and as such entitled to the ordinary use of the water, including the right to apply it in a reasonable way to purposes of trade and manufacture, are using the water of the stream in an unreasonable manner, and have defiled the same in such manner and to such an extent as to operate an actual invasion of the rights of the complainants, the latter are entitled to redress by action at law, and, in case the nuisance be continued, to summary relief by injunction. * * *

"What nature and extent of pollution of the stream will call for the active interference of the court is not in all cases easy to define. It is not every impurity imparted to the water, however small in degree, that will be the subject of an injunction. All running streams are, to a certain extent, polluted; and especially are they so when they flow through populous regions of country, and the waters are utilized for mechanical and manufacturing purposes. The washings of the manured and cultivated fields, and the natural drainage of the country, of necessity, bring many impurities to the stream; but these and the like sources of pollution, cannot, ordinarily, be restrained by the court. Therefore, when we speak of the right of each riparian proprietor to have the water of a natural stream flow through his land in its natural purity, those descriptive terms must be understood in a comparative sense; as no proprietor does receive, nor can he reasonably expect to receive, the water in a state of entire purity. But any use that materially fouls and adulterates the water, or the deposit or discharge therein of any filthy or noxious substance, that so far affects the water as to impair its value for the ordinary purposes of life, will be deemed a violation of the rights of the lower riparian proprietor, and for which he will be entitled to redress. Anything that renders the water less wholesome than when in its ordinary natural state, or which renders it offensive to taste or smell, or that is naturally calculated to excite disgust in those using the water for the ordinary purposes of life, will constitute a nuisance, and for the restraint of which a court of equity will interpose."

The case before us measures fully up to the careful statement of the law in the opinion just quoted. If the averments of the declaration before us are true, the water is utterly unfit for its primary uses. It would be disgusting to the senses and injurious to the health. It is a matter of common knowledge that nothing is more susceptible to contaminating influences than milk, and its odor, its taste, and its wholesomeness are alike affected by the conditions to which it may be exposed. It is the principal food of the feeble and the young, and therefore to make it and keep it pure and free from all contaminating influences is of great importance; but, apart from the possible effect upon the health, who would not be nauseated at the idea that the milk he drinks was obtained from cows supplied with water from so foul a source as described in this declaration? It does not set out one of those slight interferences the law passes over as too trifling to be considered, but a substantial, and indeed a destructive, impairment of the value of the water for all of its primary uses.

Defendant in error laid great stress upon the case of Coal Co. v. Sanderson, 113 Pa. St. 126. Its authority is much diminished by the fact that the supreme court of Pennsylvania, upon the same case, between the same parties, had reached an opposite conclusion in 86 Pa. St. 401, and by the further fact that in the last case three of the judges dissented of a court of seven. That was a suit brought by Sanderson and wife against the Pennsylvania Coal Company to recover damages for the pollution by the defendant of a stream of water which flowed through the plaintiff's grounds by the discharge of water into it from the defendant's mines. The syllabus states, among other things, that "the use and enjoyment of a stream of pure water for domestic purposes by the lower riparian owners, who purchased their land, built their houses, and laid out their grounds before the opening of the coal mine, the acidulated waters from which rendered the stream entirely useless for domestic purposes, must ex necessitate give way to the interests of the community, in order to permit the development of the natural resources of the country, and to make possible the prosecution of the lawful business of mining coal."

Whether the right of the individual under like conditions would with us yield to the public interest, except upon payment of proper compensation, is a question which we need not now decide.

That damages resulting to another, from the natural and lawful use of his land by the owner thereof, are, in the absence of malice or negligence, damnum absque injuria, as stated in that case, there can be no question; and there is great force in the position of the court that the defendant did nothing to change the character of the water or diminish its purity save what resulted from the natural use and enjoyment of its own property. Mining coal was a lawful business. It could not be carried on without freeing the mine from the water which percolated into it. All mine water is acidulated and unfit for domestic use. It was pumped out of the mine, and by the force of gravity and the natural conformation of the land it passed into and polluted the stream which flowed through the premises of the plaintiff. As was said by the court: "The defendants having brought nothing on to the land artificially, the water as it poured into Meadow brook is the water which the mine naturally discharged. Its impurity arises from natural, not artificial, causes. A mine cannot, of course, be operated elsewhere than where the coal is naturally found, and the discharges are necessarily incident to it." It appears, moreover, "that the community in and around Scranton, including the complainant, is supplied with abundant pure water from other sources. There is no complaint as to any injurious effect from this water to the general health. The community does not complain on any grounds. The plaintiff's grievance is for a mere personal inconvenience, and we are of opinion that mere private personal inconvenience, arising in this way and under such circumstances, must yield to the necessities of a great public industry, which, although in the hands of a private corporation, subserves a great public interest. To encourage the development of the great natural resources of a country, trifling inconveniences to particular persons must sometimes give way to the necessities of a great community."

We have quoted thus fully from this case, not that we mean to approve, or that we presume to disapprove, the law as stated in that case, but merely to show that it has no very close analogy to the one before us.

The case of Merrifield v. City of Worcester, 110 Mass. 216, and that of Morse v. Same, 139 Mass. 389, 2 N. E. 604, were suits against the city of Worcester for polluting a stream by emptying into it the sewage of the city, and it was held that there can be no recovery against the city for the pollution so far as it is attributable to the plan of sewerage adopted by the city, but only so far as it is attributable to the improper construction or unreasonable use of the sewers, or negligence or other fault of the city in the care or management of them.

Passages from the opinions in these two cases may be cited as antagonistic to the views hereinbefore expressed, but we think that the case of Washburn & Moen Mfg. Co. v. City of Worcester, 116 Mass. 458, will solve all the apparent difficulties which may be thus suggested. It there appears that the city of Worcester, in the construction of its waterworks, acted under a statute which made provision "for the assessment under special proceedings of damages to all parties whose estates are thereby injured," and the city was, of course, held not to be liable to an action at law or bill in equity for injuries which were the necessary results of the exercise of the powers thus conferred. Said the court: "But if by an excess of the powers granted, or negligence in the mode of carrying out the system legally adopted, or in omitting to take due precautions to guard against consequences of its operation, a nuisance is created, the city may be liable to indictment in behalf of the public, or to suit by individuals suffering special damage." So that these cases are in harmony with the entire current of authority.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed.

APPEAL AND ERROR—FINAL ORDER.

An order sustaining a demurrer to a declaration or amended declaration, without a judgment of dismissal, is not final, so that writ of error authorized by Code, § 3454, in an action at law, only in case of final judgment, will not lie.

Error to circuit court, Wytheville county.

Action by Gillespie against Coleman, sheriff. Demurrers were sustained to the declaration and amended declaration, and plaintiff brings error. Dismissed.

Camm Patteson and A. S. Hall, for plaintiff in error. H. D. Flood, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The action of the court in sustaining demurrers to the plaintiff's original and amended declarations is complained of. The order of the court upon neither demurrer was final. In sustaining the demurrer to the original declaration, leave was given to amend, and pursuant to that order an amended declaration was filed. The court was of opinion that the amended declaration was not sufficient, and sustained the demurrer to it, but did not dismiss the case.

From some chancery orders, although there is no final decree in the case, it is provided by statute that an appeal may be taken. Code, § 3454. But the statute makes no provision for a writ of error in an action at law until there is a final judgment. Id.

The sustaining or overruling of a demurrer to a declaration is not final. To make it final in the former case, there must be a judgment of dismissal; and in the latter, a judgment for the amount or thing sought to be recovered, or some order which puts an end to the case. See Hancock v. Railroad Co., 3 Grat. 328; Trevilian v. Railroad Co., Id. 312; Jeter v. Board, 27 Grat. 910; Tucker v. Sandridge, 82 Va. 532; 4 Minor, Inst. (3d Ed.) 1064–1066; 2 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 114 et seq., where authorities generally are collected.

From anything that appears in the record, this case is still pending in the trial court, and another amended declaration might be filed there, and further proceedings had in the case.

No final judgment having been rendered in the case, this writ of error must be dismissed as improvidently awarded.

KOSS et al. v. KASTELBERG et al.

WILLS—PROPERTY BEQUEATHED—BANK DEPOSIT.

A bequest of "all horses, harnesses, wagons, machinery, and all other personal property used in my butchering business, including all choses in action," does not pass a bank deposit, it appearing that the account was resorted to in connection with testator's general business; that accounts were paid out of it in no wise connected with his butchering business; that it was not at all necessary to the conduct of that business, which was an established and profitable one; that there were motives for opening the account growing out of a contemplated visit abroad; and that there were accounts due by customers to the butcher business satisfying the provision as to choses in action.

Appeal from circuit court, Henrico county.

Suit between Koss and others and Kastelberg and others. From an adverse decree, Koss and others appeal. Reversed.

B. T. Barrett and J. R. V. Daniel, for appellants. L. O. Wendenburg and Anderson & Anderson, for appellees.

KEITH, P. The bill in this case was filed in the circuit court of Henrico county to have the will of Rudolph Kastelberg construed.

The third and fourth clauses of the will are as follows:

"Third. I give and bequeath unto to my four sons, R. L. Kastelberg, Jos. F. Kastelberg, Chas. H. Kastelberg, and William Kastelberg, all my horses, harness, wagons, machinery, and all other personal property used in my butchering business, including all choses in action, to be held by them jointly and in fee simple.

"Fourth. I give, devise, and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Lena Kastelberg, and all our children, all my real estate, as well as any other property not heretofore bequeathed, to be held by them jointly and in fee simple, the share of my said wife being the same as the share of each child; and, should any child die before I do leaving children, then the share of such child shall descend to his or her children per stirpes; and, should my wife fail for any reason to receive or collect the policy of insurance taken out on my life for her benefit in the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York, then she shall receive her dower interest in my real estate in lieu of the provision made in this clause of my will for her benefit."

The testator had conducted the business of a butcher in the city of Richmond, and at the time of his death, as appears by the report of the commissioner, was possessed of the following personal property: Certain rents that were due him; a balance on deposit in the State Bank of Virginia; cash in safe-deposit box of the First National Bank of Virginia; stock in the United Banking & Building Fund Association; balance in bank to the credit of R. Kastelberg's Sons, but which it is admitted belonged to the testator; certain farm stock and farm implements mentioned in the report; and debts by open account from his customers which amounted to about $1,000.

The commissioner was further directed to report the interest of the parties in this cause in the personal estate. In order to do so, it became necessary to construe the clauses of the will already quoted, and he was of opinion, and so reported, that the third clause passed to the four sons of the testator the horses, harness, wagons, and machinery used in the butchering business, and accounts due to that business by customers, but did not carry the balances in bank and other choses in action.

To this report the executors of Kastelberg filed four exceptions, all of which were overruled except the second, which is as follows:

"Because he reports the $3,973.61 in the First National Bank to the credit of R. Kastelberg's Sons does not pass under the third clause of the will to R. Kastelberg's four sons, but to his estate."

We are of opinion that this exception should not have been sustained. While the account stood in the name of Kastelberg's Sons, the commissioner found, and in this respect the report is not controverted, that this sum belonged to Rudolph Kastelberg, deceased, and passed under his will. It is claimed that it is embraced in the third clause because it is a chose in action. A balance in bank to the credit of a depositor is, strictly speaking, a chose in action. It is often treated, however, as ready money, and whether it is to be regarded in a particular case as the one or the other will depend upon all the surrounding circumstances, and the conclusion reached will be in accordance with the cardinal rule of construction which requires courts to ascertain from the will the true intent of the testator, and, if possible, give effect to it.

The third clause bequeaths to his four sons "all horses, harness, wagons, machinery, and all other personal property used in my butchering business, including all choses in action." Those who claim a balance in bank by virtue of the third clause must show, not only that it constitutes a chose in action, but that it was used in connection with the butchering business; for it is not every chose in action of which the testator died possessed which passes under this clause, but only such choses in action as comply with the other term of the description, and are shown to have been used in the business conducted by the testator. This seems to be conceded by appellees. The term "chose in action" is sufficiently broad to embrace all the items of property set out in the report of the commissioner except the farm stock and farm implements, which were of little value; yet the appellees only excepted to so much of the report as pertains to the balance of $3,973.61 standing in the name of Kastelberg's Sons, $2,571.54 on deposit in the State Bank of Virginia, stock in the United Banking & Building Fund Association amounting to $820.75, and interposed no exception to the amount of cash in safe-deposit box in the First National Bank of Virginia amounting to $4,000. It is very clear from the decree of the circuit court, read in connection with the pleadings, the report, and the exceptions thereto, that the learned judge had the same view with respect to the proper construction of the third clause of the will which we entertain; that is to say, that only such choses in action passed under it as were used in connection with the business of the testator.

In sustaining the appellees' second exception to the commissioner's report, the circuit court seems to have been controlled by the fact that the testator had opened an account with the First National Bank of Virginia in the name of R. Kastelberg's Sons, and was further of opinion that the evidence was sufficient to show that it was opened for the convenience of, and used in connection with, the business, and the evidence, without doubt, lends a good deal of force to that view. Upon the whole record, however, we do not find it conclusive. It appears that that account was resorted to in connection with the general business of the testator; that accounts were paid out of it in no wise connected with his business as butcher; that it was not at all necessary to the conduct of that business, which was an established and profitable one. When we find that there were other motives for opening this account growing out of his visit to Europe, then in contemplation; that there was other personal property and choses in action which fully answered all the requirements of the third clause of the will,—that is to say, the accounts due by customers to his business as butcher,—we are satisfied that the testator did not intend that this item should pass to his four sons, but that it should be distributable among all of his children.

There is another consideration which is entitled to some weight. All of the testator's children were, it is to be presumed, the equal objects of his care, affection, and bounty. Equity delights in equality, and, while it will do no violence to language or wrest words from their natural meaning to accomplish that result, it will not be without force in a case of doubtful construction.

We are of opinion that the circuit court erred in sustaining the exception to the commissioner's report, and its decree is therefore reversed.

PAYNE v. ZELL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 14, 1900.)

BILLS AND NOTES—HOLDER FOR VALUE—HOLDER WITHOUT NOTICE — CONTINUANCE—DEPOSITIONS—NOTICE.

1. A refusal to grant a second continuance because of defendant's absence from the city to keep a business engagement is not a ground for reversal, when no effort was made to have the day set for trial changed until the case was called, though such engagement was made several weeks before.

2. Code, § 3363, prescribes that, in serving the counsel of a party who is a nonresident with notice to take depositions, sufficient time shall be given for conveying, by ordinary course of mail, a letter to the residence of such party, and a reply back to the place of service, and then for the counsel to attend at the place of taking the deposition. Held, that service of a notice at Richmond at 3:45 p. m. on May 24th, to take a deposition at Hampton on May 26th, was not within a reasonable time, where nonresident resided in Baltimore.

3. Where the payee of a note, being indebted to plaintiff, indorsed and delivered it to him in part payment of such indebtedness, plaintiff was a holder for value, under Acts 1897–98, pp. 896, 918, § 25, declaring that a pre-existing debt constitutes value.

4. Where the payee of a note was indebted to plaintiff, and assigned the note as collateral, plaintiff was a holder for value for the amount due him, under Acts 1897–98, pp. 896, 918, § 27, declaring that where a holder has a lien on an instrument he is a holder for value to the extent of his lien.

5. The holder of a note indorsed to him before maturity, and before complaint made by the maker to the payee of a failure of consideration, was a holder without notice of such failure of consideration.

Error to circuit court of city of Richmond.

O'Ferral & Regester, for plaintiff in error. B. Rand. Wellford, for defendant in error.

RIELY, J. The refusal of the court to continue the case, upon the motion of the defendant, constitutes the first assignment of error. A motion for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; and, although an appellate court will review the action of the trial court, it will not reverse its judgment upon such motion, unless plainly erroneous. Railroad Co. v. Shott, 92 Va. 45, 22 S. E. 811, and Hite's Case, 96 Va. 489, 31 S. E. 895.

The suit was brought to first rules in December, 1898. The defendant filed no plea, nor entered any appearance, until the 21st of February, 1899, only a few days before the office judgment would have become final. The plaintiff being a nonresident, the defendant, on April 17, 1899, made a motion for security for costs, which was promptly given, and the case set for trial on May 22, 1899. Upon the calling of the case for trial on that day, the defendant being absent from the city, by consent of parties, by counsel, it was set for trial on the 27th of May. When called for trial on the day to which it was so postponed, there was a motion by counsel for the defendant to continue the case. The ground assigned for the motion was that the defendant was unable to attend and testify by reason of an important business engagement in the city of Baltimore, and that his testimony was material. The record contains no explanation of his absence from the city, and not attending the court on May 22d, for which day the trial was first set; and, as to his absence on May 27th, it appears that the business appointment that kept him away was made several weeks before the day fixed for the trial of the case, and yet he made no effort to have the day for the trial of the case changed until it was called. Under the circumstances shown, the court properly overruled the motion for the continuance.

Nor did the court err in rejecting the deposition of the defendant upon the ground of the insufficiency of the notice to take it. The plaintiff resides in the city of Baltimore, and his counsel in the city of Richmond, where the suit was brought. The statute, which authorizes the service upon the counsel of a party who is a nonresident of the state of a notice to take a deposition, prescribes that "the time between the service of notice and taking the deposition shall be sufficient for conveying by ordinary course of mail a letter from the place of service to the place of residence of the party, and a reply from that place back to the place of service, and then for the counsel to attend at the place of taking the deposition." Code, § 3363.

The notice was served on counsel in the city of Richmond at 3:45 p. m. on May 24th, to take the deposition at Hampton, Va., on May 26th, between the hours of 9 a. m. and 6 p. m. It was not practicable within the time intervening between the service of the notice and the date appointed for taking the deposition for counsel to communicate by letter with the plaintiff, and receive a reply, and then attend at the place of taking the deposition. The service of the notice was not within a reasonable time, and was clearly insufficient.

The writing sued upon is a negotiable note made by the defendant, and transferred by the payee to the plaintiff. Upon the trial the plaintiff introduced no evidence except the note, which, under the pleadings, was all that was necessary to make out case.

The defendant put in evidence the depositions of the payee and the plaintiff, which he had taken in his own behalf, and examined orally one other witness. The defense relied upon to defeat a recovery was that there was a failure of the consideration for which the note was given, and that the plaintiff was not a holder for value or without notice, and that, therefore, the note was subject in his hands to any defense existing between the maker and the payee.

The evidence of the defendant proved that the payee was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,575 on account of the purchase of stock of the Country Club of Baltimore County, and before the maturity of the note sued on indorsed and delivered it to the plaintiff in part payment of the said indebtedness. Whether the plaintiff accepted the note as payment on account of, or as security for, the said indebtedness is not altogether clear from the evidence; but whether the one or the other is immaterial, as in either case he is a holder for value. Brooklyn City & N. R. Co. v. National Bank of the Republic, 102 U. S. 14, 26 L. Ed. 61; Daniel, Neg. Inst. §§ 184, 826, 831(a), 1277, 1278(a); Bigelow, Bills & N. c. 14, § 3; and Crawford, Ann. Neg. Inst. Law, pp. 30, 31.

The entire transaction has taken place since the passage by the legislature of the statute to revise, arrange, and consolidate into one act the laws relating to negotiable instruments, and, although it may not have been previously settled in this state by decision whether or not a pre-existing debt constituted value for the transfer of negotiable paper, that question has now been settled by the said statute. Acts 1897-98, pp. 896, 918. Section 25 of that act declares that "an antecedent or pre-existing debt constitutes value, and is deemed such whether the instrument is payable on demand or at a future time."

Section 27 declares that "where the holder has a lien on the instrument, arising either from contract or by implication of law, he is deemed a holder for value to the extent of his lien," so that any person to whom a negotiable security has been pledged as collateral would be a holder for value to the extent of the amount due to him.

The plaintiff, therefore, became a holder of the note for value before it matured.

It is equally clear from the evidence that he is also a holder without notice of the failure of the consideration for which the note was executed or of any other infirmity attaching to it. It was indorsed by the payee, and delivered by him to the plaintiff, five days before its maturity, and two days, even, before the date of the letter of the defendant to the payee making complaint for the first time of the failure of the consideration, and objecting to its payment. The evidence fails to establish that the plaintiff at the time the note was transferred to him by the payee knew what was the consideration of the note, or for what purpose it was given, or that it was affected with any infirmity whatever.

The note is complete and regular on its face. The plaintiff acquired it in good faith and for value, before its maturity, and without notice of any infirmity attaching to it.

Upon the motion for a continuance of the case, the deposition of the defendant, which was rejected when offered in evidence on the trial because of insufficient notice to take it, was used in support of the motion in order to show the materiality of his testimony, and was made a part of the bill of exception to the refusal of the court to continue the case. Upon an inspection of the deposition, it is seen that the facts that he relates refer wholly to the transactions between the payee and himself in reference to giving the note, and that he did not undertake to prove that the plaintiff had notice before or at the time the note was transferred to him of any fact tending to invalidate it. So that if the deposition had been admitted in evidence on the trial it contained nothing that could have changed the result.

The court very properly sustained the demurrer of the plaintiff to the defendant's evidence, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the note. Its judgment must be affirmed.

he court-house lot the county of Nort its clerk's office, and at a meeting oard of supervisors of the county
July 24, 1899, it was resolved as the sense of the board that it was necessary that the clerk's office should be enlarged, and that for this purpose it was necessary to acquire by purchase or condemnation the lot of the defendant in error lying adjacent to and west of the court-house lot. Being unable to agree with the owner on the terms of its purchase, the board made application to the hustings court of the city of Portsmouth, in accordance with the provisions of section 1074 of the Code, for the appointment of five disinterested freeholders to ascertain a just compensation to the owner for the said lot. The court refused to appoint them, and dismissed the application of the board upon the ground that there was no authority to condemn land situate in the city for the purpose of enlarging the clerk's office of the county.

The law makes it the duty of the board of supervisors of every county to provide a court house, clerk's office, and jail; and to that end authorizes the board to purchase such real estate as may be necessary for the erection of all necessary county buildings, which, with what the county has, will make two acres, and so much thereof as may be necessary shall be occupied with the court house, clerk's office, and jail. Code, §§ 834, 925.

Section 3176 provides that the clerk's office of the court of every county and corporation shall be kept at the court house of the county or corporation, unless there shall have been a failure by the proper authority to provide such office there, in which case the clerk's office may be kept at such other place within the county or corporation as the court may direct.

It thus appears that the law, for the subservience of the public convenience, requires that the clerk's office of a county or city shall be kept at the court house of the county or corporation, as the case may be.

When an agreement cannot be made with a person entitled to land, which is needed by a county for the erection thereon of its necessary public buildings, provision is made by section 1074 of the Code for the application to the court of the county or corporation in which such land, or the greater part thereof, lies, for the appointment of commissioners to ascertain a just compensation for such land. This statute has been construed by this court to authorize the application by the board of supervisors of a county to the proper tribunal for the condemnation of land which it may have selected for the location of the court house, clerk's office, and jail of the county. Board of Sup'rs v. Gorrell, 20 Grat. 484.

The statutes referred to do not in themselves confine the selection by the board to land for said purposes within any specified area or to any particular locality, but it results from other statutes that the court house, clerk's office, and jail shall be located within the limits of the county.

Section 3116 is as follows: "Every circuit, county, or corporation court, for any county or corporation, shall be held at the court-house of such county or corporation, except where some other place is prescribed by law, or lawfully appointed;" and section 3120 provides that "no such place of session, for a circuit, county, or corporation court, shall be without the limits of the county or corporation of which it is the court."

It follows, therefore, that a clerk's office of a county shall be kept at its court house, and that its court house must be located within the boundaries of the county.

It was urged in argument that the condemnation of the land in question to enable the board of supervisors to enlarge the clerk's office of the county would result in a conflict of jurisdiction over the locality between its court and the court of the corporation; and would also be in violation of the provisions of section 3178, which prohibits the removal of the records and papers of a court out of the county or corporation wherein the clerk's office is kept, except on an occasion of invasion or insurrection, where, in the opinion of the court, or, in a very sudden case, of the clerk, the same will be endangered, after which they are to be returned so soon as the danger ceases; and except in such other cases as are specially provided by law. Neither of these contentions is well founded.

The land which it is sought to condemn being within the territorial limits of the city, and subject to the jurisdiction of its court, the court of the county would not acquire, nor the court of the city lose, its jurisdiction over the locality by the condemnation. The court house and other public buildings of a number of the counties of the state are situated in cities within the territorial limits of the counties, and it has been held by this court that jurisdiction over the locality is in the court of the city, and not in the court of the county. Fitch's Case, 92 Va. 824, 24 S. E. 272, and Chahoon's Case, 20 Grat. 733.

Nor does the keeping of the records and papers of the courts of a county in its clerk's office at the court house of the county, which was duly located at a place within the county that was subsequently embraced within the territorial limits of a city thereafter incorporated, nor would the keeping of a portion of the records and papers in an extension of the clerk's office, offend against the provisions of section 3178. Neither the keeping of the record and papers of the courts of a county in a clerk's office so located, nor the transfer of a portion of them for preservation to an extension thereof, constitutes, in the most technical sense, such removal of them as is prohibited by section 3178. The statute only prohibits the removal of the records and papers of a court out of the county or corporation wherein the clerk's office is kept. The court house and clerk's office, although situate within the limits of the city and the jurisdiction of its court, are nevertheless also within the territorial limits of the county. The fact that a city is established within the territorial limits of a county does not alter the boundaries of the county, nor curtail its territorial limits, although its court, by the incorporation of the city, is deprived of civil and criminal jurisdiction within the limits of the city.

The right of the board of supervisors to have the lot of the defendant in error condemned to enable the board to enlarge the clerk's office of the county to meet its necessities, which is, as is required by law, now kept at the court house of the county, is plain from the statutes relating to the subject; and it is well that this is so, for otherwise the board would have to remove the court house of the county outside of the limits of the city in order to acquire land for the enlargement of the clerk's office to sufficient dimensions to hold the records and papers of the courts of the county, although its court house was duly located, very many years ago, in the town of Portsmouth, long prior to the incorporation of the town as the city of Portsmouth, and although the very act incorporating the town into a city expressly provides that the said court house shall be jointly "possessed, employed, and appropriated" by all the courts of the county and city, and that the county court may continue to hold its terms and sessions in the said court house.

The judgment of the hustings court must be reversed, and the application of the board of supervisors for the condemnation of the lot of the appellee be reinstated, and proceeded with in accordance with the statutes in such case made and provided.

THOMAS v. JONES.

TAXATION—SALE OF LAND FOR DELINQUENT TAXES—ANNULLING DEED IN EQUITY.

Proceedings for the sale of land for delinquent taxes were defective. Counsel for plaintiff told counsel for defendant, the purchaser, of such defects, upon which counsel for defendant said that he would sue the sheriff for damages for the loss of the land to his client. Counsel for plaintiff then tendered the delinquent taxes to the clerk, informing him of the irregularities, and told him that, to save him harmless, he would apply for an injunction restraining him from executing the deed to defendant, time for which was promised by the clerk. The following day counsel for plaintiff was obliged to leave the city early in the morning, and, on returning, found that a deed had been issued to defendant that day. Held that, as plaintiff had been lulled into security by the promise of the clerk and the actions of the defendant, equity would relieve him by annulling the deed.

Appeal from circuit court, Culpeper county.

Suit by G. Wallis Jones against John D. Thomas. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Grimsley & Miller, H. W. Sutherland, and H. G. Peters, for appellant. Barbour & Rixey and G. D. Gray, for appellee.

KEITH, P. A tract of land owned by G. Wallis Jones, in the county of Culpeper, was sold for nonpayment of taxes, and purchased by the state, on the 17th of December, 1894. Two years having elapsed, one John D. Thomas filed an application, and purchased it from the state, and on the 30th of April, 1897, the clerk of the county court of Culpeper executed a deed to him. On the third Monday in May, 1897, Jones filed a bill in the circuit court of Culpeper county, in which he states that this deed is invalid and void, for a number of causes, which he proceeds to set out with much detail, and prays that it may be canceled, and his title quieted and freed from the cloud resting upon it by reason of the deed. Thomas answered this bill, denying all of its material averments; but we do not find it necessary to state the pleadings more precisely, nor to discuss the evidence adduced, save in one particular, which will be presently adverted to, as the facts agreed are in other respects sufficient to enable us to decide the case upon its merits.

"It is agreed that the land books filed in the clerk's office of Culpeper county and in the treasurer's office for the year 1896 were not sworn to by T. O. Yowell, the commissioner of the revenue, and were not examined and certified to by the clerk of the county court for Culpeper county, as required by law, and that these books, as well as the original lists in the clerk's office, may be used as a part of the evidence in this cause.

"That the delinquent list for 1893 was not made off until October 12, 1894.

"That the clerk of the county court of Culpeper county did not, within 60 days after the lists of delinquent lands for 1893 were allowed, under section 608 of the Code, lay a certified copy thereof, or any copy thereof, before the board of supervisors of Culpeper county, as required by section 612. Nor did the board of supervisors cause said lists, or any part thereof, to be published in any of the modes prescribed by section 612, and the order of October 12, 1894, is the only action taken by said board relative to said lists.

"That the clerk of the county court did not furnish to the county treasurer a certified copy of said lists as corrected by the court, nor did he cause a copy thereof to be posted at the front door of the court house, nor did he cause printed copies thereof to be posted at at least five public places in Cedar Mountain district, in Culpeper county, as required by section 637; the only publication being that as shown by plaintiff's Exhibit E, taken from the Culpeper Enterprise.

"That, at the time John D. Thomas filed his application to purchase, he paid no money to the clerk of Culpeper county, and did not tender him any, and did not pay any until April 30, 1897.

"The above facts are admitted without prejudice to the defendant, and without waiving rights to insist that they cannot be inquired into in this proceeding.

"The plaintiff admits that the only tender of taxes for 1893 made by him to the clerk was the tender mentioned in the deposition of John S. Barbour.

"It is admitted that the county court of Culpeper county was in session on April 19, 22, and 23, 1897."

It appears by uncontradicted testimony that counsel for Jones, the appellee, in order to avoid, if possible, the necessity of litigation, had a conversation with counsel for the appellant, Thomas, during the county court of Culpeper commencing April 19, 1897, at which the order was entered directing the deed to be executed to Thomas by the clerk, and informed him that the application of Thomas to become a purchaser had never been served according to law upon his client, G. Wallis Jones, and that the return of the deputy sheriff was untrue. Counsel for Thomas was surprised and indignant when he found that the deputy sheriff had failed to make a return in accordance with the facts, and wrote to him upon the subject. Thereupon the deputy came to Culpeper court house, and stated to counsel for Thomas that he had in truth never served the application on Jones, but had merely inclosed it in an envelope, and addressed it to "G. Wallace Jones, Jr., Burr Hill, Orange county, Va." Counsel for Thomas thereupon declared with much emphasis that he would sue the deputy sheriff for the damages suffered by his client by reason of the loss of this land. Counsel for Jones then went to the clerk, and told him that he was prepared to pay all taxes for which the land was delinquent, and asked for a statement; but the clerk doubted his authority, under the circumstances, to receive the money. He was then informed of the irregularities and omissions in the proceedings by which the title of Jones had been devested and put in the state, and by which Thomas had subsequently become a purchaser from the state; and then counsel for Jones suggested that, in order to save the clerk harmless, he would apply for an injunction restraining him from making the deed, and asked that he be given an opportunity to apply for an injunction before a deed was made to Thomas, which the clerk promised to do. This occurred on the 29th of April, 1897; and on the following day counsel for Jones, being compelled to go to Warrenton on professional business, left Culpeper court house at 6 o'clock in the morning, and returned at 7 o'clock in the evening of the same day. On the 1st day of May he was informed, greatly to his surprise, that counsel for Thomas had obtained a deed for this property on the day before; that it had been admitted to record and spread on the deed books before 9 o'clock on the morning of April 30th. Counsel, being asked, "What prevented you, or what caused you to postpone applying for an injunction to restrain W. E. Coons from making the deed to John D. Thomas?" answered that counsel for Thomas "led me to believe that there would be no further attempt to get a deed, and Mr. Coons had told me that he would not execute a deed without giving me an opportunity to apply for an injunction. I did not wish to put my client nor Mr. Thomas to the expense of an injunction unnecessarily. I do not wish to be understood as stating that counsel for Thomas intentionally misled me in this matter. I only gathered it from what he said and his manner. I remember his discussing the question of the responsibility of Mr. A. W. Pulliam, the sheriff, and his sureties, for the false return by Garnett, his deputy."

This evidence is wholly uncontradicted, and is to be taken as true, and doubtless is true in all respects.

Section 666 of the Code, by virtue of which the deed was executed, provides that section 661 shall apply to deeds made under its provisions.

Section 661 declares that "when the purchaser of any real estate so sold, his heirs, or assigns, has obtained a deed therefor, and the same has been duly admitted to record in the county or corporation in which such real estate lies, the right or title to such estate shall stand vested in the grantee in such deed as it was vested in the party assessed with the taxes or levies on account whereof the sale was made."

It appears, therefore, that section 661 only becomes operative after the deed has been executed and recorded. It is not the lapse of two years which cuts off the former owner from inquiry into the various steps by which his title has been devested; but that effect, according to the terms of the statute, is only produced by the execution of the deed by the clerk, and its recordation by the grantee. We must therefore inquire whether the deed from the clerk to Thomas was procured under such circumstances as rendered it inequitable for Thomas to avail himself of it. It is impossible to read the deposition of the counsel for Jones without being convinced that he was lulled into false security by what occurred between himself, the counsel for Thomas, and the clerk of the court. We do not believe that any fraud was intended, and we do not impute it. We think that counsel, in their zeal to protect and promote the interests of their clients, overstepped the bounds of prudence and discretion, and that, as a result of what they did, Thomas acquired an advantage, in procuring the execution of the deed under the circumstances disclosed, which it would be against good conscience to permit him to enjoy. We do not rest this upon the idea that it was competent for counsel to enter into a contract which would impose an obligation upon their clients, nor that the clerk could by contract disable himself duly to perform the functions of his office; but we do think that what occurred between counsel naturally (indeed, necessarily) induced the belief upon the part of counsel for Jones that the infirmity which existed in the claim of Thomas to the land was recognized as insuperable, that further prosecution of it would be abandoned, and that redress would be sought in a suit for damages against the sheriff and his sureties.

A court can made no contract as to the disposition of cases upon its docket, but, surely, if counsel were to state to a judge that he could not attend upon a particular day, and the judge assured him that his case would not be called or tried on that day, a judgment rendered in contravention of that assurance would operate as a surprise against which a court of equity would give relief. It is true that the clerk is not a court, and the analogy, therefore, is not complete; but the principle is the same, and applies with even greater force to the case before us. "A court of equity always grants relief, even against judgments at law, when it is shown that the reason why the defense was not made was founded in fraud, accident, surprise, or some adventitious circumstances beyond the control of the party." Holland v. Trotter, 22 Grat. 141; Railway Co. v. Wells, 54 Am. St. Rep. 216, 33 S. W. 208, 30 L. R. A. 560, and notes to 54 Am. St. Rep. 216.

As is said (at page 236, 54 Am. St. Rep.) in the case just cited: "We cannot, of course, undertake to specify all the fraudulent acts of this character which may entitle the person against whom they were employed to relief. Such acts may be of infinite variety. It is sufficient, as against any of them, to obtain relief from a judgment produced thereby to show that by such act the prevailing party prevented his adversary from fairly presenting his case in the original action, whereby an unjust judgment was obtained." See, also, McLeran v. McNamara, 55 Cal. 508.

Though no representation be made to a defendant, inducing him not to make his defense, yet if the plaintiff brings on the action without the knowledge of the defendant, and at a time when he knows the defendant has reason to expect the trial of it will not be had, equity will relieve against it. It appeared in one case that a justice of the peace had in the morning announced to a defendant that the trial of the case would not proceed, because of the illness of such justice, and that but for this announcement the defendant would have been present at the hour fixed for the trial, and that the plaintiff, knowing that the defendant had left the court with the belief that his cause would not be called, had afterwards returned and induced the justice to proceed therewith in the absence of his adversary. "In this case, while the plaintiff had not caused the justice of the peace to make the statements inducing the defendant to forego presenting his defense at the appointed time, he had, in effect, adopted such statements, and employed them for an unconscionable purpose, and had thus brought himself within the rule that no one shall retain an advantage at law thus secured." Miles v. Jones, 28 Mo. 87. It is immaterial that an act was done in good faith and without fraudulent intent; if by it an advantage has been obtained which it is against good conscience to enjoy, a court of equity will relieve against it.

To repeat what we have already said, we do not impute fraud in the transaction under consideration. Were it fraudulent, however, that alone would not entitle appellee to have the deed annulled; for mere fraud is not the subject of judicial inquiry, and cannot, standing alone, be made the basis of relief. If, therefore, Jones, at the time the deed was executed transferring the title from the commonwealth to Thomas, was in such a position that a court would have compelled the clerk to execute the deed, he declining to do so of his own accord, then it follows that Jones was not injured by the conduct of Thomas through his counsel; but if, in the various steps taken to devest his title for the nonpayment of taxes and place it in the commonwealth, there was an omission to do what under the law was necessary to be done to accomplish that result, Jones could at any time prior to the execution of the deed have defeated the title of the commonwealth, and the burden up to this point is upon those relying upon the due compliance with the several requirements of the statute law in such case provided; and, if the deed was procured by any means which a court of equity cannot sanction, if anything was said or done by Thomas or his counsel by which Jones was lulled into a false security, and thereby suffered the loss of any right or remedy, or was placed in a prejudicial position, then we have the case of a wrong accompanied by damage. If, at the instant before the execution of the deed, Jones was in a position to defeat the proceeding against him, then he is not to be prejudiced by the fact that the deed was procured from him by methods which cannot be sanctioned by a court of equity. Turning, then, to the statement of agreed facts, let us suppose that the clerk had refused to execute the deed when demanded, and that Thomas had applied to this court for a mandamus, and it had appeared that section 637 had not been complied with; it cannot be doubted but that such an omission would have been quite sufficient to have justified (indeed, to have demanded) a denial of the writ.

It appears from the facts agreed that in numerous particulars the law regulating the sales of lands returned delinquent for nonpayment of taxes was wholly disregarded; the most material omission, perhaps, being the failure to advertise as required by section 637. If the clerk had furnished copies of the list of delinquent lands as corrected by the court, and caused them to be posted at the front door of the court house, and printed copies thereof to be posted at five public places in the district in which the land lies, appellee might have received notice which would have enabled him to protect himself against loss.

As we have seen, appellant cannot be permitted to rely upon the deed executed to him by the clerk to cure any defects which may exist in the course of the proceeding under which he claims. The burden was upon him to show a compliance with the law, and the undisputed facts in this record are conclusive against him, when he is deprived of the advantage enjoyed by virtue of the deed.

We are of opinion that the decree of the circuit court must be affirmed.

WASHINGTON, A. & M. V. RY. CO. v. CITY COUNCIL OF ALEXANDRIA.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—MANDAMUS—CITY ORDINANCE — STREET RAILWAY — REASONABLENESS—QUESTION FOR COURT—JUDGMENT — NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO — CHANGING RAILS—PAVING.

1. On trial of mandamus by a city to compel a street-railway company to substitute a grooved rail for tram girder rails, as directed by an ordinance, so as to facilitate the paving of a street, questions as to whether or not the tram rails would obstruct the use of the street after such paving, and should not be approved by the city authorities, or whether the grooved rails were a necessary incident to the paving, and whether the tram rails were not of an approved pattern, and had been approved by the city authorities, were submitted to a jury, which found in favor of defendant railway company. Held, that a judgment in favor of the city, entered by the court non obstante veredicto, was proper, as questions of the reasonableness of the ordinance were for the court alone.

2. On mandamus by a city to enforce obedience to an ordinance directing a street-railway company to change its rails to facilitate paving, it appeared that the ordinance was not arbitrarily or capriciously passed, but in accordance with a sentiment expressed by a great many citizens, and that the matter had been considered by a committee on streets in conference with the engineer of the railway company, and the new rails recommended to the council, and that such substitute rails were being successfully used in another city. Held sufficient to warrant a finding that the ordinance was reasonable, and to sustain a judgment in favor of the city.

Appeal from circuit court of city of Alexandria.

Mandamus by the city council of Alexandria against the Washington, Alexandria & Mt. Vernon Railway Company to compel compliance with an ordinance directing it to change its rails to facilitate paving. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Wilson and J. R. Caton, for appellant. Gardner S. Boothe, for appellee.

KEITH, P. Appellant, with the consent of the appellee, constructed a passenger railway over certain streets in the city of Alexandria in the year 1892; using rails of an improved pattern, known as the "tram girder rail," such as were then commonly in use, and as are still used by many street railways.

The city council of Alexandria, by an ordinance approved July 15, 1898, ordered that a portion of King street (one of the principal thoroughfares of the city) should, for the distance of one square, be repaved with vitrified brick, on a six-inch concrete base; and, by another ordinance of the same date, directed the appellant company to put down, on the said square, rails to be approved by the committee on streets, and to grade and pave on the space between the railroad tracks, and two feet on each side thereof, in a similar manner; and by another ordinance, approved September 23, 1898, further directed the appellant company to take up its rails on said square in King street, and to lay in their stead a grooved rail, with a groove not exceeding 1⅛ inches in depth, and with a tram not lower than 1¼ inches below the head, and with the groove of the outline shown by the full lines of the drawing attached to said ordinance.

The appellant company failing to obey, the city council presented its petition to the judge of the circuit court of the city of Alexandria for a writ of mandamus to compel a compliance with the requirements of said ordinance.

The petition sets forth that the ordinance is a reasonable regulation of the use of the street, which the city has full power to make, under section 33 of its charter, and under the general law, because the paving of King street is greatly needed and desired by the citizens of Alexandria, and a grooved rail is a necessary incident to the improvement, King street being the principal business street of the city, with a heavy wagon traffic upon it, and measuring only 37 feet from curb to curb; that, owing to the narrowness of the street, traffic is compelled to follow the tracks and rails of the appellant company, and therefore any railway track on King street is to some extent an impediment to its free use; and that for these reasons the rail used on King street should be such as to impede general traffic in the least possible degree.

It is further averred that the rail now used upon King street is such as to prevent vehicles from turning out of the railway track, except with great strain to the wheels, axles, and running gear, and jolting in direct crossing. The form of the rails, and the nature and extent of the inconvenience they occasion, are set out with much detail in the petition; and, for the reasons thus stated, the petition avers that the rails as at present laid are a nuisance and an obstruction to the ordinary use of the street.

To this petition the appellant company demurred, and, the demurrer being overruled, it answered, denying the reasonableness of the ordinance; and thereupon issues were framed, to be tried by a jury, as follows:

"(1) Whether or not the several ordinances alleged and set forth in the petition, directing the grading and paving of King street between the west crossing of Fairfax street and east crossing of Royal street, and directing the Washington, Alexandria & Mt. Vernon Railway Company to remove the rail now laid upon said square, and to substitute a grooved pattern set forth in said petition, were duly passed, approved, and published as required by provisions of the charter of the city, and whether or not the conditions to the passage of the ordinances for the improvement of said streets have been complied with.

"(2) Whether or not the present rails in use by respondent on King street between the west side of Fairfax street and the east side of Royal street will obstruct the ordinary use of said portion of King street, provided the proposed improvement of said portion of King street is made by the city of Alexandria as set out in the ordinance approved by the mayor of said city on July 15, 1898, and entitled 'An ordinance to provide for the grading, paving and curbing of King street from the west crossing of Fairfax street to the east crossing of Royal street, and for the assessment of the costs thereof under the thirty-third section of the city charter as amended by an act of the general assembly, approved February 7th, 1898.'

"(3) Whether or not the present rails in use by respondent on King street between the west crossing of Fairfax street and the east crossing of Royal street will be and are of approved pattern; that is, of such pattern, on account of merit and excellence, and adaptation for the purposes for which they are used, as should be approved by the city authorities of Alexandria, provided the proposed improvement of said portion of King street is made by the city of Alexandria as set out in the ordinances approved by the mayor of said city on July 15, 1898, and entitled 'An ordinance to provide for the grading, paving and curbing of King street from the west crossing of Fairfax street to the east crossing of Royal street, and for the assessment of the costs thereof under the thirty-third section of the city charter as amended by an act of the general assembly, approved February 7, 1898.'

"(4) Whether or not the proposed rails mentioned in the ordinance approved on November 23, 1898, and entitled 'An ordinance directing the Washington, Alexandria & Mt. Vernon Railway Company, to take up the rails now laid on King street from the west crossing of Fairfax street to the east crossing

l street and to lay a grooved rail and e and pave the space between said
d two feet on each side thereof, said to be done with vitrified brick on a concrete base,' is a necessary incident aving and improving of said portion of reet; that is, whether the public good reasonable and ordinary use of said of King street requires that said proails be used, provided said improve-King street is made as described in linance July 15, 1898, instead of alnding of the jury upon the first issue ly warranted by the proof. Nor do k there was any error in the final nt rendered by the court. It is true

e jury have found by their verdict, nse to the issues submitted, that the w in use by appellant on King street t obstruct the ordinary use of that when the proposed improvement is y the city of Alexandria as set out rdinance of July 15, 1898. They also hat the present rails are of approved
; that is, of such merit and excellence, aptation for the purposes for which e used, as should, in the opinion of the e approved by the city authorities of ria. The jury has also found by its that the substitution of the grooved proposed by the city is not a necesident to the paving and improving of reet with vitrified brick, and that the present use were at the time they id of the most improved pattern, and were then commonly in use, and were laid, not only without objection by the city, but with its approval and acquiescence.

Now, it may very well be that upon all these issues the jury were justified in all their findings by the evidence submitted to them; it might also be that the court was of the same opinion upon the evidence; and yet it is entirely consistent with both these concessions that its judgment non obstante veredicto should be affirmed.

The real issue to be considered and decided is this: Was the ordinance of the city a reasonable one, regard being had to all the circumstances of the case, or did the city council, in passing the ordinance, act capriciously and arbitrarily?

Its charter and the general law confer upon the city of Alexandria ample power to control and regulate the laying out, repair, and use of its streets. "To do so," said this court in Roanoke Gas Co. v. City of Roanoke, 88 Va. 810, 14 S. E. 665, "is a power essentially incident to the existence and well-being of every municipal corporation, and powers thus delegated are trusts held for the public good, are continuing, and cannot be contracted away; nor can the municipal authorities bind themselves by contract not to exercise them from time to time as the public good may require, * * * and of the necessity and expediency of the exercise of such power the city council, and not the court, is the judge." Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. City of Richmond, 26 Grat. 83; Davenport v. Same, 81 Va. 636; City of Charlottesville v. Southern Ry. Co. (Va.) 34 S. E. 98; Town of Harrisonburg v. Roller, Id. 523.

In Burkhardt v. City of Atlanta (Ga.) 30 S. E. 32, the court said: "An incorporated city is a government within a government. It has its own executive, judicial, and legislative branches. It is a creature of the state, and can exercise no power that is not derived from its creator.

"Where legislative power is conferred upon it by the state, it is necessary that a degree of freedom should be allowed in its exercise; otherwise, the city would be so hampered in the government of its people as would defeat the very ends of its incorporation.

"Hence it is that the courts will never interfere with the free exercise of such rights as are left to the discretion of a corporate authority unless such authority should go beyond the scope of power delegated, or unless the discretion given should be abused by an arbitrary exercise thereof, and by a plain and unwarranted violation of private rights."

Dillon on Municipal Corporations (section 95) says: "When a municipal corporation by its charter is empowered, if it deems the public welfare or convenience requires it, to open streets or make public improvements thereon, its determination, whether wise or unwise, cannot be judicially revised or corrected."

Mr. Justice Brewer, in St. Louis v. Western Union Tel. Co., 149 U. S. 465, 13 Sup. Ct. 990, 37 L. Ed. 870, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The city is given power to open and establish streets, to improve them, and to regulate their use, etc. The word 'regulate' is one of broad import. It is the word used in the federal constitution to define the power of congress over foreign and interstate commerce, and he who reads the many opinions of this court will perceive how broad and comprehensive it has been held to be. If the city gives a right to the use of the streets or public grounds, as it did by Ordinance No. 11,604, it simply regulates the use when it prescribes the terms and conditions upon which they shall be used. If it should see fit to construct an expensive boulevard in the city, and then limit the use to vehicles of a certain kind, or exact a toll from all who use it, would that be otherwise than a regulation of the use? And so it is only a matter of regulation of use when the city grants a telegraph company the right to use exclusively a portion of the street, on condition of contributing something towards the expense it has been to in opening and improving the streets.

"To the same effect, see Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196–203, 5 Sup. Ct. 826, 29 L. Ed. 158. 'The power to regulate commerce,' says Mr. Justice Field, speaking for this court, 'is the power to prescribe the rules by which it shall be governed; that is, the conditions upon which it shall be conducted.'

"If it be said in this case that the city had already regulated the use, by prescribing that there should be two tracks, the answer is that the power of regulation is a continuing power. It is not exhausted by being once exercised, and, so long as the object is plainly one of regulation, the power may be exercised as often as, and whenever, the common council may think proper. The use of the street may be subjected to one condition to-day, and to another and additional one to-morow, provided the power is exercised in good faith, and the condition imposed is appropriate, as a reasonable regulation, and is not imposed arbitrarily or capriciously." See, also, City of Baltimore v. Baltimore Trust & Guarantee Co., 166 U. S. 673, 17 Sup. Ct. 696, 41 L. Ed. 1160.

In Louisville City Ry. Co. v. City of Louisville, 8 Bush, 415, Judge Lindsay, speaking for the court, said: "We will not assume that the city government, in the exercise of the legislative power to regulate the reconstruction of the railway company on Jefferson street, acted capriciously or without sufficient reason. The presumption of the law is that it did not."

It is not necessary to make further citation of authority to show that the city council was clothed with ample power to control and regulate the streets of the city; that this was a continuing power, to be exercised as often and whenever the council may think proper, subject only to the limitation that it must act in good faith; that the regulation must be reasonable, and not imposed arbitrarily or capriciously,—the presumption being in favor of the propriety and validity of what the city has directed to be done.

Dillon on Municipal Corporations (section 327) says: "Whether an ordinance be reasonable and consistent with the law or not is a question for the court, and not the jury, and evidence to the latter on the subject is inadmissible.

"But in determining this question the court will regard all the circumstances of the particular city or corporation, the objects sought to be attained, and the necessity which exists for the ordinance. Regulations proper for a large and prosperous city might be absurd or oppressive in a small and sparsely populated town, or in the country."

Without going into the evidence in detail upon the subject of the reasonableness of the ordinance, we are of opinion that it clearly shows that there was no fraud in its passage; that the city did not act capriciously, but in accordance with what it deemed best to promote the interests confided to it; that the action it took was urged upon it by many of its citizens; that the rail adopted is that in use by the city of Washington as required by an act of congress of the United States.

It further appears that representatives of the appellant were invited to attend a meeting of the committee on streets and the city engineer, where the whole subject was carefully considered, and as a result of their deliberations the engineer and committee recommended the proposed rail to the city council, and they thereupon passed the ordinance requiring its adoption.

In view of these facts, it is manifest that the appellant has not overcome the presumption in favor of the reasonableness of the ordinance which it was ordered to obey; that it has not shown that it was passed arbitrarily or capriciously; and the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. COOPER.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 14, 1900.)

RAILROAD CROSSING—ACCIDENT—FRIGHTENING HORSES—NEGLIGENCE—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE.

1. A demurrer to the evidence is the proper mode of taking from the jury the determination of the weight to be given the evidence, and a motion to strike out is equivalent thereto.

2. Failure of the employés in charge of a locomotive to stop it or to give signals when approaching a crossing is not negligence, in case of a horse frightened thereby, but which was seen by such employés approaching the crossing too far off for a collision, and giving no indication of fright.

Error to corporation court of Danville.

Action by George K. Cooper against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Blackford, Horsley & Blackford, for plaintiff in error. Peatross & Harris, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. The defendant in error, George K. Cooper, sued the Southern Railway Company for injuries alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of the negligence of the defendant company, under the following circumstances:

Henry street crosses the Southern Railway near the northern boundary of that portion of the city of Danville known as "North Danville," and is a part of the road leading from Danville to the county of Henry. After leaving the more populous portion of North Danville, the street crosses what is known as the "Still-House Branch," and then, rising a considerable hill, something over 100 yards, crosses the Southern Railway at what is known as the "Henry Street Crossing." After leaving the Still-House Branch, going up the hill, there is a space of about 150 feet upon the right of the street along which a traveler in a buggy can see an engine or train coming from the north upon the Southern Railway. Part of this space has some trees upon it, but the view of an approaching train is not thereby obstructed, and the rest of the distance up to a woodyard is open, and the view of an approaching train is in no wise cut off. At a little over 100 feet from Henry street crossing there was at the time of this accident a woodyard between the street and the railway, with a fence around it, which, with other barriers, it is claimed, obstructed the view of the railway up to within a short distance of the crossing. On the afternoon of May 19, 1898, defendant in error, with a friend, was traveling northward on Henry street in a one-horse buggy. They had crossed the Still-House Branch, and had commenced to ascend the grade towards the Henry street crossing. They both say they were looking out for a passing engine, in order to avoid a collision therewith at the crossing,—one looking up and the other down the railway track,—but saw none and heard none. Henry street is 50 feet broad, and when the horse's head was about at the gate to the woodyard a yard engine of the plaintiff in error, which was moving down grade at a speed variously estimated at from 10 to 15 miles an hour, southward, towards the depot in Danville, as smoothly and noiselessly as an engine could be run, crossed Henry street in front of the defendant in error. As soon as he became aware of the approach of the engine, defendant in error, who was driving, thinking, as he says, the horse was likely to get scared at the engine, turned him so as to get him into the woodyard and keep him out of the view of the engine until he could control him; and in order to get him into the woodyard he backed the horse down the hill, pulling him to the right for the purpose of going through the gate. While in the act of doing this the horse became unmanageable, the buggy was overturned throwing its occupants out, and the horse ran off, whereby defendant in error received the injuries for which he was awarded in the court below $1,000 damages.

It further appears that the persons on the engine saw the buggy and defendant in error and his companion going up the grade towards Henry street crossing at a distance too far from the crossing to make a collision with the engine possible; and a person examined as a witness on behalf of defendant in error was in the woodyard, and also saw the men in their buggy going up the hill towards the crossing,—taking particular notice of the horse, as defendant in error had proposed to sell it to him; and all testify that the horse was going quietly along the street, at a distance from the crossing of about 55 feet, when the engine passed.

The statute in force in Virginia providing for signals at crossings, and requiring every locomotive engine to carry a bell, expressly exempts signals by whistling within the limits of an incorporated town or city; and in Danville, under the ordinance of the town, a whistle cannot be blown. In this case, according to evidence introduced by defendant in error, the whistle on the engine was not blown, nor the bell rung.

After the evidence for both plaintiff and defendant had been introduced, plaintiff in error moved the court to strike out all the evidence introduced by defendant in error, on the ground that, admitting every allegation therein proved to be true, it made no case against it, which motion was overruled, and an exception was taken, which constitutes the first assignment of error relied on here.

The exception is not well taken. Under our practice, the only mode of taking away from the jury the determination of the weight to be given to evidence is by demurring to it. A motion to strike out is not equivalent to a demurrer to the evidence, as counsel for plaintiff in error contends; citing Fowlkes v. Railway Co., 96 Va. 742, 32 S. E. 464. The decision in that case only recognized and applied the universally admitted law that the court determines whether evidence is admissible or not, and in the exercise of this function admits or excludes it, on objection to it when offered, or on motion to strike it out if it has been improperly admitted.

The defendant in error neither alleges in his declaration nor offers proof of any negligent act of plaintiff in error, done in the immediate vicinity of the highway upon which he was traveling, as causing his injuries, but relies merely upon the omission of plaintiff in error to give him signals or warnings of the approach of the engine at which his horse took fright, without a suggestion as to what signals or warnings should have been given him, other than the blowing of the whistle or ringing the bell. He states that he lived in North Danville; was familiar with the Henry street crossing and its surroundings; that he regarded his horse as gentle and safe; had driven it up to street cars; and that on the occasion of his injury he and his companion were only looking out to avoid a collision with an engine on the crossing they were approaching. The question presented, therefore, is, what duty did plaintiff in error, under the circumstances, owe to defendant in error, and fail to perform?

This may be disposed of in connection with the assignment of error to the rulings of the court below in refusing instructions Nos. 1, 3, 4, and 6 asked for by plaintiff in error, and in modifying its eighth instruction. They are as follows:

"No. 1. The court instructs the jury that under the law of Virginia, Danville being an incorporated city, the defendant had the right to omit the sounding of the whistle in approaching the Henry street crossing, where the accident occurred; and, if the jury believe from the evidence that the accident was caused by the failure to sound the whistle, the defendant was not negligent, and they must find for the defendant."

"No. 3. The court instructs the jury that the defendant had the right to presume that, the less noise made by the train in approaching the crossing, the less danger there was of frightening horses near the track; and, while the defendant would be liable for injuries caused by frightening horses by unnecessary noise, it is not liable for injuries caused by frightening horses too far off for collision, when it makes as little noise as possible.

"No. 4. The court further instructs the jury that, operating railroads by steam being lawful, the defendant had the right to run its engines and trains where they can be seen by man and beast,—the right to make the noises incident to the movement and working of its engines; and the defendant is not liable for injuries occasioned by a horse, when being driven on the highway, taking fright at the sight of an engine, nor at the noises usually made by a running engine."

"No. 6. The court further instructs the jury that the defendant's employés in charge of the engine had a right to presume that horses near the track would not be frightened by an approaching engine, and it was not their duty to stop the engine or to give any signals when the horse was seen approaching the crossing too far off for a collision, and giving no indications of fright when seen by some of the employés on the engine."

"No. 8. The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence in this case that an ordinance of the city of Danville prohibited the sounding of whistles upon the engine, which is charged to have caused the accident in question at the Henry street crossing, or at the point designated at the whistling post, then the failure to blow such whistle was not negligence."

The court struck out of instruction 8 the words "failure to blow such whistle was not negligence," and inserted in their stead, "defendant was not required to sound the whistle as it approached the crossing."

Where the statute imposes upon a railroad company the duty of sounding the whistle on its locomotive engines approaching a crossing of a highway, for the purpose of preventing a collision with travelers on the highway or frightening their teams, and the railroad company fails to perform that duty, it is negligence, for which the company would be liable for injuries resulting therefrom.

In Railway Co. v. Torian, 95 Va. 453, 28 S. E. 569, it was said that a railroad company is liable for injuries inflicted in consequence of sounding its whistle in a careless or reckless manner or at an improper time. This is unquestionably settled law, and it is equally as well settled that, where the violation of an ordinance or a statute is the proximate cause of an injury, the wrongdoer is liable therefor. 2 Elliott, R. R. § 711; Railroad Co. v. Hite, 81 Va. 771. If, therefore, it is negligence to sound, in violation of an ordinance or statute, the whistle on an engine approaching a highway crossing, it cannot, either upon reason or authority, be deemed negligence to omit doing so. In Railroad Co. v. Hite, supra, it was said: "Undoubtedly railroad companies have the right to run engines and cars over their own roads and in their yards, and, as a consequence, they have the right to make the usual and reasonable noises necessarily incident to a running train; and for the making of such noises, therefore, where they are neither negligently nor unnecessarily made, no cause of action will arise, although animals may be frightened thereby, and injury ensue.

"A railroad company is not liable for injuries received from horses becoming frightened upon a highway at the mere sight of its trains or the noises necessarily incident to the running of the train and the operation of the road." 3 Elliott, R. R. § 1264, and cases cited. Among the many authorities there cited is the case of Flint v. Railroad Co., 110 Mass. 222. In that case the plaintiff was injured by his horse becoming frightened by the cars on the defendant's railroad. It appeared that the railroad crossed the highway on which the plaintiff was traveling; that the horse became frightened when about 5 rods from the crossing by the approach of two cars, about 10 rods therefrom; that the cars were coming on a down grade, by the force of gravitation, at the rate of eight or ten miles an hour; and that no signals were given of their approach. Held, that these facts would not warrant the jury in returning a verdict for the plaintiff.

In Favor v. Railroad Corp., 114 Mass. 352, the court lays down the broad doctrine that a railroad company has the right to do lawful acts upon its own premises, and is not ble for injurious consequences that se from such acts, unless the acts ligently and improperly done; but, ourt adds: "If the defendant in this d done some negligent act in the of the highway, calculated to en- the safety of travelers passing over horses, a very different question e presented." That is to say, that he railroad is using its property in a way, doing no negligent act in the te vicinity of a highway, calculated nger the safety of travelers passing with horses, and an injury is sus- y reason of horses on the highway g frightened by an engine or train it, the railroad company is not erefor. Railway Co. v. Schmidt, 134 33 N. E. 774; 1 Thomp. Neg. § 15; v. Railroad Co., 156 Mass. 159, 30 9; 2 Wood, R. R. § 324.

it the purpose of gates at a street to warn persons traveling the street at a sufficient distance to prevent rses from becoming frightened by an r train, as they are only lowered to eet travelers off of the crossing until oaching engine or train passes. As l by this court in Richmond Union y. Co. v. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co., 373, 32 S. E. 787, it is a matter of knowledge that the tendency of gates ate keeper at railroad crossings is to safety; but their utility as a warning lers to keep at a safe distance, to pre- ir horses from becoming frightened, does not appear in the case at bar, nor is it a matter of common knowledge. Had there been a watchman at Henry street crossing, it could not have been reasonably expected of him to stop defendant in error at a greater distance from the crossing than 55 feet, in order to prevent his horse from taking fright at the passing engine. According to his own statement, he was driving his horse quietly along the street, too far away from the crossing to make a collision with the engine possible. Had the man in charge of the engine, seeing defendant in error driving his horse quietly towards the crossing, in no possible danger of a collision, and no noise being made on the engine other than that incident to a running engine, immediately proceeded to sound the whistle, at which the horse took fright, and injury to defendant in error ensued, it might have been reasonably claimed that plaintiff in error was guilty of negligence in recklessly and unnecessarily sounding the engine's whistle. Railway Co. v. Torian, supra.

Instruction No. 8, as asked for by plaintiff in error, simply told the jury that if they believed from the evidence that an ordinance of the city of Danville prohibited the sounding of the whistle upon the engine, which was charged to have caused the accident in question, at the Henry street crossing, or at the point designated as the whistling post, the failure to blow such whistle was not negligence. It correctly propounded the law, and should have been given as asked.

Plaintiff in error's instruction No. 1, refused, was to the same effect, and should have been given.

It follows from what has already been said that we are further of opinion that plaintiff in error's instructions 3, 4, and 6 correctly propounded the law, and should have been given.

Without these instructions to the jury qualifying instruction No. 1 given for defendant in error, that instruction was plainly erroneous, in that it left the jury free to find a verdict for defendant in error on the sole ground that plaintiff in error omitted to sound the whistle on the engine when it approached the Henry street crossing.

The remaining assignments of error will not be considered, as they are either without merit, or are not likely to arise on another trial.

The judgment of the corporation court must be reversed, the verdict of the jury set aside, and the cause remanded for a new trial to be had in accordance with this opinion.

LAND v. SHIPP et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 14, 1900.)

DOWER—RELEASE—SEPARATION AGREEMENT—VALIDITY—JOINTURE.

1. Married Woman's Act, c. 103 (Code, § 2284), declaring that a married woman may contract with reference to her separate estate, which shall consist of her property at the time of marriage, or afterwards acquired, the rents and profits thereof, rights of action, damages for wrong, and compensation for property taken for public use, does not authorize her to release to her husband her inchoate right of dower in his lands, since such right is not a property right, within such provision.

2. A consideration to a wife for a deed of separation between herself and her husband, in which she releases her dower, need not be returned, as a condition for the assignment of dower, at the death of the husband, in lands conveyed by him during life, since the release was absolutely void, and the deed of separation in no way affected her rights.

3. A deed of separation, by which the parties agreed to each control their separate property, and release their rights of dower and curtesy, cannot be considered a statutory jointure, under Code, §§ 2270, 2271, providing that a conveyance or devise may be taken in lieu of dower, which shall constitute a bar thereof, unless on the death of the husband the wife elects to take dower instead of the jointure.

4. A husband and wife executed a deed of separation, mutually releasing dower and curtesy; and subsequently the husband executed a trust deed on real estate, in which the wife did not join. The debt secured thereby was not paid, and the premises were sold on foreclosure, from the proceeds of which the debt secured, as well as a debt secured by a prior trust deed on the same property, in which the wife joined, were paid. Held that, since the release of the wife's dower was absolutely void, she was entitled, on the death of her husband, to dower in said land, as if no agreement had been made.

Appeal from circuit court, Princess Anne county.

Action by Laura L. Land against H. E. Shipp and Emerson Land for dower. From a dismissal of the bill, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Burroughs & Bros., for appellant. William McK. Woodhouse, for appellees.

CARDWELL, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Princess Anne county, and the case is as follows:

Appellant, Laura L. Land, intermarried with John W. S. Land March 9, 1890, and they lived together as husband and wife till June 27, 1896, when they signed and acknowledged a deed of separation, which was admitted to record in the clerk's office of Princess Anne county court. The deed recites that "owing to an incompatability of temperament, the parties mutually find it impossible for them to live happily and congenially together as husband and wife, and desired that each shall have the same liberty of person and personal rights, and the same power to manage, control, use, alien, or convey their respective separate estates, both real and personal, which they or either of them now own or may hereafter acquire, as if they were unmarried." The consideration stated is the premises, and $400 in cash paid by the husband to the wife, followed with a mutual agreement "that from that date the parties will live separate and apart from each other; that each shall and will refrain from interfering with the person or property of the other; that they mutually and severally release and quitclaim dower, tenancy by the curtesy, and all other rights which they may respectively acquire or may have already acquired, by reason of their marriage, in the property of each other; that each shall enjoy free from molestation or interference of the other, the same freedom of person, the same rights of person and property, and the unrestrained power to manage, control, use, transfer, assign, alien, or convey his or her separate estate then owned or thereafter acquired, as if they had never been married." They further mutually covenanted and agreed that the child born to them should remain in the possession of the mother, free from the management and control of the father, and he to be in no manner held responsible for the support and maintenance of the mother or child.

On the date of the deed of separation the husband executed a deed of trust, in which the wife did not unite, upon a tract of land (about 132 acres) situated in Princess Anne county, and the only real estate owned by the husband, to secure the payment of a debt of $569.47 for borrowed money, and out of which the $400 was paid to the wife.

Default having been made in the payment of the debt secured by this trust deed, the property was sold by the trustee, in the lifetime of the husband, to H. E. Shipp, at the price of $3,050; and after the payment of the costs of sale, a debt of the husband, secured by a former trust deed on the property, in which the wife did unite, and the debt of $569.47, with interest, secured by the deed under which the trustee sold, the balance of the purchase money was paid over by the trustee to the husband. H. E. Shipp sold and conveyed the land on the 26th of May, 1898, to Emerson Land, at the price of $3,500, having previously sold the timber on it for $250; and, her husband having died, appellant instituted this suit against H. E. Shipp and Emerson Land, appellees, claiming dower in the land, and in the proceeds from the timber sold therefrom by Shipp. She alleges in her bill that she was forced by her husband's threats of violence to execute the deed of separation from him, of June 27, 1896, but this is not clearly shown by the proof. Therefore appellees contend: First, that appellant is bound by the provisions of the deed of separation which relate to her dower, and, having relinquished it by deed duly of record, she cannot, after the death of her husband, assert her right of dower in the lands of which he was seised during the coverture; and, second, that, if the deed of separation did not release or relinquish appellant's dower in the land, she cannot assert claim to it, and retain the money paid her in lieu thereof.

To sustain the first contention, it is necessary to regard the wife's inchoate right of dower in her husband's lands as her statutory separate estate, with reference to which she has the power, under the married woman's act (chapter 103 of the Code), to contract. Sections 2501 and 2502 of the Code provide how deeds or conveyances by the husband and wife may be acknowledged for recordation, and the effect of such conveyances, when recorded, upon the dower of the wife, or her estate in the lands conveyed. They are substantially the same as the provisions in the Codes of 1873 and 1860 relating to the acknowledgment, recordation, and effect of a deed by husband and wife, when recorded, upon the dower of the wife, etc., except that the privy examination of the wife is dispensed with.

In Switzer v. Switzer, 26 Grat. 574, the question was raised as to the effect of the acknowledgment of a deed of separation between husband and wife under these statutes as they formerly stood, and it was held that they only applied to conveyances from husband and wife to a third party. Says the court in the opinion, by Staples, J., "It is the union of the husband and wife, as grantors, that makes the instrument operative." The court in that case, expressly waiving the decision of the general question as to whether any deed of separation was valid to any extent or for any purpose, held that a contract or agreement for separation, made directly with the husband, is void as to the wife, as her legal existence is merged in his, and she is presumed to be acting under his influence.

The married woman's act makes no reference, directly or indirectly, to the rights of the wife in the husband's property, real or personal, acquired by the marriage. It simply enlarges the powers of the wife over property declared in the act to be her separate estate. There is nothing whatever in the act conferring upon the wife the power to contract generally, whether she had separate estate or not. Hirth v. Hirth, 98 Va. —, 34 S. E. 964. Instead of enlarging the scope of the statute as it originally stood, and which makes provision as to how the wife may relinquish her right of dower in her husband's lands, the legislature has, since the passage of the married woman's act, restricted its scope by adding the following words thereto: "Such writing shall not operate any further upon the wife or her representatives by means of any covenant or warranty contained therein which is not made with reference to her separate estate as a source of credit, or which if it relate to her said right of dower, or to any estate or interest conveyed other than her own, is not made with reference to her separate estate as a source of credit. Section 2502 of the Code. The plain purpose of this amendment and its effect are, not the enlargement of the scope of the statute by reason of the married woman's act, but a restriction so as not to affect the separate estate unless the covenants in the deed were made with reference to her separate estate as a source of credit.

In Mason v. Mason, 140 Mass. 63, 3 N. E. 19, the wife, by her deed, made in her husband's lifetime, in consideration of $300 paid her by the husband, or out of his estate, undertook to convey to a son of the husband, and one of the devisees under his will subsequently made, all right, title, and interest which she then had or might thereafter have in her husband's estate; expressly referring to her right of dower. After the husband's death the wife claimed dower in his estate, and the same defense was made to her demand as is made in the case at bar; and it was held that the wife's inchoate right of dower was not separate estate that the wife might dispose of in the life of the husband, that such a conveyance did not bar her dower, and that she was not compelled to refund the $300, as a condition of having her dower assigned. The opinion expressly says that the statute in force in Massachusetts conferring upon a married woman the power to make contracts must be limited in construction so as to exclude the right of a married woman to make contracts for the conveyance of her right of dower.

In White v. Wager, 25 N. Y. 328, it was held that the disability of a husband to take land by conveyance from his wife is not removed by the statute enabling her to devise and convey as if she were unmarried.

In Flynn v. Flynn, 171 Mass. 312, 50 N. E. 650, 42 L. R. A. 98, it was held that, until the husband's death and the actual assignment of the dower, the wife or widow has no "estate" in the land, but her interest is an inchoate charge, of a peculiar nature, which, while it may be released to a vendee of the husband, cannot be assigned or conveyed to any other. In Moore v. New York, 8 N. Y. 110, which was also a proceeding to condemn lands of a married man under the New York statutes, it was insisted that the wife was a necessary party defendant; but the court held, as in the case of Flynn v. Flynn, supra, that she was not, for the reason that, while her inchoate right of dower in the land was an interest which might be released, it was not the subject of grant or assignment, "nor is it in any sense an interest in real estate."

We are cited by counsel for appellees to Jones v. Fleming (decided by the court of appeals of New York) 104 N. Y. 418, 10 N. E. 693, and Rhoades v. Davis, 51 Mich. 306, 16 N. W. 659, as holding that the wife's inchoate right of dower is her separate estate, which she may release to her husband by virtue of the married woman's act.

The case of Jones v. Fleming is very unlike the case at bar. In that case the contract was between the children of the husband by a former marriage, the committee of the husband (a lunatic), and the wife, by which the wife, in consideration of $3,400 and the settlement of certain suits as to alimony, agreed to release her right of dower in the husband's lands. The contract was with a third party, the children of the husband, not a contract with the husband. Besides, the court had, in several previous cases, decided that a married woman, under their statute, had the power to contract generally, and whether she had separate estate or not at the time of the contract was immaterial. Ackley v. Westervelt, 86 N. Y. 448; Tiemeyer v. Turnquist, 85 N. Y. 516. This is contrary to the views expressed by this court in construing our married woman's act. Hirth v. Hirth, supra.

In Rhoades v. Davis, supra, the supreme court of Michigan, construing the statute of that state very similar to our married woman's act, does hold that a married woman's release to her husband of her dower right, if made for a good consideration and without fraud or improper dealing, is binding upon the wife. In other words, the court took the view that the act permitting the wife to dispose of her interests as if single empowered her to contract with reference to her inchoate right of dower in her husband's estate, regarding her dower interest as her statutory separate estate.

In this view we are unable to concur. It is not in accord with the trend of the decisions of this court holding that the married woman's act gives to the wife such estate as is indicated by the plain words of the statute, and such control of it as the statute directs, and that in all other respects the relations of husband and wife as to property remain unaltered. Section 2284 of chapter 103 (married woman's act) is specific in enumerating the various species of property that constitute the separate estate of a married woman; and it is not possible, we think, by any liberality of construction, to bring the inchoate right of dower in lands of which the husband is seised during the coverture within its provisions.

The only ground upon which appellant could be required to refund the $400 paid to her by her husband, before having dower assigned in the lands in question, is that the deed of separation of June 27, 1896, created a statutory jointure, and that she cannot retain the jointure and have dower in the land. Sections 2270 and 2271 of the Code, as to jointure, differ from jointure at common law only in that under the statute it may be of personal as well as real estate. At common law the essentials of jointure were: It must consist of an estate or interest in land, to take effect in possession or profit immediately on the death of the husband, and must be made in satisfaction of the dower, and so appear in the deed. It is an absolute bar only when made before marriage. If made after marriage, it only puts the wife to her election whether to accept the provision or claim dower.

Under the statute, as well as at common law, a provision in lieu of dower is to take effect at the death of the husband; for it is then that the widow is put to her election as to whether she will accept the jointure, or claim dower in her husband's estate, and the provision of the statute is that, "when she shall elect and receive her dower, the estate so conveyed or devised to her shall cease and determine." Code, § 2271.

If, after the husband's death, the widow accepts the provision made for her in lieu of dower, she bars herself of dower; but if she has received the provision during her husband's life, and has spent or wasted it, she may take the dower as if it had not been made. It is necessary, in order to estop her, that she should have enjoyed the provision, or a part, at least, after her husband's death. 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 911, and authorities cited.

The deed of separation in this case contains none of the elements of a jointure. It is nothing more or less than an attempt to dissolve the marital relations between the parties, to obtain from the wife a release, directly to her husband, of her inchoate right of dower in his estate, and to place upon her the support of herself and the child of the marriage. In the condition in which the wife was thereby placed, the money consideration for entering into the contract was readily consumed in the use for the support of herself and child.

The wife being without power to make such a contract it is absolutely void as to her, and therefore does not bar her dower in the lands of which the husband was seised during the coverture.

Nor can she, upon equitable grounds, as is contended, be required to refund the $400 paid her as in lieu of her dower. Her claim to dower is a common-law right, which she could enforce at law or in equity. True, she chose to assert her claim in a court of equity, but she is not seeking equitable relief in the cancellation of a release or relinquishment of her dower. She is entitled to dower in the estate of her husband to the extent to which she has not released or relinquished it in a manner authorized by law, and her right is in no way affected by the deed of separation of June 27, 1896.

The learned judge of the court below, having taken the view that appellant was not, by reason of the deed of separation, entitled to dower at all in the lands in question, did not, of course, pass upon the character or extent of her dower interest therein. She claims dower in the lands, and in the proceeds from the sale of the timber thereon by appellee H. E. Shipp. It is contended for her that as the debt secured by the trust deed upon the land made by the husband during the coverture, in which she united, had been satisfied, her right of dower in the land was again in full vigor, although the debt thereby secured was paid out of the proceeds from the sale of the land by the trustee in the subsequent deed of the husband, in he wife did not unite. In this view not concur. The deed of separation nullity as to appellant, her right of in her husband's estate at his death w are the same as if it had never ıtered into; that is to say, the sale trustee in the subsequent deed of ven by the husband during the cover- l not affect appellant's right of dow- ıe land to any further extent than a conveyance by the husband to the pur- would have affected her right. BUCHANAN, J. In the year 1866 the National Express & Transportation Company executed a deed of trust conveying all of its assets, of every kind and description, to three trustees for the purpose of securing its creditors. But little was done towards executing the trust until the year 1871, when a bill was filed by one of the creditors, in behalf of himself and such other creditors as became parties and contributed to the expenses of the suit, for the purpose of enforcing the trust. By a decree entered on the 14th day of December, 1880, the surviving trustees, one of the three having died prior to that time, were, by and with their consent, removed as trustees, and John Glenn, the appellee's intestate, substituted in their stead. Mr. Glenn at once entered upon the discharge of his duties, and continued to act as such until his death, March 30, 1896.

The compensation of the trustees for executing the trust was fixed by the deed at 5 per cent. commissions on the moneys received by them. The court allowed the substituted trustee 10 per cent. for his services on the moneys received, and this action of the court is assigned as error.

The contention of the appellant is that, where the compensation of a trustee is fixed by the instrument creating the trust, no greater compensation can be allowed him without the consent of the other parties to be affected by the increased allowance. The correctness of this proposition of law, as a general rule, does not seem to be controverted by the appellee's counsel; but they insist that it has no application to this case, because it became necessary for the court by its decree to create, not only new duties not contemplated by the original trust deed, but to create, in fact, a new trust estate, over which its appointee should perform the duties created by the decree itself; or, in other words, that he occupied the position of receiver, rather than of trustee, to execute the orders of the court in carrying out the purposes of the deed of assignment. This contention we do not think can be sustained. From the fourth and fifth paragraphs of the decree of December 14, 1880, it is clear that the appellee's intestate was substituted as trustee in lieu of the former trustees, and not appointed receiver. Those paragraphs are as follows:

"And it appearing to the court that said John Blair Hoge and John J. Kelly, surviving trustees in said deed, are willing, each to resign and renounce the office of trustee under said deed, and that they are so situated as not to be able efficiently to perform the duties of the same, and that it is right and expedient, under all the circumstances, that they be relieved from the said trusteeship, the court doth adjudge, order, and decree that the said John Blair Hoge and John J. Kelly, surviving trustees, of themselves and C. Oliver O'Donnell, under the said deed, bearing date the 20th day of September, 1866, executed to them by the said National Express and Transportation Company, in trust for the benefit of its creditors, be, and they are hereby, respectively, removed from the office of trustee under this deed.

"And it further appearing to the court that John Glenn, Esq., of number twelve St. Paul street, in the city of Baltimore and state of Maryland, is a fit and proper person to execute the duties of said trust, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the said John Glenn be, and he is hereby, substituted and appointed trustee in the said deed in the room and stead of the said Hoge and Kelly, with all the rights and powers, and charged with all the duties, of executing the trusts of said deed, to the same effect as were the original trustees therein. And the said John Blair Hoge and John J. Kelly are authorized and directed to transfer and deliver to the said John Glenn, substituted trustee as aforesaid, all of the books and papers of the said National Express and Transportation Company, of every kind and description, and all of the estate and property of said company of every kind and description, now in possession of them, the said Hoge and Kelly, or either of them, and the receipt of the said John Glenn to them for the same shall be full acquittance and discharge therefor.

"But the said John Glenn is not to take possession of said property, books, and papers, or receive any money, as such substituted trustee, until he, or some one for him, shall enter into bond, with good security, before the clerk of this court, in the penalty of one hundred thousand dollars, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties as such trustee."

The substituted trustee, in the language of the decree appointing him, was "clothed with all the rights and powers and charged with all the duties of executing the trusts of the said deed, to the same effect as were the original trustees." All the estate of the company, of every kind and description and wherever situated, including the unpaid and uncalled for stock subscriptions, passed to, and was vested in, the original trustees by the deed of assignment for the benefit of its creditors. This was so declared by the decree substituting the trustee, and was so held by this court in Lewis' Adm'r v. Glenn, 84 Va. 947, 965, 6 S. E. 866. Requiring the trustee to collect stock subscriptions which had not been called for when the deed of trust was made, but which were called for by the court after the substituted trustee was appointed, was not, as the appellee contends, imposing any new duty upon the substituted trustee, but was merely requiring him to perform a duty imposed by the deed of trust. The collection of that asset was as much a part of the duty of the original trustees or of the substituted trustee, when the necessity for its collection arose and calls were made for it by the directors of the company or by the court, as was any other duty imposed by the trust. We are of opinion, therefore, that the duties performed by the substituted trustee were such duties, and only such duties, as were imposed by the deed of trust, and necessary to its proper execution, and that for performing those duties he was entitled to the compensation provided in the deed, and that the court had no more right to increase his compensation beyond that provided for by the trust without the consent of the other parties in interest than it would have had to decrease it without his consent. Perry, Trusts, § 919; Burrell, Assignm. § 418.

But it is insisted that, even if the court had no authority to make the increased allowance, the appellants have lost their rights to have the decrees complained of reviewed and reversed by reason of their failure to object to the court's action at the proper time, and their long acquiescence in what was done.

In determining this question, it will be necessary to refer briefly to the proceedings in the cause.

The substituted trustee retained as compensation for his services the commissions provided by the deed of trust until April, 1886, when he filed his petition asking for increased compensation. At the same term of the court one of its commissioners was directed to inquire and report what additional compensation, if any, should be paid the said trustee for his services in executing the deed of trust.

In December following the commissioner reported that an additional commission of 5 per cent. upon all the trustee's collections, up to May 5, 1886, which amounted to $155,162.03, or $7,758.10 in addition to the compensation allowed him by the terms of the deed, would not be more than what his services were really worth, and recommended that such additional commissions be allowed him if the court had authority to allow any compensation beyond that fixed by the deed of trust, but reported that in his opinion the trustee was bound by the terms of the trust, and that no extra compensation could be charged to the fund, although he was further of opinion that the creditors who had largely benefited by his services

lly adhere and refer." In the sub-settlements of the trustee's accounts, nd including that filed May 8, 1893, nt. commissions on his receipts were allowed him for his services, and confirmed by the court without exceptions.

The commissioner in his reports of June 28 and June 30, 1894, reporting settlements of the trustee's accounts in which 10 per cent. commissions were allowed the trustee, called the court's attention to certain allowances to the trustee, including his commissions, and suggested that under the then condition of the trust they were perhaps not just or proper.

When these reports came before the court, in accordance with the suggestions made by the commissioner, and for the better information of the court and the parties, the commissioner was directed, among other things, to inquire and report as to the suggestions made by him in the reports referred to as to the justice and propriety of allowances to the trustee, in the present and approximate condition of the trust estate, for the following charges, to wit: (1) As to office rent; (2) as to clerical services; and (3) as to 10 per cent. commissions on gross receipts of the trust fund.

In the reports made pursuant to that order, and filed, respectively, April 26 and May 24, 1897, the commissioner was of opinion that, although the court had decided that it had the right to allow the trustee compensation beyond that provided for in the deed of trust, the evidence did not show that his services had been such since January 1, 1893, as to entitle him to increased compensation, and recommended that only the commissions fixed by the deed of trust be allowed. The trustee excepted to these reports on this ground. The court sustained the exception, and continued the allowance of 10 per cent. commissions by its decree of April 9, 1898.

On the 2d day of May, 1898, the appellants filed their petition and supplemental petition, praying the court to rehear and reverse its action in allowing the trustee's compensation in addition to that provided for in the deed of trust, and to correct certain other alleged errors.

The court, by its decree of July 18, 1898, upon the motion of the personal representative of the trustee, refused to grant the relief sought, and dismissed the said petitions, and also dismissed the case as to the trustee's estate.

From that decree this appeal was allowed.

Conceding that the decree of January 18, 1887, which held that the court had the power to allow the trustee compensation for his services in addition to that provided for in the deed of trust, was such a decree as the appellants had the right to appeal from, they were not bound to appeal from it. It was an interlocutory decree, and while, by virtue of section 3454 of the Code, a party is given the right to appeal from certain interlocutory decrees if he desires to do so, he is not bound to appeal from such decrees at the time they are rendered, but may do so at any time within a year after a final decree has been rendered in the cause, provided all the other requisites for an appeal exist. Jameson v. Jameson's Adm'x, 86 Va. 51, 9 S. E. 480, 3 L. R. A. 773; Harper v. Vaughan, 87 Va. 426, 12 S. E. 785. No final decree was entered against the appellee until the 18th day of July, 1898, when the case was dismissed as to him. The decree of April 9, 1898, was not, as so earnestly insisted by the appellee, a final decree.

A decree approving and confirming a report settling the accounts of the personal representative of a trustee, and ascertaining the balance due from his decedent's estate to the trust estate, without giving judgment against him for the same, or making any other disposition of it, or without dismissing the case as to him, cannot be regarded as a final decree under our decisions.

It is further insisted that, inasmuch as the appellants failed to except to the reports of the commissioner which allowed the additional compensation to the trustee, they cannot raise the question in this court.

If the propriety of the additional compensation allowed depended solely upon the facts before the commissioner, then it would have been necessary to have excepted to the commissioner's reports in which it was allowed; but the question is, had the court, under any state of facts, authority to allow the trustee greater compensation for executing the trust than that fixed by the terms of the trust? This was a question of law, and the commissioner in his report filed in December, 1886, reported that in his opinion the court had no such authority. To this report the trustee excepted, and the court sustained his exception, and held that it had such authority, and decreed additional compensation. This question of law having been thus expressly raised and decided by the court, it was not necessary, even if it would have been proper, to have excepted to the subsequent reports of the commissioner on the same ground. Why require the creditors to raise, and the court to pass upon, the question of its authority to allow additional compensation upon the coming in of every settlement of the trustee's accounts in which such allowance was made, when that question had been before distinctly raised and expressly passed upon by the court?

It is further insisted that the appellants have lost the right of appeal because Mr. Howard, their counsel, agreed that, notwithstanding the fact that he differed with the court as to its power to allow the trustee additional compensation, he would not contest the matter. It is true Mr. Howard does state in his deposition that he did not appeal from the court's action allowing such compensation because he wished the trustee to be fully compensated. Such a statement as this is clearly no such agreement as would prevent the appellants from appealing. There is no pretense that there was any consideration for it. Even if the appellants themselves had told the trustee that they did not intend to and would not appeal, it would not have prevented them from appealing unless there had been a consideration for it or the trustee had acted upon such statement to his prejudice; and of this there is no evidence.

The fact that the appellants received the several sums decreed them from collections made by the trustee was not, as appellee insists, a waiver of their right of appeal as to the sums allowed the trustee as additional compensation for his services. Where a decree is entered for less than the party claims, receiving payment of the sum so decreed is not a waiver of errors, nor does it estop him from appealing from the decree, so far as it does not allow him what he claimed. Morriss v. Garland's Adm'r, 78 Va. 215; Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3, 2 Sup. Ct. 25, 27 L. Ed. 346.

The second assignment of error is to the allowance made to the trustee for office rent. It is conceded by the stipulation of counsel filed in the cause that no exceptions were made to allowances for office rent prior to February 21, 1895, when the report of the commissioner settling the trustee's semiannual accounts numbered 19 and 20 was excepted to on that ground. Up to that time, only a little over a year before the trustee died, all the parties in interest seem to have thought that the charges made and allowed for the office rent were reasonable and proper. The court, after the matter had been specially referred to and reported upon by the commissioner, considered the allowance proper, and continued it.

The trustee, in administering a trust of the magnitude of that intrusted to him, could hardly be expected to furnish free of cost a place in which he could give his attention to its business, where his clerk could work, and where the mass of books and papers belonging to the trust estate could be kept. Without laying down any general rule upon the subject, we are not prepared to say that, under all the facts and circumstances of this case, the court erred in making the allowance complained of.

The next assignment of error is to the action of the court in allowing to the trustee the sum of $750 per annum for clerk hire. By the express terms of the trust, authority was given to employ, at the expense of the trust, such agents, counsel, attorneys, and servants as the trustee should deem necessary for its proper execution. No objection was made to the allowance for clerk hire until February 21, 1895, although it had been allowed since the 1st of January, 1885. The record shows that the employment of a clerk was necessary, and that the person employed was very efficient and worth the sum paid him. The commissioner thought the allowance proper, and that it ought to be continued. The court was of the same opinion, and very properly so decreed.

ast assignment of error is to the ac- the court in not requiring the trustee interest on the balances remaining in ds at the dates of the various settle- By the terms of the decree by which ostituted trustee was appointed, he ected, after paying the necessary and costs and expenses of executing the to deposit his collections in the Plant- tional Bank of Richmond to the credit court in the cause, and to file certifi- such deposits with the clerk of the o make report to the court from time and to settle his accounts before one commissioners of the court at least ix months. It is ed in argument that the reason why s not done was because the trustee mpelled to bring suits against delin- tockholders for their unpaid subscrip- l over the country; that there were ls of these suits brought; and that necessary for the trustee at all times under his control moneys sufficient the necessary expenses attending igation. Be that as it may, the trus- ained the money in his hands. His ents as reported to the court by the sioner showed this, and that he was rged with interest on them. No ex- was made to any of these reports on ound, and no objection ever made on ound, so far as the record shows, in y, until after the trustee's death, and he commissioner, in making his report ril 26, 1897, was asked by the appel- file a special statement showing the balances left in the trustee's hands settlement. It may be that the trus- not correctly construe the decree of rt, and that he ought to have been with interest on the balances found hands when his accounts were set- ut during the many years the trustee ecuting the trust, and until his death, rties, as well as the commissioners ttled the accounts, and the court approved and confirmed them, seem concurred in the trustee's construc- the decree, and that he was not ble with interest on said balances. eason is shown why the appellants except to the settlements of the trus- counts when they were reported to rt and confirmed; why they did not he question earlier. To allow them nder the facts and circumstances of se, to make the question, and have tee charged with interest on said bal- would encourage the grossest negli- n litigants, and might result in great e to the estate of the trustee, who, the record shows, rendered in the performance of his duties as trustee the most laborious, faithful, and fruitful services. This assignment of error cannot be sustained.

We are of opinion that the decrees complained of must in all respects be affirmed, except in so far as they allowed compensation to the trustee in addition to that provided by the terms of the trust; that in that respect they must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, with directions to disallow said additional compensation in settling the accounts of the trustee as to the appellants in this cause.

REED v. COMMONWEALTH.

HOMICIDE—COURT — JURISDICTION — PLEA OF NOT GUILTY—WITHDRAWAL—EVIDENCE—RES GESTÆ—INSTRUCTIONS—WITNESSES — OFFICER IN CHARGE OF JURY — ADMINISTERING OATH.

1. Transcribing on the minute book of the county court a judgment of the circuit court reversing a judgment of such court was a sufficient compliance with Code, § 4060, providing that the judgment of the appellate court shall be certified to the court to whose judgment the writ of error was allowed, which shall cause the same to be entered on its order book as its own judgment, and the county court had jurisdiction to retry such case.

2. The court's refusal to allow defendant to withdraw his plea of not guilty, and file a plea in abatement on the ground that two members of the grand jury who found the indictment against him were disqualified by reason of being overseers of the road, was a proper exercise of the court's sound discretion.

3. Where defendant, having shot deceased, was stopped by another, who, seeking to restrain him, was also shot by him, and killed, evidence of the other killing was admissible as part of the res gestæ.

4. How a bystander dodged or fell when shot by defendant, who was pursuing deceased, was irrelevant.

5. Where defendant, on trial for the murder of his wife, had testified as to having written her letters, in which he claimed to have reformed his habits, and wished to take her to live with him, evidence that defendant was drunk on his meeting with his wife and for some time previously was admissible in rebuttal.

6. The admission of evidence after the close of defendant's case, though not in rebuttal, was within the sound discretion of the court.

7. An instruction that, to sustain provocation as a defense to murder in the first degree, it must be shown that defendant, at the time of the killing, was deprived of the power of self-control by the provocation received, did not preclude the jury from finding defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, when taken in connection with other instructions defining murder in the first degree, and that a mortal wound without provocation is prima facie evidence of a willful and premeditated killing, and was not erroneous.

8. Where no provocation was shown for a homicide, refusal to give an instruction as to different degrees of provocation was not error.

9. Giving an instruction in a criminal case not applicable to the facts is not ground for reversal, unless the principle stated is erroneous, or might confuse or mislead a jury.

10. The fact that one of the deputy sheriffs who had charge of the jury in a criminal case was a witness for the state as to statements made to him by defendant is no ground for reversal of a conviction in such case.

11. Where the record showed that a jury, on adjournment from day to day, was placed in the custody of the proper officer of the court, but did not show that the usual oath was administered to him, a conviction will not be reversed because of such omission.

12. Where defendant, who had separated from his wife, visited her, and, after passing the day in a friendly manner, without provocation picked up a gun and shot her twice, a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree will not be set aside as contrary to the law and the evidence.

Error from Madison county court.

Grant Reed was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he brings error. Affirmed.

J. L. Jeffries and C. F. McMullan, for plaintiff in error. The Attorney General, for the Commonwealth.

CARDWELL, J. At the April term of the county court of Madison county, 1899, plaintiff in error was indicted for murder of his wife, Minnie Reed. He demurred to the indictment. His demurrer was overruled, and he was thereupon arraigned, and pleaded not guilty, and the case was set for trial on the 4th day of May next succeeding. The trial was then had, and a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree was rendered, and the prisoner was sentenced to be hanged; but a writ of error was obtained from the circuit court, which set aside the verdict and awarded a new trial. At the July term of the county court the prisoner obtained a continuance of the case to the next term, in August, 1899, when he was again tried and convicted of murder in the first degree, whereupon he applied to the judge of the circuit court for a writ of error, which was refused, and the case is before us upon a writ of error awarded by a judge of this court.

When the case was called for trial at the August term, 1899, the prisoner objected to proceeding with it, on the ground that section 4060 had not been complied with, and therefore the case was not properly in the county court, which objection was overruled, and the prisoner excepted.

Section 4060 of the Code provides that the judgment of the appellate court shall be certified to the court to whose judgment the writ of error was allowed, which shall cause the same to be entered on its order book as its own judgment. In this case the judgment of the circuit court reversing the judgment of the county court was transcribed upon the minute book of the county court on the first day of its July term, 1899. We are of opinion that this was a substantial compliance with the provisions of section 4060 of the Code.

At the August term the prisoner moved the court to allow him to withdraw his plea of not guilty entered at the April term, and to permit him to file a plea in abatement, upon the ground that two members of the grand jury who found the indictment against him were disqualified by virtue of being overseers of the road. The overruling of this motion constitutes prisoner's second assignment of error.

It was said by this court in Early's Case, 86 Va. 924, 11 S. E. 795: "By pleading the general issue alone, a defendant has always been understood to waive the right to interpose afterwards a plea in abatement. The settled doctrine, however, is that the judge may permit a pleading to be withdrawn, and another one to be substituted, wherever by so doing he does not violate any positive rule of law or of established practice. But such discretion will rarely, if ever, be exercised in aid of an attempt to rely upon a merely dilatory or formal defense." In that case the identical exception was made to the disqualification of a grand juror as in the case at bar, but the court, after making the observation quoted, could not see "from the record that this discretion had been improperly exercised" by the trial court, and therefore held that there was no error in overruling the prisoner's motion.

In Curtis' Case, 87 Va. 589, 13 S. E. 73, the same question was again under consideration by this court. There the prisoner upon his arraignment pleaded not guilty, upon which plea alone, as in the case at bar, the trial was had. The verdict was afterwards set aside, and a new trial awarded, and thereupon the prisoner undertook to contest the validity of the indictment on the ground that the grand jury had been improperly summoned. The court, however, citing 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 756, and reaffirming its ruling in Early's Case, supra, held that "it is well settled that objections to the mode of summoning a grand jury, or to the qualifications of particular jurors, must be made at a preliminary stage of the case,—that is, before a plea to the merits; otherwise, they will be considered as waived, unless the proceedings be void ab initio."

After the general issue or any plea in bar it is too late to plead in abatement, except on leave to withdraw the former, because the plea in bar admits whatever is ground for abatement. To the same effect is the ruling of this court in Watson's Case, 87 Va. 612, 13 S. E. 22.

In U. S. v. Gale, 109 U. S. 65, 3 Sup. Ct. 1, 27 L. Ed. 857, it was held that, where the objection is founded upon the irregularity in summoning the panel, or upon the disqualification of particular grand jurors, it must be taken before pleading in bar. Says the court in that case: "It would be trifling with justice, and would render criminal proceedings a farce, if the rule were otherwise."

The exception upon which this assignment of error is founded is wholly formal, and, taking fully into consideration the fact urged by prisoner's counsel that he was comparatively a stranger among strangers when put upon trial for the offense of which he has been twice convicted, it in no way appears that the county court in any wise abused its sound discretion in overruling his motion to permit him to withdraw his plea of not guilty and enter his plea in abatement.

Before entering upon a consideration of the remaining assignments of error, it is needful to make a brief statement of this case.

The prisoner married the deceased in 1894, and they thereafter lived together unhappily in Pittsburg, Pa. In October, 1898, his wife came to Madison county, Va., upon a visit to her parents, where she remained until the homicide. The prisoner visited his wife in January, 1899, and upon this visit conducted himself in a very objectionable manner. His wife then refused to return to Pittsburg with him. On the 30th of March, 1899, he left Pittsburg for another visit to his wife in Madison county. He reached Culpeper on Saturday, April 1st, where he became intoxicated, and was so offensive that he was unable to obtain a conveyance to Madison until the afternoon of that day, and reached the house of his wife's parents about night, where he was received, and given supper, but was refused permission to spend the night. He spent the night at the home of a relation of the family near by, and returned to his father-in-law's the following morning in time for breakfast, and engaged in apparently friendly conversation with his wife before and after this meal. After breakfast, the prisoner, with his wife and child, took a walk into the woods, where they remained some two hours, and on return he ate dinner with his wife, and afterwards walked arm in arm to the fence with her, and kissed her twice good-bye as he was leaving with Peter Jackson, his father-in-law. He and Peter Jackson spent some portion of the afternoon of that day upon the mountain, and returned before sunset; Peter Jackson much intoxicated, but prisoner not so much so. The prisoner then loaded his breech-loading gun, and, with his little child, went into the woods to shoot a bird. He soon returned, went into supper, placing his gun near his seat. After being seated a few moments, upon hearing his wife close the front door of the house, and coming as if to join them at the meal, he at once rose from the table, left the room, taking his gun in hand, remarking that he wished to have a word with his wife. He had gone only five or six steps out of the door when he was heard to ask his wife for the child, and she, in reply, asked him "what he could do with it," when he shot her; whereupon the father rushed from the table to the rescue of his daughter, but before reaching her there is a second shot, and the wife, bleeding, is seen to flee through the house in the direction of a neighbor's, some 400 yards distant. The father endeavors to obtain the gun, and in the altercation the prisoner succeeds in loading it and fatally shooting him, and at once continues the pursuit of his wife, overtaking her within about 100 yards of her destination, where he throws her down, and is apparently endeavoring to do her serious bodily harm. Two men come out of the house to which deceased was fleeing for safety, and attempt to rescue her, but desist at the point of the prisoner's gun and threats to kill them if they did not retire, which they did, followed in a moment or so by deceased, who had in some way extricated herself. She had not gone, however, more than 50 yards, and was about to pass through the gate of said neighbor's house, when prisoner overtook her, and fired at a distance of 6 or 8 feet, the shot taking effect in the back of her neck, producing instantaneous death.

Pauline Jackson, a witness for the commonwealth, while testifying on her examination in chief, began to tell of the killing of Peter Jackson, to which evidence the prisoner excepted, but the court overruled the exception, and this ruling constitutes the prisoner's third assignment of error. The killing of Peter Jackson was but a part of the tragedy in which the prisoner's wife lost her life, and for which he was on trial, and the witness relates these plain but connected facts, which form a vital link in the chain of the evidence as to the general conduct of the prisoner, and essentially a part of the res gestæ. We are of opinion, therefore, that the assignment of error is not well taken.

This witness was asked by the attorney for the commonwealth "whether or not she saw her father dodge or fall after being shot?" to which question counsel for the prisoner objected, and the attorney for the commonwealth withdrew the question, to which the prisoner's counsel also objected on the ground that, if any of the facts as to the killing of Peter Jackson went to the jury, all should go; but the court permitted the question to be withdrawn, and this ruling constitutes prisoner's fourth assignment of error. The conduct of Peter Jackson when he was shot was purely irrelevant matter, and it cannot be conceived how the prisoner could have been prejudiced by this ruling of the court.

The fifth assignment of error relates to the admission of evidence to show that the prisoner was drunk at Culpeper on the day of his arrival, and continued in that condition to the evening of his arrival at the home of his wife. The prisoner had testified and had referred to letters he had written his wife in which he claimed to have reformed his habits and declared his purpose to take his wife back with him to Pittsburg, or live happily with her anywhere, if she would try him one more time. It was in rebuttal of the prisoner's evidence in these respects that the testimony as to his conduct at Culpeper and his condition to the evening of his arrival at the home of his wife was admitted. His whole conduct preceding the murder, as well as after, could be shown, in order that the jury might be in full possession of all the facts incident to the preparation and consummation of the crime; and we are of opinion that the court did not err in admitting this evidence.

The sixth assignment of error was not argued here, and is without merit.

The seventh error assigned is to the action of the court in permitting Lula Jackson and General Jackson, witnesses for the commonwealth, to testify as to the relations that existed between the accused and the deceased. The principal objection urged to the admissibility of this evidence is that it comes after the evidence of the prisoner had been closed, and not in rebuttal of any evidence which he had introduced. It has over and over been held by this court that the order in which testimony is admitted lies in the sound discretion of the trial judge, and his ruling in this respect will not be reversed unless it is manifest that that discretion has been abused. Burke v. Shaver, 92 Va. 352, 23 S. E. 749, and authorities cited. We see nothing in this assignment of error to warrant us in holding that the county court abused its discretion in admitting this testimony after the prisoner had introduced his evidence; nor can we see that he was prejudiced by its introduction.

The eighth assignment of error relates to the refusal of the court to give instruction No. 6 offered by the prisoner, and the giving of instruction No. 4 asked for by the commonwealth.

The theory of prisoner's defense is that he was crushed by his wife telling him, on the walk in the woods in the morning, that she was pregnant by another man, and, being intoxicated, he was suddenly excited by having his child snatched from him as he was taking it away, and being struck in the back; that, as a consequence, he became enraged, lost all self-control, and without thought or reflection he fired the shot.

Of the 15 instructions to the jury asked for by the prisoner all were given except his sixth, which is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the prisoner committed the homicide charged in the indictment in the heat of passion, excited by a reasonable provocation which caused him to do the act without premeditation, and yet which was insufficient to deprive him of the power of self-control, in that case he is guilty of murder in the second degree; but if the provocation which he received was such as to reasonably deprive him of the power of self-control at the time the homicide was committed, then they should find him not guilty of murder, but of manslaughter."

In lieu of this instruction, instruction No. 4 offered by the commonwealth was given. It is in these words:

"That, to sustain provocation as a defense to murder in the first degree, it must be shown that the prisoner, at the time of the fatal shot, was deprived of the power of self-control by the provocation which he had received; and in deciding the question whether this was or was not the case regard must be had to the character of the provocation, the nature of the act by which death was caused, to the time which elapsed between the provocation and the act which caused death, to the offender's conduct during the interval, and all the circumstances tending to show the state of his mind at the time he committed the act."

It is contended that in the refusal to give prisoner's instruction No. 6 and in giving the commonwealth's instruction No. 4 in lieu thereof the jury were precluded from finding the prisoner guilty of murder in the second degree.

Instruction No. 1 offered by the commonwealth defines murder in the first degree as any willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing. By instruction No. 2 the jury were further told what constitutes a willful and premeditated killing. By instruction No. 3 the jury were further told that a mortal wound given with a deadly weapon in the previous possession of the slayer, without any or slight provocation, is prima facie a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, and throws upon the accused the necessity of proving extenuating circumstances. To these instructions the prisoner makes no objection; and immediately following them is the instruction No. 4 in question, by which the court directs the jury that, to sustain provocation as a defense to murder in the first degree, it must be shown that the prisoner, at the time of the fatal shot, was deprived of the power of self-control by the provocation received.

In view of the fact that there is no evidence in the record even tending to show any sort of provocation for the pursuit of the deceased and the firing of the final and fatal shot, the instruction complained of could not possibly have been construed by the jury as telling them that, unless the provocation the prisoner claimed to have received was such as to naturally and reasonably deprive him of his power of self-control, they must find him guilty of murder in the first degree. They could not have understood the instruction, read in connection with the other instructions given, as telling them more or less than that, if they believed from the evidence that the killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated, it was murder in the first degree; and in deciding whether or not the prisoner was deprived of the power of self-control by the provocation which he had received regard must be had to the character of the provocation, the nature of the act by which death was caused, to the time which elapsed between the provocation and the act which caused death, to the offender's conduct during the interval, and all the circumstances tending to show the state of his mind me he committed the act. There is, e, nothing whatever in the instruc- ecially when considered in the con- in which it is given, that could have he jury into the conclusion that they ly find the prisoner guilty of man- r or murder in the first degree, and ot find him guilty of murder in the egree.

ontrol determines malice, and, as self-control exists, the crime is mur- he first or second degree, to be de- d by other facts than the varying de- the provocation. It is true that 's instruction No. 6 is taken from the ons approved by this court in Hodges' Va. 265, 15 S. E. 513, but the evi- that case was very different from ence in this. so read and considered, the instruc- the case at bar set forth the law ase upon the whole evidence correct- airly.

roper, however, that we should con- e exception to the sixth instruction the instance of the commonwealth. follows:

"That if the jury believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the prisoner gave the deceased the wound from which she died, as charged in the indictment, and that though he was, at the time of committing the act, so intoxicated as rendered him incapable of forming a willful, deliberate, and premeditated purpose, yet if they believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the prisoner, before becoming intoxicated, or while he was, though drinking, still in a condition in which he was capable of forming a willful, deliberate, and premeditated purpose, had formed a willful, deliberate, and premeditated purpose to kill the deceased, and that he afterwards, in pursuance of that purpose, so formed, gave the deceased the wound from which she died, as charged in the indictment, then they are instructed that such an act upon the part of the prisoner, though he may have been intoxicated at the time of committing it, constituted in the eye of the law a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, and as such is murder in the first degree."

It is conceded that the instruction announces a correct legal proposition, but it is claimed that it has no application to the case, inasmuch as there is no evidence tending to show that the prisoner became intoxicated for the purpose of committing the homicide which he had previously designed to commit.

This court says in the opinion in Hodges' Case, supra,—and it has been often repeated,—that the court cannot be required to instruct juries on mere general, abstract principles of law, however correct, unless these principles are applicable to the case. And it is settled law that a judgment of the trial court will not be reversed for the refusal to give an instruction, though announcing a correct principle, where there are no facts in the case to which it applies; but, conceding that there is no evidence in this case tending to show that the prisoner became intoxicated for the purpose of committing the homicide which he had previously designed to commit, the question still to be determined is, does the giving of the instruction constitute error for which the judgment of the court on the verdict should be reversed? We are of opinion that the question must be answered in the negative. The giving of an instruction stating an abstract principle of law in a criminal case is not an error unless the principle stated is erroneous. Sack. Instruct. Juries, p. 17. In Upstone v. People, 109 Ill. 169, where this precise question arose, it was held that the giving of an instruction stating an abstract principle of law not applicable to the case would not be error unless the principle stated were erroneous.

Doubtless, if it could be seen in any case that such an instruction did confuse or mislead, or might have confused or misled, the jury, the giving of the instruction would be ground for reversal of the judgment of the trial court; but where this does not appear, as in the case before us, we do not think that the judgment of the lower court should be reversed for the giving of such an instruction.

Marvin Pattie, one of the deputy sheriffs, who, along with the other deputies in whose charge the jury had been placed during the trial, was called as a witness for the commonwealth, testified as to statements voluntarily made to him by the prisoner the evening of and after the homicide, but before witness became deputy sheriff; and on this ground the prisoner, after the verdict, moved for a new trial, which motion was overruled, and this ruling of the court is made the ground of the prisoner's tenth assignment of error. We are of opinion that there is no merit in the assignment. It is an old and frequent practice, it may be said, for sheriffs and their deputies who have charge of juries under like circumstances to testify in cases, but we have no case in the state which sustains the incompatibility here contended for. In the supreme court of Michigan this question was twice passed on, and it was held that a conviction will not be reversed because the officer who attended the jury was a witness for the people. People v. Coughlin, 65 Mich. 704, 32 N. W. 905; People v. Beverly, 108 Mich. 500, 66 N. W. 379.

In State v. Shores, 31 W. Va. 490, 7 S. E. 413, the court says: "The mere fact of the sheriff having the jury in his custody could not disqualify him from being a witness; neither could the fact that he was a witness disqualify him to keep the jury in his custody."

The next error assigned relates to the refusal of the prisoner's motion for a new trial, made on the ground that, upon the jury being adjourned from day to day, and placed in the custody of the sheriff, the record fails to show he was instructed not to speak to them himself, nor to allow any one else to speak to them, touching the trial. In the prisoner's bills of exceptions Nos. 4 and 5 the court certifies that at the beginning of the trial all the officers in charge of the jury were duly sworn with the usual oath to keep the jury during the trial when in the absence of the court. It is not contended in the argument here that the jury were not in the custody of the proper officer of the court at any time during the trial, but it is urged that when the record shows that the jury were adjourned from one day to another it ought also to show that upon such adjournment they were committed to the custody of the proper officer of the court, to whom the usual oath was administered. The case of Polky Barnes, 92 Va. 794, 23 S. E. 784, is cited as supporting the objection made to the record in this case, but we are unable to see that the objection is within the scope of the ruling in that case. The conviction was reversed in that case because the record failed to show affirmatively that upon the adjournment of the court from day to day the jury were placed in custody of the proper officer of the court. Here the point of objection to the record is that it does not show that the usual oath was administered to the officers in charge of the jury on each occasion during the trial when the jury were out of the presence of the court.

In Bennett v. Com., 8 Leigh, 745, it was held that the sheriff is bound ex officio to keep the jury when adjourned in a criminal cause, and it is not indispensably necessary that he be sworn, though it is generally done out of abundant caution. But, if it were admitted to be necessary, the court would be bound to presume that in fact the sheriff was sworn when the record does not show the contrary.

Where the record shows, as it does in this case, that at the beginning of the trial all the officers in charge of the jury were duly sworn with the usual oath to keep the jury during the trial when in the absence of the court, it is to all intents and purposes a compliance with the "salutary and wise rule of practice" recognized and approved in the Polky Barnes' Case, supra.

The remaining assignment of error is to the refusal of the court to grant the prisoner a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence.

It is needless to say more of the evidence in detail than is to be found in the statement of the case already made. This was a fiendish murder, perhaps not surpassed in atrocity by any to be found in the annals of the commonwealth. The defense the prisoner attempted to set up is conclusively shown to have been groundless; in fact, it is wholly contradicted by his own confessions. His conduct when the horrible deed was committed was that of a cool, self-contained man; and, when asked the cause of his murderous act, simply replied that the woman was his wife. It is, therefore, plain that the jury could not have found, in accordance with the evidence, any other verdict than that of murder in the first degree.

The judgment of the county court is affirmed.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION — LIMITATION OVER — REMAINDER — NATURE OF ESTATE — SEPARATE ESTATE OF MARRIED WOMAN.

1. Where, in a will probated in 1847, a life estate was bequeathed to testator's daughter, with remainder to her children, followed by an executory bequest to other legatees in the event she "should die without issue," the issue meant was such children, and not issue at large, and so the failure of issue contemplated was a definite, not an indefinite, failure; and, the failure contemplated having happened,—that is, the donee for life having died childless,—the limitation over took effect.

n, Hatcher & Martin, for plaintiff McNeill & Levy, for defendant in ONS, C. J. The litigation in this or money bequeathed by Thomas gh to his daughter Sarah Amanda will probated in 1847. This money, ned, was received from the executor mmin W. Clark, who was the hus- Sarah Amanda, and is now the in- epresented by the defendant in er- fourth and sixth items of said will, in substance, one bequest, so far uestion involved is concerned, read ys: "I give and bequeath to my Sarah Amanda, and after her death to her child or children, * * * two hundred dollars in cash, the possession * * * to be given when she marries or becomes of the age of twenty-one years." "It is my will and desire that if my daughter Sarah Amanda should die without issue, that all the property bequeathed by the foregoing items * * * shall revert to, and be equally divided among, my surviving children."

1. Did the daughter of the testator take an estate for life or an estate tail under this bequest? The answer is to be found in the law existing when the will took effect. Hertz v. Abrahams (Ga.) 36 S. E. 409, this day decided. The court below sustained the defendant's contention that the bequest created an estate tail in the daughter, which, under our act of December 21, 1821, gave her the absolute fee to the money. We think this decision of the court below is clearly wrong. It cannot be disputed that a devise to A., and after her death to her child or children (whether she has a child or children at the time of the devise or not), would give a life estate to A., with remainder in fee to her children then in being or afterwards born. See the resolution at end of Wild's Case, 3 Coke (Rev. Ed.) 290, 6 Coke (Old Ed.) 17b; Woodright v. Wright, 10 Mod. 376; Ginger v. White, Willes, 353; Miller's Lessee v. Hurt, 12 Ga. 357, 360, where the resolution in Wild's Case is copied in full; Jones v. Jones, 7 Ga. 76; Jennings v. Parker, 24 Ga. 621; Sharman v. Jackson, 30 Ga. 224; Herring v. Rogers, Id. 615; Sanford v. Sanford, 58 Ga. 259; Gaboury v. McGovern, 74 Ga. 144; Brown v. Brown, 97 Ga. 539, 25 S. E. 353, 33 L. R. A. 816. Such a devise is entirely different from one to A. and her children, she then having no children, as is pointed out in Wild's Case, and in Ginger v. White, Miller's Lessee v. Hurt, Sanford v. Sanford, and Brown v. Brown, supra. And in 3 Jarm. Wills (Rand. & T. Ed.) p. 184, it is said that a devise "to A. and his wife, and after their death to their children, * * * it is now admitted on all hands gives an estate for life to the parents, with remainder to their children, so that the notion as to its being an estate tail (is) clearly untenable." Now, this being true, what is the legal meaning and effect of the subsequent words in this will, "if [she] should die without issue," which follow the remainder in fee to the children? Simply, if she should die without such issue, namely, children. In 3 Jarm. Wills, p. 256, that learned author says: "It is well settled, also, that words importing a failure of issue (without the word 'such'), following a devise to children in fee simple or fee tail, refer to the objects of that prior devise, and not to issue at large." On page 260 he quotes as follows from Lord Cottenham: "A gift to A. for life, with remainder to the children of A. in fee,—that is, the children of A. in fee generally,—and a gift over on the death of A. without issue, means such issue; that is, children. In such cases the general term 'issue' is construed to mean that particular description of issue before specified, namely, children." The cases cited by him on pages 256–268 amply support his position. On page 281, after a review of all the cases favorable to and apparently against this view, he submits the following conclusion or rule: "That the words, 'in default of issue,' or expressions of a similar import, following a devise to 'children in fee simple,' mean in default of children. * * * This is free from all doubt." In Blackborn v. Edgley (1719) 1 P. Wms. 600, 605, the devise was to A. for life, and after his death to his eldest son in tail, but, if A. should die without issue, to B. The court held, Lord Chancellor Parker delivering the opinion, that the words, "if he should die without issue," following the devise in remainder to the son, must be intended, "if he should die without such issue,"—that is, the son. And in Goodright v. Dunham (1779), 1 Doug. 264, the devise was to A. for life, and after his death to his children, and, in case he died without issue, to B. Lord Mansfield said (page 267): "Neither side thought it could be maintained that A. took an estate tail. The words, 'and in case he dies without issue,' being tacked to the preceding clause, must mean the same thing as, 'and in case he dies without children.'" This case is directly in point. See, also, Morse v. Marquis of Ormonde, 5 Madd. 99, 113; De Haas v. Bunn, 44 Am. Dec. 201. As the above authorities clearly show that the bequest in the case now under consideration gives an estate for life to the daughter, with remainder to her children, but, if she should die without children, then to the testator's other children, the cases of Miller's Lessee v. Hurt, supra; Sanford v. Sanford, supra; White v. Rowland, 67 Ga. 546; and Haddock v. Perham, 70 Ga. 572 (Syl., points 2, 5), 577,—are therefore direct authorities in favor of the plaintiff in error. And hence it also follows, from these decisions, that the claim of the defendant in error that the husband of the life tenant took the bequest as heir of their infant children, the husband and child having both died before the tenant for life, is clearly untenable. If the bequest in this case had been immediately to the daughter and her children (she then having no child), but, if she should die without issue, then over, the contention of the defendant in error would have been correct, under the cases of Brown v. Weaver, 28 Ga. 378, and Wiley v. Smith, 8 Ga. 551; because an immediate devise to A. and her children (she having none) would, of itself, be an estate tail under one of the resolutions in Wild's Case and under all subsequent authority, and, of course, a limitation over, after such an estate, upon A. dying without issue, would not have made a different estate when the testator in this case died. But such is clearly not the bequest in the present case, and none of the cases cited for the defendant in error on the question of an estate tail are applicable to it.

2. A remainder can be created in money. Thornton v. Burch, 20 Ga. 791 (Syl., point 3), 793; Chisholm v. Lee, 53 Ga. 611; Phillips v. Crews, 65 Ga. 274 (Syl., point 2); McCook v. Harp, 81 Ga. 229, 7 S. E. 174; Gairdner v. Tate (Ga.; this term) 35 S. E. 697. In Phillips v. Crews, where the law is clearly stated, the court held as follows: "A life estate in money, with a remainder over, may be created. Money may be lost, but it should not be destroyed in the use." And also that section 2253 of the Code of 1873 (now Civ. Code, § 3088), prohibiting the creation of a remainder in property that is destroyed in the use, "does not allude to money, but to such things as perish with the usage." An executory devise of money, limited upon a definite failure of issue, is valid. Pinbury v. Elkin, 1 P. Wms. 563; Id., 2 Vern. 758, 766; Scott v. Price, 2 Serg. & R. 59, 7 Am. Dec. 629; Rowe's Ex'rs v. White, 16 N. J. Eq. 411, 84 Am. Dec. 169; Smith, Ex. Int. §§ 232, 233. The will directed that the executor should pay the money to the daughter to whom the life estate was given when she should arrive at 21 years of age or marry. The daughter married Benjamin W. Clark. If the bequest had given her a separate estate, the will, which was the law for the executor in this case, expressly required the possession of the money to be given to her. In such event, he could not hold the money, and pay her only the income thereof. But, as the bequest did not create a separate estate in the daughter, under the law as it then stood the marital rights of the husband attached. Bryan v. Duncan, 11 Ga. 67; Wade v. Russell, 17 Ga. 425, where there was a bequest of money payable to daughters when they arrived at 21 years of age or married; Andrews v. Bonner, 26 Ga. 520. This gave the husband an estate for life in the money during the wife's life, with the concomitant right of possession, and this imposed upon the executor the duty of delivering the money to him.

3. The evidence offered by the plaintiff to show the payment by the executor to the husband of the life tenant was a return made under oath of the executor to the court of ordinary having jurisdiction of the estate, and approved and ordered recorded by that court, and duly recorded, prior to 1852. This return was rejected as evidence on the ground that no vouchers accompanied the return, and none had been produced; that all the money required to be paid to all the legatees under the will was lumped by the executor in one item of his return; and that the return was simply a memorandum or statement made by the executor ex parte, and was therefore hearsay, as against Benjamin W. Clark, who was not connected with the estate. The act of 1810 required four things after the executor's return was prepared: (1) that it be submitted in term time; (2) that it ified by the oath of the executor; (3) t be accompanied with the necessary ers; and (4) that the court of ordinary, examining the return and vouchers, approbate or reject the return, and, vas approved, should order the return recorded. The act of 1820 changed the 1810 in one respect, namely, that the with the necessary vouchers, could be tted in vacation to the clerk of ordi- who could qualify the executor as to rrectness of the return, and, after in- ng the return and vouchers, make a l report thereon to the next court of ry. The court then acted on such re- and, if the court approved it, the re- vas thereupon ordered to be recorded. r of these acts required the original ers to be recorded, but evidently meant he office of the court of ordinary be in their place of naked deposit; e acts do not provide for a return of uchers to the personal representative. s the act of January 21, 1852 (Acts p. 97), which provided for the record original vouchers, and required the ry to return them to the personal rep- ative after they were recorded. Nor e acts of 1810 and 1820 require copies vouchers to be attached to the re- This was first provided for by sec- 2488 and 2490 of the original Code; e act of April 18, 1863 (Acts 1862–63, 8, 139), amended those sections so as ke it optional with executors, adminis- s, guardians, and trustees, in making eturns, to attach copies of their vouch- have their original vouchers recorded eturned to them. When the court of ry approved the return which was tted in the present case, and ordered orded, it was the act of a court of tent and general jurisdiction over the t-matter. Of course, if the return ot been verified by the oath of the or, no presumption could arise in its from the order of the court of ordina- proving it, because the return would on its face that it was illegal. In oth- rds, it would impeach itself, and therefore, not be prima facie evi- of its correctness. Smith v. Griffin, 102. So, if the return had been ver- y the oath of the executor, but had been approved and ordered to be re- by the court of ordinary, it would prima facie evidence of its correct- because it would then be merely the ation of an interested party, and for that reason, be inadmissible as facie evidence. Hudson v. Hawkins, 274, 278, 4 S. E. 682. But when the as in this case, was duly verified by ecutor, and approved and ordered to by the court of ordinary, and there ing apparent upon the return to sug- at it is fraudulent, especially as the ood before 1852, when the vouchers were not required to be recorded, it is admissible as prima facie evidence in favor of the executor to support his statement of expenditures therein. Brown v. Wright, 5 Ga. 29; Ragland v. Justices, 10 Ga. 65, 68; Barnes v. Stephenson, 22 Ga. 209; Smith v. Griffin, 32 Ga. 102; Saxon v. Sheppard, 54 Ga. 288. In Ragland v. Justices, supra, the court, speaking of a return duly approved and recorded, said: "It is the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, * * * and, as such, it is sufficient to admit the return in evidence." And in Saxon v. Sheppard, McCay, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "The whole effect of a return to the ordinary turns on the fact that that officer, whose duty and jurisdiction it is to examine and pass upon it, has done so. It is his judgment, and not the return, which is the evidence." This judgment, in reference to annual or partial returns, is not intended to mean a final, conclusive judgment, but rather a judgment de bene esse, which is to be used in proper cases as prima facie evidence, and such is the law in many of the other states. 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) pp. 1310–1319; note 86 Am. Dec. 143–146. The object of the acts of 1810 and 1820 requiring the returns to be recorded was "that wards, distributees, legatees, and all other parties in interest may know the condition of, and their rights in, the estate represented by an executor, administrator, or guardian, as the case may be, and that they [the trustees] may have a perpetual memorial for their protection." Ragland v. Justices, supra. No one could doubt that, if Mr. Clark had sued the executor for this money, the return, duly approved and recorded, would have been prima facie evidence of payment in favor of the executor, just as a similar return was decided in Barnes v. Stephenson, supra, to be such evidence for the purpose of reducing a note that the executor in that case had given the husband for his wife's legacy, and upon which suit was brought by the husband against the executor. Likewise, if the executor, after the death of the wife and life tenant, could have sued the husband for his money for the use of either the remainder-man or executory devisees, the return would in such case be prima facie evidence of payment; for it is the judgment of the court of ordinary, approving and passing to record the return, which is the prima facie evidence in favor of the truth of the return, and a receipt is nothing more than such evidence. Hence we know of no legal or substantial reason why a remainder-man or executory legatee, either before or after the executor's death, who is the possessor of the legal title and right of action, may not submit such returns of the executor as prima facie evidence of payment by the executor in a suit by them to recover the money bequest from the personal representative of the life tenant, who,

by reason of his marital rights, had become the tenant pur autre vie, or from his personal representative. The returns are not made evidence in favor of the executor by any statute, and they may be used against him. Section 2490 of the original Code, which says, "The return thus allowed and recorded shall be prima facie evidence in favor of the administrator of its correctness," is not a codification of the act of 1810 or the act of 1820, or even the act of 1852, but is a codification of the decisions of this court rendered before 1852, and from that time to the publication of the first Code, in cases between parties interested in the decedent's estate and his personal representative. And there is nothing in those decisions which expressly excludes the right of all interested persons other than the personal representative to use such returns as prima facie evidence of payments made by the personal representative, such as by heir against heir, by legatee against legatee, by heirs or legatees who are sued by a creditor of the intestate or testator after the death of the personal representative, or by remainder-men or executory legatees who are entitled to bequests of money when they sue the representative of the deceased life tenant for such bequest. In such cases it is simply the use of a judgment de bene esse of the court of ordinary as prima facie evidence between parties interested in, and connected with, the estate. And this ought especially to be the rule where, as in the case now under consideration, a great many years have elapsed since the return was approved by the court of ordinary, and duly recorded, and it was shown that the original vouchers could not be found in the office of the ordinary which was their place of naked deposit under the law of force when the return was made. We therefore think that the return of the executor was admissible for the plaintiff in this case as prima facie evidence only, the effect of which, as decided in Smith v. Griffin, supra, is "to shift the onus,—to establish the fact in issue,—unless rebutted by the party sought to be affected by it." Counsel for the defendant in error admit the payment by the executor in their written argument by saying that the evidence shows that the persons entitled to the ulterior bequest, of whom the intestate of the plaintiff in error was one, had consented to the executor's paying the money to Mr. Clark, which, counsel contended, was per se a release of both the executor and Mr. Clark from all liability to them. Of course, legatees sui juris can divide the estate among themselves in a manner different from that directed by the will, after the testator's legal debts are paid. But was there in this case any legal agreement to do so? The executor needed no release from the ulterior legatees, because, with or without their consent, the will imposed upon him the duty of paying the principal of this money legacy to the life tenant when she married, and, of course, to Mr. Clark, who claimed it under his marital rights as the husband of the life tenant; and this is the extent of the right, namely, the legal right, which the ulterior legatees evidently consented that Mr. Clark should have in the money. We find no evidence of a release by these legatees of the absolute interest in the money to Mr. Clark, and, if such a release exists, it must be based upon some valid consideration to make it binding on the ulterior legatees. Bruton v. Wooten, 15 Ga. 570; Burns v. Hill, 19 Ga. 22 (Syl., point 4).

4. That remainder-men or their personal representatives may maintain an action against the administrator of a life tenant for a money request which had been received by such life tenant from the executor of the testator is not an open question in this state. Phillips v. Crews, 65 Ga. 274. Hence there is no reason for denying this right to an executory legatee who is entitled to the money.

5. If we are correct thus far, the questions then arise: Who finally took under the ulterior bequest to the "surviving children" of the testator? and what was the nature of the estate so bequeathed? According to the spirit of the early English decisions and of our own cases, such as Vickers v. Stone, 4 Ga. 461, there is no doubt that the term "surviving children" included all the children of the testator who survived him, other than the daughter who was described as the life tenant. At the same time, there is also no doubt that as their estate was wholly dependent upon the life tenant dying without children, which was upon an uncertain event, they took a contingent estate, which vested, not at the death of the testator, but at the death of the life tenant without children then living. Olmstead v. Dunn, 72 Ga. 861, 862; Payne v. Rosser, 53 Ga. 663; Smith, Ex. Int. §§ 86, 90, 128, et seq. And such would be the nature of the estate of the executory legatees if they had been expressly named in the will. Olmstead v. Dunn, supra. The bequest is an executory or future estate, and not an executed or present estate. Blackstone's definition of an "executory devise," very frequently cited by courts and adopted by legal lexicographers, is as follows (2 Comm. 172): "An executory devise of lands is such a disposition of them by will that thereby no estate vests at the death of the devisor, but only on some future contingency." Therefore an executory bequest is such a disposition of personalty or money by will that thereby no estate vests at the death of the testator, but only on some future contingency. That a devise or bequest to A. for life, and after her death to the testator's "surviving children," would give the surviving children a vested remainder from the death of the testator Error from superior court, Chatham county; R. Falligant, Judge.

Action between Emma E. Hertz and others and C. S. Abrahams, administratrix. From a judgment Hertz and others bring error. Affirmed.

U. H. McLaws and Saussy & Saussy, for plaintiffs in error. Garrard, Meldrim & Newman, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. The record discloses that Dr. Moses Sheftall, of Savannah, Ga., made his last will in 1849, and died in 1850. By the first item of his will he devised the real property in dispute as follows: "I give and bequeath to my sister, Mrs. Perla S. Solomons, wife of Lizar Solomons, my brick store on Congress street, not subject to her present husband's debts or her future husband's debts; and in case my sister, Mrs. Perla S. Solomons, has no issue, the said store to go to my niece, Miss Nelly Sheftall Cohen, and to be settled on her," which is equivalent to a devise to A. for her separate use, and, in case she has no issue, to B. There are no superadded words explaining the term "issue" in this item. In another item the testator devises a separate piece of real property to Mrs. Solomons, and, in case she leaves no issue, to go to another niece. Mrs. Solomons, several years prior to her death, in 1897, made her will, and devised the property in dispute to the defendant in error, who is her adopted daughter. The plaintiffs in error are the heirs at law of Miss Cohen. The contention of the plaintiffs in error is that Mrs. Solomons, under the first item of the will, took a determinable or defeasible fee, and, upon her death without issue, the absolute title then passed to them as the heirs at law of Miss Cohen, the executory devisee. The contention of the defendant in error is that the devise created an estate tail, which our act of December 21, 1821, converted into a fee-simple estate in favor of Mrs. Solomons, the first taker, and therefore the latter had the full right and power to devise the property in fee simple to the defendant in error. The court below sustained the last given contention, and this is excepted to by the plaintiffs in error.

1. The intention of the testator must govern the construction of his will, if legal; and this intention may be conclusively shown by the unambiguous words of his will. If the intention thus shown is illegal, it must yield to the rules of law. Civ. Code, § 3324; 10 Bac. Abr. 538; Choice v. Marshall, 1 Ga. 102–104; Carlton v. Price, 10 Ga. 497; Robert v. West, 15 Ga. 123, 141; Cook v. Walker, Id. 465; Smith v. Dunwoody, 19 Ga. 259; Carroll v. Carroll, 25 Ga. 260; Felton v. Hill, 41 Ga. 569; Gillespie v. Schuman, 62 Ga. 253. As Judge Lumpkin aptly said in Smith v. Dunwoody, supra: "So long as a testator does not infringe the rules of law, he has the right to say, with Staberius, when he imposed an unpalatable condition in his will, 'Sive ego prave seu recte, hoc volui.' But if he proposes doing an illegal act,—as creating a perpetuity,—or uses words to create one estate when he designed another, in these and innumerable other cases which might be cited his intentions will be defeated. How frequently are courts obliged to say, in the construction of wills, in conflicts between intention and technical rules and expressions, 'Voluit, sed non dixit.'"

2. The law governing the construction of this will is that which was in force when the will took effect upon the testator's death, in 1850. Sutton v. Chenault, 18 Ga. 1, 4; Worrill v. Wright, 25 Ga. 657; Bennett v. Williams, 46 Ga. 399; Lofton v. Murchison, 80 Ga. 392, 7 S. E. 322; Stone v. Franklin, 89 Ga. 196, 15 S. E. 47. At that time, as well as when the will was made, the act of December 21, 1821, was of force. The first section of that act reads as follows: "All gifts, grants, bequests, devises and conveyances of every kind whatsoever, whether real or personal property, made in this state, and executed in such manner, or expressed in such terms, as that the same would have passed as estate tail in real property by the statute of Westminster II. (commonly called the statute de donis conditionalibus), be held and construed to vest in the person or persons to whom the same may be made or executed, an absolute unconditional fee-simple estate." Cobb, Dig. p. 169. The statute de donis, which was enacted in the year 1285, is called "the parent of estates tail." Before that statute, there existed no estates tail, express or implied, in England. Estates tail by implication arose in England under devises wherein a greater estate than for the life of the first taker was irresistibly inferred when the devise was to A. without the added words, "and his heirs," and the same estate was limited over upon words importing an indefinite failure of issue; and hence, in such devises as to A., and, if he dies without issue, to B., the devise was construed by necessary implication to be equivalent to a devise to A. and his issue, and, if he die without issue, to B., so as to bring it within the intent, if not the letter, of the statute de donis. Therefore, to ascertain whether the devise in the will now under consideration is "executed in such manner," or expressed in such terms, as that the same would have passed an estate tail in real property by the statute de donis, we must look to the construction placed upon that statute by the English courts, especially prior to the American Revolution. Gray v. Gray, 20 Ga. 804 (Syl., point 3), 809. Such is also the presumed intent of our legislature as to the construction of all English statutes adopted in this state. Brown v. Burke, 22 Ga. 574 (Syl., point 8), 580. And, independently of these decisions, when our legislature used the words in the act of 1821, "as would have passed an estate tail in real property by the statute of Westminster II., commonly called the 'statute de donis conditionalibus,'" they evidently had in mind and referred to the English decisions previously rendered for centuries upon the various expressions held by them to pass an estate tail in real property under that statute, rather than intending to ignore those decisions, or use the words "real property" in a supererogatory or useless sense, and refer this six century old statute to the respective judges of the superior courts, which were the highest courts then existing in this state, for their separate opinions on it.

3. The vital question, then, in this case is: Does the devise under the first item of the will create an estate tail under the statute de donis, which our act of 1821 converted into a fee-simple estate in favor of the first taker? If the term "in case she has no issue" imports an indefinite failure of issue, the devise was an estate tail by implication under the English law, and the executory devise was void for remoteness; and, e converso, if the term means a definite failure of issue, the devise, as the law stood prior to 1821, gave the first taker a defeasible or determinable fee, and the executory devise was valid. In 2 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's Ed.) p. 136, it is said: "It has been long settled, however, that a devise, in a will which is regulated by the old law, to a person and his heirs, or to a person indefinitely, with a limitation over in case he die without issue, confers an estate tail, on the ground, in the former case, that the testator has explained himself to have used the word 'heirs' in the qualified and restricted sense of 'heirs of the body,' and in the latter case on the ground that he has, by postponing the ulterior devise until the failure of the issue of the prior devisee, afforded an irrestible inference that he intended that the estate to be taken by the prior devisee under the indefinite devise should be of such a measure and duration as to fill up the chasm in the disposition, and prevent the failure of the ulterior devise, which, as an executory devise to take effect on a general failure of issue, would, of course, be void for remoteness." Such, however, would not be true if the limitation over was upon a definite failure of issue, as "where the devise over is to take effect on the event of the prior devisee dying without issue living at the death." Id. p. 138. That under the old English law (that is, prior to the English Wills Act of 1837) a devise to A., and, if he die without issue, to B., would be an estate tail by implication, as stated by Jarman, see, also, Smith, Ex. Int. § 564; Beach, Wills, § 195; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 385. And that a devise to A. for life, and, if he die without issue, to B., was also an estate tail by implication, see 2 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's Ed.) pp. 136–138; Reese, Ex'rs, p. 307. A devise to A. and his issue, or to A. with remainder to his issue, and, if he die without issue, to B., would be an express estate tail. Smith, Ex. Int. §§ 569–573; 3 Jarm. Wills (1 Randolph & Talcott's Ed.) pp. 94, 206. The only difference between an express estate tail and an estate tail by implication, both being dependent upon a limitation over upon an indefinite failure of issue, is that in the former there is an express devise to the issue, and in the latter such devise is necessarily implied from the ulterior devise being postponed until after a failure of issue generally of the first taker. Therefore "issue" will be a word of limitation or not, as it may be contained in a phrase or term which, under the rules of law, import an indefinite failure of issue or a definite failure of issue, respectively. " 'Issue,' when a word of limitation, means lineal descendants indefinitely, and hence heirs of the body." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 869; 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's Ed.) p. 200. In England, before the wills act of 1837, the phrases, "if he have no issue," "if he die without leaving issue," "leave no issue," "for want of issue," "in default of issue," "if he die without issue," and other words of similar import, unexplained by the context, when made the contingency in devises of a limitation over of real property, were invariably construed to mean an indefinite failure of issue, and to create an estate tail. 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's Ed.) pp. 296–301; Beach, Wills, § 195; Smith, Ex. Int. §§ 538, 563; 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 899, 902, 904, 918. And thus, it is seen, the contention of the defendant in error is well sustained by text writers.

The cases of authority on the question now under review are the English decisions prior to May 14, 1776, in accordance with our adopting act of 1854, and the decisions of this court, and, we may also add, the decisions of the English courts since the American Revolution which are in line with those prior thereto. These decisions, practically in an unbroken line, clearly settle the proposition that the devise under the first item in this will was an estate tail by implication in England, and that such class of entails, as well as estate tail express, were legitimately within the statute de donis. The design of that statute was to favor the issue in the entailment of real property, and hence the English courts always maintained that the only way to carry out this design fully was to apply the provisions of the statute to all devises of real property where the immediate devise to the issue, or the limitation over upon failure of issue of the first taker, unexplained by the context, meant an indefinite failure of issue. In Sonday's Case, 5 Coke (Rev. Ed.) 227, 9 Coke (Old Ed.) 127b (A. D. 1611), the devise was to A., a son, and, if he have issue male of his body, then to such issue, and, if he have no issue male of his body, then to B., another son. Counsel for the first taker contended, and it was so resolved by the court, that the words, "if he hath no issue male, * * * is as much as to say 'if [he] dies without issue male,' which words are sufficient to create an estate tail in him." And in Counden v. Clerke, Hob. 29a (A. D. 1613), the devise was to A., a son, and, if he die without issue of his body, to B.; and the court said: "I am of opinion that the son is, by the proviso of this will, made tenant in tail to him and the heirs of his body; for the implication (which, in a will, is sufficient for that purpose) is plain." These two cases are of special importance as showing that the words "if he has no issue" mean the same as "if he dies without issue," and that these latter words, following a devise to the first taker indefinitely or generally, will raise an estate tail by implication in him and the issue. And, as will be seen later on in this opinion, the case of Counden v. Clerke, defining and upholding estates tail by implication, has been followed by many other decisions. In Boden v. Watson, Amb. 398 (1761); Id., 478 (1764),—there was a bequest to A. for life, and, in case he has no heirs, then to B. Lord Hardwicke, who delivered the opinion in 1764 on the appeal of the case from the master of the rolls, held that the words, "in case he has no heirs," meant an indefinite failure of issue; and, as personalty was not within the statute de donis, the executory devise was declared void for remoteness, and the first taker was invested with the absolute fee to the property. It follows that if this case had been a devise of real property, the words "in case he has no heirs" would, of course, have been held to mean an indefinite failure of issue, and to give the first taker an estate tail under the statute de donis. In Crooke v. De Vandes, 9 Ves. 197 (1803), the devise, under a will made in 1772, was to A. and the heirs of his body, and, if he has no such heirs, to B. Lord Eldon maintained (page 202) that the words "if he has no such heirs" did not point "to any time less indefinite than a general failure of such issue"; and he said (page 203), "There is no doubt, where these words are applicable * * * to freehold * * * estates, they will give an estate tail in the freehold." In Romilly v. James, 6 Taunt. 263, 274–276 (1815), the devise, under a will made in 1734, was to A. and his heirs, and, "in case he die having no issue," then to B., a nephew of the testator. The contentions were similar to those made in the present case. The court held that the devise did not create a defeasible fee in A. with an executory devise over, but did create an estate tail; because the words, "in case he die having no issue," meant an indefinite failure of issue. Gibbs, C. J., said (page 276): "It is urged that this devise does not create an estate tail, but a defeasible fee simple, with an executory devise over; but we find no authority for supporting that construction." This case is, therefore, practically "on all fours" with the one now under consideration. And in Cole v. Goble, 76 E. C. L. 445 (1853), the devise in a will made in 1826 was to A., a granddaughter, but, in the event of A. "dying without having any lawful issue," then to other granddaughters, to be divided between them share and share alike. The court unanimously held, Jervis, C. J., rendering the main opinion, that the words "dying without having" issue imported an indefinite failure of issue, and that, therefore, A., the first taker, took an estate tail by implication. Cresswell, J., said, in referring to these words in wills devising real property, that "no person could have entertained a doubt that the words are sufficient to convey an estate tail." And Williams, J., said: "This is, in effect, nothing more or less than a devise to a person and her issue, which beyond all doubt gives her an estate tail." In Forth v. Chapman, 1 P. Wms. 667 (1719), Lord Chancellor Parker said that, in a devise of freehold to A., and, if he died leaving no issue, then to B., his nephew, "the construction should be, if A. died without issue generally, by which there might be at any time a failure of issue." This view was unqualifiedly approved by Lord Talbot in Atkinson v. Hutchinson, 3 P. Wms. 258, and by Lord Hardwicke in Southby v. Stonehouse, 2 Ves. Sr. 610; Lord Talbot saying that a devise to A., and, if he die without leaving issue, then to B., applied to real estate, will give A. an estate tail by implication. While these cases also recognize that the words "die leaving no issue," as applied to personal property, mean a definite failure of issue, the reasons for maintaining a different construction of them as to personal property are: First, because personalty is not within the statute de donis, and therefore the probable intent of the testator can be enforced; and, second, because, when applied to realty, which is within the statute, the intent of the testator is to create an estate tail, but, if his intent was otherwise, it could not be carried out against the rules of construction placed upon these expressions, in upholding the design of the statute, as to devises of real property in favor of the issue. See, also, remarks of Sir William Grant, M. R., in Elton v. Eason, 19 Ves. 77. In Sparrow v. Shaw, 3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 120 (1729), which Lord Hardwicke says in Southby v. Stonehouse, supra, was "the case of great argument," the devise was in trust for A. during her natural life, and if she die, leaving issue of her body, then for such issue; but if she should die without issue as aforesaid, then to B., a godson of the testator. A., who claimed an estate tail, levied a fine, and suffered a recovery to the use of herself and her heirs. She then conveyed to Sparrow and others. Upon her death without issue, B., the ultimate devisee, with the heir of the surviving trustee, leased the land to Shaw, who entered under the lease. Sparrow and others thereupon entered on the land, and dispossessed him. Shaw sued them in ejectment at the court of great sessions, and the court, on December 21, 1721, decided in favor of the defendants. Shaw took the case to the court of king's bench, which reversed the judgment of the court below at Easter term, 1728. See same case under name of Shaw v. Weigh, 2 Strange, marg. page 798. Sparrow and others then brought the case in parliament to reverse this judgment of reversal. The contention in their behalf was that under the devise A. had an estate tail, "for that, in construction of law, a devise to one with a limitation over to another if such first person dies without issue, creates an estate tail in that person, as well as if the devise had been to him or her and the heirs of his or her body." The contention for Shaw was that A. did not take an estate tail, and that the decision of the court at king's bench ought to stand. After hearing argument and receiving the report of the lord chancellor as to the views of the judges of the court of king's bench and common pleas and the barons of the exchequer, the house of lords adjourned until April 29, 1729, when the judges were ordered to attend to deliver their opinions. Accordingly, on that date, all the judges attended, and, after they had delivered their opinions seriatim, it was ordered and adjudged by the house of lords "that the judgment given in the court of king's bench, reversing a judgment given in the court of great sessions, * * * should be reversed, and that said judgment of the court of great sessions should be affirmed." In Geering v. Shenton, 1 Cowp. 410, 412 (Feb., 1776), Lord Mansfield held that the words "in case he shall die without leaving issue," in a limitation over of lands after the death of the first taker, "clearly shew it to be an estate tail." In Agar v. Agar, 12 East, 253, 259–263 (1810), the devise was to A. and his heirs, and to pay an annuity to B., and, if both died without leaving child or issue, to C. The unanimous opinion of all the judges was that the words "without leaving child or issue" imported an indefinite failure of issue, and created an estate tail successively in A. and B.. And Justice Le Blanc said (page 261): "There is no case where the words 'die without leaving issue,' simply, have been adjudged to mean 'without leaving issue at the time of the death.'" In Dansey v. Griffiths, 4 Maule & S. 61 (1815), the devise was to D. R. Dansey and his heirs, but, if he should die, and leave no issue, then to testator's son B. The case was argued before Lord Ellenborough, C. J., and Justices Le Blanc, Bayley, and Dampier. These four justices, over their signasay: "We have heard this case argued unsel, and have considered it; and we the opinion that D. R. Dansey took tate in tail general in the said es- under the said will." In Franklin v. Madd. 258, 260 (1820), the devise was and, if he should die without leaving then to B. The vice chancellor stated no authority would warrant him in uing the words 'leaving issue' as ng issue living at the death; that g issue,' as applied to real estate, im- a general failure of issue." He ore sustained the contention that the aker "took an estate tail by force of nitation over being on a general fail- issue." And in Cadogan v. Ewart, 7 & E. 636, 34 E. C. L. 187, 192–202 under a will where the testator died 0, the devise was to A., her heirs and s, forever; but, in case she should thout leaving issue, then to B. Lord an, C. J., who delivered the opinion court, after reviewing many cases, hat A. took an estate tail. The only g break in the line of the English as to the effect of the words "leaving ue" was in Porter v. Bradley, 3 Term 3, 146 (1789), where the words were ng no issue behind him," and Lord n announced his dictum that he t the words "leaving no issue," alone, mean a definite failure of issue even applied to real estate. This dictum was riticised by Lord Eldon in Crooke v. ndes, 9 Ves. 203: "When I read the Porter v. Bradley, speaking with all eference to the learned judge who ex- d that dictum, it appeared to me that t to shake settled rules to their very ation. I had heard the case of Forth pman cited for years, and repeatedly rd Kenyon himself, as not to be shak- never knew it shaken." But Lord n had, previously to this criticism, in se of Daintry v. Daintry, 6 Term R. 4 (1795), decided contrary to his afore- ictum in Porter v. Bradley, and thus nglish cases remain uniform that a tion over of real estate if the first should die leaving no issue, or without g issue, unexplained, was upon an in- e failure of issue, which created an tail.

Goodright v. Cornish, 4 Mod. 256, 258 and in Boehm v. Clarke, 9 Ves. 580 which are two of many similar cas- e words "for want of issue" and "in of issue," unexplained by the con- re respectively held to mean a failure e generally. And Lord Hardwicke so "default of issue" in Southby v. ouse, 2 Ves. Sr. 616. In Walter v. 1 Comyn, 372 (1723), the devise was A., a son, should die without issue, nd not otherwise, after A.'s death, the should go to B., another son; which urt held to be an estate tail by impli- cation in A. In Brice v. Smith, Willes, 1 (1737), it is said (page 3): "It cannot be doubted now, after so many solemn resolutions, but that, if a man devises an estate to A. and his heirs, and afterwards in his will give his estate to another in case A. dies without issue, the subsequent words reduce A.'s estate only to an estate tail, and restrain the general word 'heirs' to signify only 'heirs of the body.' So, likewise, if a man devise an estate to A., or to A. for life, without saying more, and afterwards in the same will devise the estate to another in case A. dies without issue, these subsequent words will enlarge A.'s estate by implication, and give him an estate tail." In Beauclerk v. Dormer, 2 Atk. 308 (1742), the devise was: "I make A. my sole heir, * * * and, if she dies without issue, then to go to" B. This Lord Hardwicke held to create an estate tail by implication in A. He said (page 314): "According to the opinion of Lord Hale in King v. Melling, 1 Vent. 228 (decided in 1672), 'a devise to a man, and, if he dies without issue, etc. is always construed to make an estate tail; * * * for the law will carry over the word "issue" not only to his immediate issue, but to all that shall descend from him. * * * The word "issue" is nomen collectivum, and takes in the whole generation ex vi termini, * * * [and] in all acts of parliament "exitus" is as comprehensive as heirs of the body.'" Lord Hale also stated, in his opinion in the above-named case, that "in Westm. II. de donis 'issue' is made a term of equivalence to 'heirs of the body.'" And in Cadogan v. Ewart, hereinbefore cited as to the force and effect of the words "die without leaving issue," Lord Denman said: "When an executory devise is limited to take effect after an indefinite failure of issue, the limitation over is void. Under the rule, if the limitation be to take effect after a dying without heirs, or without issue generally, that is considered to be an indefinite failure of issue, and therefore void." He further said (page 201): "We may here observe that this may perhaps be the last time of the question as to the effect of dying without issue being agitated; for, by the act of 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, § 29, which takes effect at the beginning of this year (1838), all these expressions of 'die without issue,' or 'die without leaving issue,' or any other words which may import a failure of issue, shall be construed to mean a want or failure of issue in the lifetime of the party; and therefore the 57 cases alluded to by Lord Ellenborough in Ellis v. Ellis, 9 East, 386, as having been mentioned by Lord Thurlow in Bigge v. Bensley, 1 Brown, C. C. 190, as having occurred on this head, as well as several others since that time, may be considered as out of our reports, except as to wills made before the present year." This observation of Lord Denman will also directly apply to our act of February 17, 1854, which is on a line with the above-mentioned English will act of 1837, and serve the double purpose of showing that in England, before the wills act, which took effect on January 1, 1838, a devise like the one in the will now under review would have been held an estate tail by implication, because the real property devised was limited over upon an indefinite failure of issue, and it would, therefore, have been so held in this state before our act of 1854 for the same reason, which would give the absolute fee to the first taker under our act of 1821; and also that the same devise in England, under a will executed after the English wills act of 1837 took effect, and in Georgia, under a will executed after our act of 1854, would pass a different estate to the first taker, because the old law of entails could not then apply.

Any English decisions since May 14, 1776, decided contrary to the English decisions prior to that time, are not cases of authority in this state. Carter v. Jordan, 15 Ga. 87. Like the decisions of courts in other states in this country, they are merely cases of opinion. Thornton v. Lane, 11 Ga. 500. The only other cases we shall refer to upon this question will be those decided by this court upon wills subject to be construed by the law existing before our act of 1854. In Robinson v. McDonald, 2 Ga. 116 (Syl., point 3), 120–123, the bequest was to A., his heirs and assigns, forever; but, if he should die without a lawful heir of his body, the property bequeathed was to be equally divided among three other sons of the testator. The court held, Judge Warner delivering the opinion, that the words "die without a lawful heir of his body" meant an indefinite failure of issue, which made the ulterior bequest a perpetuity, and, in any event, created an estate tail, which our act of 1821 converted into a fee-simple estate in favor of the first taker. In Carlton v. Price, 10 Ga. 495, 498, Judge Warner, who rendered the opinion of the court, said: "When the intention of testators and the laws of the land are in conflict, the latter must prevail. The rule of law is that whenever the testator limits his property to take effect after the death of the first taker without heirs or without issue, subject to no other restriction, the limitation is void, as being too remote. Such a disposition of property is considered as a limitation over upon an indefinite failure of issue, and is, therefore, an estate tail, which is prohibited by our law." In Cook v. Walker, 15 Ga. 465, Judge Lumpkin, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "Had the property been given to Miss Walker for life only, with remainder to the heirs of her body, and, in default of such heirs, to the present complainants, this being an estate tail, no one would doubt but that the fee would vest in Miss Walker, notwithstanding she took a life estate only by the terms of the instrument; and this, too, simply because the intention must yield to the unbending rules of the law, technical though they may be." In Hollifield v. Stell, 17 Ga. 280, the bequest was to A., and, in case she "should die without an heir of her body," then to be equally divided among her brothers and sister. This was an estate tail by implication under the English rules of interpretation as to devises of real property; and this court held, Judge Lumpkin rendering the opinion, that, the bequest having clearly created an estate tail in the first taker, such estate was enlarged into a fee simple by our act of 1821. In Gray v. Gray, 20 Ga. 804, the bequest was to A. and B., and should they, "or either of them, die without an heir begotten of their bodies, then their parts or part to be equally divided" among C., the testator's named sons, and the survivor. The majority of the court held that the bequest created an estate tail by implication in A. and B.; that such estates tail were within the statute de donis; and that, therefore, the first taker took the absolute fee under our act of 1821. In Hose v. King, 24 Ga. 424, the bequest was to A., a daughter, and the lawful heirs of her body forever. If she should die without leaving a lawful heir of her body, then the property to revert to the testator's estate, and be divided among his other heirs. Judge Lumpkin, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "According to the construction put upon the statute de donis by the English courts as to real estate, the limitation over in this will is too remote and void; and that under the act of 1821, as expounded by a majority of this court (myself dissenting) in Gray v. Gray, 20 Ga. 804, A., the daughter of the testator, took an absolute fee." In Claxton v. Weeks, 21 Ga. 265, the bequest was: "In case of no heir, I wish A., as executrix, to give the property to B., C., and D. equally, when A., my executrix, thinks prudent." Judge Lumpkin, who rendered the opinion of the court, held (page 269) that the words "in case of no heir" did not create an estate tail,—First, because no estate in freehold preceded the words; and, secondly, because the bequest was to be divided within the lifetime of the named executrix, which made the words mean a definite failure of issue. It is therefore clearly inferable from these two reasons that if the bequest had been to "A., and, in case of no heir, to B.," the court would have held that the bequest created an estate tail beyond all doubt, and that would have made a parallel case with the one now under consideration. In Brown v. Weaver, 28 Ga. 377, the bequest was to A. and B. and their children (they then having no children), and, if they shall die without issue, then over. The court held, Judge Stephens delivering the opinion, that, as the bequest would create an estate tail in real property, A. and B., under our act of 1821, took the absolute fee. In Pournell v. Harris, 29 Ga. 736, the bequest was to A. for life, and at her decease to the heirs of her body lawfully begotten; but, if she should die without issue, then over. The will was made in Virginia, where in 1776, the legislature had passed an act, like our act of 1821, enlarging estates tail into fee-simple estates. It was held, Judge Lyon delivering the opinion, that A. took an estate tail, which the Virginia act of 1776 converted into a fee-simple estate. In Walls v. Garrison, 33 Ga. 341, the devise was an estate tail by implication under the English law. Judge Jenkins, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "The dispositive words in the will * * * are, 'I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Mary Bird, the whole of the balance of my estate; * * * and should my wife, Mary, die without a natural heir of her body, it is my will and desire that the whole of my estate go to my brother, William B. Bird.' Upon the death of Mary Bird, leaving no lineal descendants surviving, is this limitation over good? This is not an open question in Georgia. In Hollifield v. Stell, 17 Ga. 280, Childers v. Childers, 21 Ga. 377, and Brown v. Weaver, 28 Ga. 378, it is held that these and other equivalent words create an estate tail under the statute de donis conditionalibus, and therefore, under our act of 1821 (Cobb, Dig. p. 169), vest in the first taker an absolute unconditional estate, unless there be superadded words excluding the idea of an indefinite failure of issue. Are there such words in the clause under consideration? It is contended that the limitation over to a person in being has that effect. But on that point it is expressly ruled otherwise in Hollifield v. Stell, supra, wherein several authorities sustaining the ruling are cited." In Strong v. Middleton, 51 Ga. 462, the devise was to A. and his heirs forever, and, if he "should die without a lawful begotten heir of his body," then to B. Judge Trippe, delivering the opinion of the court, held that A. took the absolute fee, as the limitation over was void for remoteness. After citing Hollifield v. Stell, Gray v. Gray, Childers v. Childers, Hose v. King, Brown v. Weaver, and Walls v. Garrison, supra, he said: "The question is not an open one. * * * Whatever difficulties may have been created by the two cases referred to in 30 Ga., there have been several later ones which fully recognize the former rulings." And in Lofton v. Murchison, 80 Ga. 391, 7 S. E. 322, Chief Justice Bleckley, delivering the opinion of the court on a will probated in 1847, said: "The law of Georgia inhibits entails, and by the act of 1821 * * * enforces the inhibition by enlarging them into estates in fee simple."

A fee conditional, at common law, whereby an estate was given simply to A. and his issue, or to A. and the heirs of his body, in exclusion of collateral heirs, and A. took the fee as soon as any issue was born, or it reverted to the donor's estate if no issue was born (2 Bl. Comm. 110), was the origin of the statute de donis allowing the entailment of real property in favor of the issue. 2 Bl. Comm. 112; 2 Minor, Inst. (3d Ed.) marg. pages 78, 79; Tied. Real Prop. §§ 45, 46. After the statute de donis, such fees conditional as applied to real property were also invariably declared to be estates tail in England (2 Bl. Comm. 112; 3 Jarm. Wills [Randolph & Talcott's Ed.] pp. 89, 94, 203); and in Georgia, as applied to both real and personal property, they have always been held to be estates tail, and vest the absolute estate in the first taker, under our act of 1821, unaffected by the act of 1854, or any subsequent law. Kemp v. Daniel, 8 Ga. 387 (top); Smith v. Dunwoody, 19 Ga. 237, 258, 259; Childers v. Childers, 21 Ga. 378; Carroll v. Carroll, 25 Ga. 260, 262; Andrews v. Bonner, 26 Ga. 520; Caraway v. Smith, 28 Ga. 541; Whatley v. Barker, 79 Ga. 790, 4 S. E. 387; Craig v. Ambrose, 80 Ga. 134, 4 S. E. 1; Ewing v. Shropshire, 80 Ga. 374, 7 S. E. 554; Griffin v. Stewart, 101 Ga. 720, 29 S. E. 29; Civ. Code, § 3085. An executory devise which was limited upon a definite failure of issue, as then understood, was valid at the time the will in this case took effect. Mayer v. Wiltberger, Ga. Dec. 20, 26, pt. 2; Carlton v. Price, 10 Ga. 498; Groce v. Rittenberry, 14 Ga. 232; Burton v. Black, 30 Ga. 638; Hill v. Alford, 46 Ga. 250, 251. But at that time an executory devise which was limited upon an indefinite failure of issue, as then defined, was void for remoteness. Mayer v. Wiltberger, supra; Robinson v. McDonald, 2 Ga. 116 (Syl., point 3); Carlton v. Price, supra; and the cases hereinbefore cited on the question of estates tail. See, also, Smith Ex. Int. §§ 709, 714; 1 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's Ed.) p. 519, and notes "p" and 15, where many cases are collected. Accordingly, an apposite class of a determinable or defeasible fee (called by some judges a "base" or "qualified" fee), with a valid executory devise over, at the time the will now being construed took effect, is one made to A., and, upon his dying without child or children, or dying without issue living at the time of his death, or other words importing a definite failure of issue, then to B., whereby the absolute fee became vested in A.'s estate upon his leaving issue at his death, or passed to the executory devisees if he died without leaving such issue. It seems like grasping at a shadow for persons to claim real property in this state as executory devisees under a devise governed by the law existing before our act of 1854, and which devise created an estate tail by implication in England, on the grounds either that such estates tail were not included in the statute de donis, or that the laws of Georgia at that time construed such estates to pass an estate for life to the first taker, with remainder to his issue, if any, and, if none, over to the executory devisees. If estates tail by implication were not included in the statute de donis, the limitations over in such estates were always made upon an indefinite failure of issue, which of itself, as above shown, defeats the claim of the executory devisees on the ground that such devise to them was void for remoteness. And it follows that under the law existing before our act of 1854 such a result of cutting up an estate tail by implication in the manner above stated was absolutely impossible. That act, which is on a line with the English wills act of 1837, enacts that "dying without heirs," "dying without issue," and other expressions which had theretofore meant an indefinite failure of issue shall thereafter mean a definite failure of issue, but is silent as to the nature of the estate taken by the first taker and the issue. There is a dictum in one case (Tucker v. Adams, 14 Ga. 583) that the act implies that the first taker is to have a life estate, with remainder to the issue, and, if none, then to the executory devisees; and that this was a declaratory act. But in Ewing v. Shropshire, 80 Ga. 381, 7 S. E. 554, Chief Justice Bleckley, who delivered the very able opinion of the court in that case, after reviewing the laws applicable to this subject, thus speaks about the codification of the law of estates tail by implication in our Code: "This carving up of any and all estates tail by implication into a particular estate and a remainder is wholly new.' His position is undoubtedly correct; and that the act of 1854 is not a declaratory statute of any former law, and that it converted into a defeasible fee what before the act was an estate tail by implication, see, also, Worrill v. Wright, 25 Ga. 657, 659. Therefore, the words in this will, "in case she has no issue," unexplained by the context (the will having been made in 1849, and the testator having died in 1850), must fall within the definition of an indefinite failure of issue. "Issue," in this term, can include an unborn grandchild, or great-grandchild, and so on in infinitum in the line of the first taker's issue, which clearly creates an estate tail under the statute de donis, as ruled by all English decisions, and therefore gives the first taker the absolute fee under our act of 1821. To restrict the meaning of this term to a definite failure of issue, in order to make the executory devise valid, it would be necessary to add words to it so as to make the term read, "in case she has no issue living at the time of her death." This, of course, we have no legal right or power to do, as we must construe the words as we find them in the will, according to the rules of interpretation adopted by the English courts for centuries, and adhered to by many decisions of this court. To disregard these rules of interpretation at this late day "would not only frustrate the great landmarks of property, but would introduce a latitude of construction boundless in its range, and pernicious in its consequences."

The cases cited in the brief of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs in error are distinguishable from the case at bar. We need only refer to those cited from the Reports of this court to show that they do not conflict with the views we maintain in this case. In Sharman v. Jackson, 30 Ga. 224, and Herring v. Rogers, Id. 615, there are no limitations over to executory devisees, and the devises are to A. for life, and at his death to be equally divided between the heirs of his body; which is the same, as held in those cases, as giving a remainder to the heirs of A.'s body living at his death. The case of Wetter v. Cotton Press Co., 75 Ga. 540, which counsel for plaintiff in error contend should have been held to be a defeasible fee in Mrs. Wetter, could only be so construed because the limitations over were upon a definite failure of issue, the devise expressly stating, if she should "die without issue as aforesaid (that is, without leaving issue or lineal heirs), then living." And the reasons which impelled the court in that case to hold that Mrs. Wetter took a life estate are wholly inapplicable to the case now under consideration. The case of Matthews v. Hudson, 81 Ga. 120, 7 S. E. 286, was not only based on a will probated in 1854, but the property was limited over upon the first taker dying without child or children, which would have been a definite failure of issue as well before as after the act of 1854. The cases of Gibson v. Hardaway, 68 Ga. 370, Daniel v. Daniel, 102 Ga. 181, 28 S. E. 167, and Chewning v. Shumate, 106 Ga. 751, 32 S. E. 544, whether rightly or wrongly decided, have no application to the present case, because they are based on wills made not only after the act of 1854, but even since the Code. The cases of Groce v. Rittenberry, 14 Ga. 233; Sheftall v. Roberts, 30 Ga. 453; Forman v. Troup, Id. 496; Burton v. Black, Id. 638; Tennell v. Ford, Id. 707; and Hill v. Alford, 46 Ga. 250,—which are based upon wills made before the act of 1854; and the case of Greer v. Pate, 85 Ga. 552, 11 S. E. 869, which was upon a deed,—all declared defeasible fees in the first takers only because the executory devises were limited in each case upon a definite failure of issue, as is clearly shown in some of these cases by the terms themselves without the aid of superadded words, and in others by the use of such words, though the court seems to have somewhat stretched the superadded words in Forman v. Troup to reach the conclusion of a definite failure of issue in that case. In Sheftall v. Roberts, which is a case especially relied on, the words "leaving no issue" were explained to clearly mean grandchildren of the testator by the superadded words, "they [the issue] shall not inherit their father's or mother's portion of my estate before they attain the age of eighteen years." In Tennell v. Ford, the devise was to A. and B., and, if B. should die before arriving at age, or without issue, his share to go to the survivor. The court held that "or" should be construed "and," so as to mean if B. should die without issue before arriving at age, which would be a definite failure of issue. This ruling was correct, and in no wise affects the contention of the defendant in error. See Smith, Ex. Int. §§ 235, 236, where the reason for the rule is explicitly stated with ample citation of authority. And in Burton v. Black, Judge Stephens said (page 640) that a devise to A. for life, and, if he die without issue, to B., would create an estate tail by implication. The other cases arising on wills made before the act of 1854, which are more apparently allied to the present case, are Harris v. Smith, 16 Ga. 545, and Griswold v. Greer, 18 Ga. 545. In the former the devise was to A. for life, with remainder to B., provided, nevertheless, if B. should die, leaving no lawful heirs, then, in that case, to be equally divided, share and share alike, between the lawful children of C. Judge Starnes first announced three reasons to support his contention that the words "die leaving no lawful heirs," in a devise of real property, meant a definite failure of issue: (1) "That there is nothing in the statute [de donis] which sanctions the idea that when one was said to die without issue or heirs reference was had to a failure of issue at any remote time after his death." Page 552. To which we answer that the statute, as quoted in part by him, says: "If issue fail (in that there is no issue at all), or if any issue be and fail by death, or heir of the body of such issue failing," that the statute has always been construed in England to an effect just the reverse of his opinion; and that in 1 Washb. Real Prop. (5th Ed.) p. 104, estates tail, the source of which is the statute de donis, are defined to be "estates of inheritance, which, instead of descending to heirs generally, go to the heirs of the donee's body, which means his lawful issue, his children, and through them his grandchildren, in a regular order and course of descent." (2) That while the words "having no issue," "dying without leaving issue," and "die leaving no lawful heirs" were uniformly construed in England to mean an indefinite failure of issue when applied to real property, yet the last two expressions were construed by the English courts to mean a definite failure of issue when applied to bequests of personal property, which latter construction should be adopted in this state as the proper one in cases of both personalty and realty; and that it is not possible "that this double meaning * * * can belong to the same terms of the same law,"—the statute de donis. To this we answer that the English courts, when construing these words as to personalty, did not have before them the statute de donis and the question of an estate tail, because personalty was not within the statute, and could not be entailed, and hence there was nothing in the way of enforcing the probable intent of the testator in such cases; that, when they construed these words as to realty, the statute de donis and the question of an estate tail were before them, the statute having reference to the entailment of real property, and in such cases they held that the probable intent of the testator was to entail the property, and, if not, that the latter intent could not contravene the design of that statute, and the invariable construction of these expressions when applied to devises of real property; and that our act of 1821 says that whenever expressions in gifts, grants, bequests, devises, and conveyances made in this state "would have passed an estate tail in real property by the statute de donis, they are to be held and construed to vest in the person or persons to whom the same may be made or executed (the first taker) an absolute, unconditional fee-simple estate." (3) That the reason for the statute de donis was to give the "heir at law" the property, and hence, as primogeniture had been abolished in this state, the reason for the conventional rule of construction of the statute de donis had been repealed. To which we answer that this reason imputes to the legislature of this state the performance of a useless task in passing the act of 1821, and that the statute de donis itself shows, and it is declared in numerous English decisions, that its design was in favor of the issue, which means all the issue, male and female, unless the devise was specially to male issue or specially to female issue; and hence primogeniture, which was a canon in the law of descent of real property, clearly had nothing to do with this question. Moreover, Judge Starnes seems to have doubted his own premises, because, after saying, "should we be wrong in all that we have said," he finally seized upon the words "then in that case" as superadded words qualifying the words "die leaving no lawful heirs," construed the word "then" to be an adverb of time relating to the death of the first taker, so as to make "lawful heirs" mean "children," and was thus enabled to decide that the first taker in that case took a defeasible fee, subject to be defeated in favor of the executory devises, should he die without then leaving children. The word "then" in the case of Harris v. Smith is referred to in Sanford v. Sanford, 58 Ga. 260, as an adverb of time. It is unnecessary, however, for us to decide whether this construction of the words "then in that case" is correct, as no such superadded words appear in the devise in the case now under consideration, though cases can be cited to show that the very same words have been differently construed. The terms of the will construed in Griswold v. Greer were: "I * * * bequeath and devise to my said wife, for and during her natural life, the whole of the residue of my estate, both real and personal. * * * And at the death of my said wife it is my will that the whole of the above-mentioned residue of my estate result to and vest absolutely in fee simple in my daughter B., if then living, and her issue, if any; but, if my said daughter should at that time be dead, without issue, or afterwards die, leaving no issue, then, and in either of said events, it is my desire and will that the said residue of my estate be equally divided among the lawful children of" C., D., and E. Here "issue" in the preceding terms, "and her issue, if any," and "dead without issue," having refrence to issue of the daughter living at the death of the testator's wife, manifestly mean a definite failure of issue, viz. children of B., the daughter; and therefore it might, though we do not say it would necessarily, in this particular case make "issue" in the subsequent term "leaving no issue" also mean children of B., the daughter. 3 Jarm. Wills (Randolph & Talcott's Ed.) p. 236, and note "p." Adopting this view, the devise may be paraphrased thus: To A. for life, and after her death absolutely and in fee simple to B. and her issue (children), if any; but, if B. be dead at that time, without issue (children), or dies afterwards, leaving no issue (children), then, and in either of these events, to the children of C., D., and E. And this is the way the devise in this same will is read in Payne v. Rosser, 53 Ga. 662. Moreover, the additional words "then, and in either of these events," are not in the present case. And what we have said above in answer to the three reasons advanced by Judge Starnes in the case of Harris v. Smith will also apply as answers to the same reasons set forth by him in his opinion under the second headnote of the case of Griswold v. Greer. It follows, therefore, as the law of the present case is clearly on the side of the defendant in error, that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION — LIABILITY OF PARTNERSHIP — CONSPIRACY — PLEADING — EVIDENCE—ABANDONMENT OF PROSECUTION —IMPRISONMENT—DEMURRERS.

1. A partnership is liable as such in an action for malicious prosecution, when the same was instituted in furtherance of the partnership's interests, and by direct authority of its members.

2. A partnership, the individual members thereof, and a person not a member may be joined as defendants in an action for a malicious prosecution, if it was instituted as the result of a confederation and conspiracy among them to begin and carry it on.

3. The petition in such an action may appropriately set forth facts showing that the institution of the prosecution was in furtherance of the partnership's interests, and setting forth the transactions out of which the prosecution arose.

4. It is "carrying on" a prosecution to cause a warrant to be issued, having the defendant therein arrested and his goods seized, having him brought before a committing magistrate, procuring continuance of the preliminary hearing, and requiring him to give bond for his appearance before the committing magistrate, notwithstanding the prosecution was finally abandoned in the committing court.

5. Abandoning the prosecution before the committing magistrate, and procuring him to grant an order dismissing the warrant and discharging the accused, on the ground that the prosecutor had no evidence whatever to offer against him, amounts to a termination of the prosecution, when no further action thereon is taken.

6. A partnership may be sued as such in an action for a malicious arrest, when the process under which the arrest was made was sued out in the interest of the partnership, and under the direction of the persons composing the same.

7. An imprisonment resulting from an arrest under a valid warrant will not give a right of action for false imprisonment.

8. In dealing with demurrers or other objections to pleadings, the judge should first dispose of demurrers to petitions; and where, as a result, a petition is dismissed, it is not proper practice at the same term of the court to deal with demurrers to an answer to such petition.

9. The counts in the petition for malicious prosecution and malicious arrest set forth causes of action, and were not subject to the demurrers filed thereto. The count for false imprisonment did not set forth a cause of action. Direction is given that the case be reinstated as to the two counts first mentioned.

Error from superior court, Dodge county; C. O. Smith, Judge.

Action by J. D. Page against the Citizens' Banking Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

De Lacy & Bishop, for plaintiff in error. Roberts & Milner and W. M. Clements, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Page brought suit against Ashburn, Peacock, Edwards, Lietch, Williams, Rogers, and the Citizens' Banking Company of Eastman, which was alleged to be a partnership composed of the five persons first above named. The petition contained three counts,—one for malicious prosecution, one for malicious arrest, and one for false imprisonment. The facts alleged in each of the counts were, in substance, as follows: Rogers was the sheriff of the county, and as such had levied a mortgage execution in favor of the Citizens' Banking Company, against petitioner, upon a certain stock of goods which was in the possession of the sheriff under the levy at the former place of business of petitioner. Lietch and Rogers united in making an affidavit that "thirty-one suits of men's clothing have recently been taken from the storehouse lately occupied by J. D. Page, and held in the custody of J. C. Rogers, sheriff of Dodge county, Georgia, under levy of a mortgage fi. fa., and now occupied by W. H. Clements, and the same has been taken by criminal means and carried away, and that they believe, and have probable cause to believe, that the said property is now concealed in the dwelling and premises occupied by J. D. Page, located on College street, in the town of Eastman." On this affidavit a warrant was issued, directing that the house and premises of Page be searched, and, if the property described in the affidavit be found therein, he be arrested, and, together with the property so found, brought before some judicial officer, to be dealt with as the law directs. It was distinctly alleged in the petition that when Lietch and Rogers made this affidavit they were acting for themselves, as well as for the Citizens' Banking Company, and with the approval and by the direction of each member of that partnership. The warrant issued on this affidavit was placed in the hands of the town marshal and county bailiff, and the house and premises of petitioner were thoroughly searched. None of the property described in the affidavit was found therein, but the officer seized three pieces of dress flannel and two suits of children's clothes, and arrested petitioner. Subsequent to the arrest, the bailiff, with other persons, returned and made another search of the premises, but found none of the property described in the affidavit. Petitioner was taken before a justice of the peace, when Lietch, Edwards, and Williams, acting for themselves and for the other members of the firm, appeared to prosecute plaintiff, with an attorney who was employed by the Citizens' Banking Company, as a partnership, and each and all of the members of the same. In pursuance of that employment such attorney did represent the prosecution against plaintiff from its inception to its termination. Petitioner asked that he be released from custody on the ground that the affidavit upon which the warrant was issued was defective and void, and failed to charge any offense against him, and that for that reason his arrest and detention were unlawful. Lietch, Edwards, and Williams objected to the release of petitioner, and the magistrate refused to order his discharge. He then asked for an immediate investigation or preliminary trial, but the parties just referred to objected to this, and upon their application the hearing was continued to the next day. To avoid being placed in jail, petitioner offered to give a bond for his appearance; but the magistrate held that a bond must be given to appear and answer for the offense of larceny, and petitioner gave the bond to appear for a preliminary hearing on the next day for the offense of larceny. At the time fixed for the preliminary trial, Rogers, Lietch, Edwards, and Williams, acting for themselves and with the approval of Ashburn and Peacock, the other members of the partnership, again appeared with their attorney before the magistrate for the purpose of prosecuting petitioner; and on their motion the case was again continued until the following day, over the objection of petitioner, who was present and demanding a hearing. At the time fixed in this last order of postponement, petitioner appeared with his counsel before the magistrate, and thereupon the prosecution, by their attorney, asked leave of the court to withdraw the warrant, and to restore to petitioner the articles which had been seized by the officer who searched his house; the attorney representing the prosecution stating that it was impossible to make out a case. An order was then granted discharging petitioner from custody, and restoring to him the articles which had been seized. It was distinctly alleged that while Rogers and Lietch, the persons upon whose affidavit the warrant was issued, were the nominal prosecutors of petitioner, Ashburn, Edwards, Williams, and Peacock, and the Citizens' Banking Company, as a partnership, were all jointly and severally the prosecutors in the case. Petitioner alleges that he was innocent of any offense, and that he did not take and carry away any of the articles named in the affidavit, nor were any of them concealed in his dwelling or about his premises, and that the prosecutors had no probable cause whatever to believe that the same were so concealed; that the articles seized by the officer constituted no part of the property mentioned in the affidavit, but were the property of petitioner and his wife and children, and had never been in the possession or custody of Rogers. Petitioner was in actual custody of the arresting officers for several hours, and was in their constructive custody for 43 hours, before he was released. It is alleged that the prosecution was maliciously instituted and carried on without probable cause; the prosecutors having no ground whatever for the proceeding, other than their desire to injure petitioner. As matter of aggravation and as evidence of malice, it is alleged that the defendants circulated disparaging and damaging reports about petitioner, charging that large quantities of goods stolen from the custody of the sheriff had been found by the officers in the house of petitioner, that he had a secret key to the store in which such goods were located, and that he had taken such goods. To this petition the defendants filed demurrers, both general and special. The court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the petition, and this ruling is assigned as error. The plaintiff, during the progress of the hearing of the demurrers, offered an amendment to his petition, which merely set forth with greater particularity than the original petition the facts showing the connection of the Citizens' Banking Company with the mortgage execution which had been levied upon the property of petitioner, and prayed that, if it should be held that the suit could not be maintained against the Citizens' Banking Company as a partnership, the case might be held in court as a suit against Rogers and the individual members of that partnership. The court refused to allow this amendment, and this ruling is also assigned as error.

1. Is a partnership ever liable as such in an action for a malicious prosecution? If so, under what circumstances can such an action be maintained? One partner may be rendered liable for the acts of his co-partner. Whether or not he is so liable is to be determined by the application of the rules governing the relation of principal and agent; and generally the partnership is liable for the act of one of the partners, if it would have been liable had the same act been committed by an agent intrusted by the firm with the management of its business. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) 1066. If a tort be committed by one partner while engaged in a transaction within the scope of the partnership business, and such tort be committed in furtherance of the interests of the partnership it will be liable. But it will not be liable for a tort committed by one partner in a transaction outside of the partnership business, where he acts from his own private malice or ill will unless the act which constituted the tort was authorized by the members of the partnership, or subsequently ratified by them; the act itself having been done in their behalf and interest. Mechem, Partn. §§ 204, 205; T. Pars. Partn. (4th Ed.) §§ 100, 102, 105; 1 Bates, Partn. § 461; 1 Lindl. Partn. §§ 149, 150; 1 Jag. Torts, § 99; Barb. Partn. (2d Ed.) p. 350, c. 2, § 13. The authorities just cited establish simply that, as a partnership is an aggregation of individuals, where each one is the authorized agent of the others to perform any act within the scope of the partnership enterprise, if one of them, in the prosecution of the business of the partnership, be guilty of a willful wrong towards another, the other partners will be liable, and that, if one partner is guilty of an act outside of the partnership business which causes any injury, the other partners will not be liable unless it appear that such act was expressly authorized by them, or, after the same had been performed in their behalf and interest, they had either expressly ratified the same, or knowingly received the fruits of the wrongful act. Applying these principles to the present case, the petition set forth a cause of action as against the individuals who compose the partnership known as the Citizens' Banking Company, and the plaintiff has a right to maintain the action, so far as the count for malicious prosecution is concerned, against the individuals composing that partnership. But the suit is not only against the individuals, but it is against the partnership itself, and a judgment is sought against the partnership itself, as well as against the individual members who compose it. It is well settled that a corporation is liable for torts committed by its agents, such as assault and battery, libel, malicious prosecution, and the like. Behre v. Register Co., 100 Ga. 213, 27 S. E. 986; 1 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Prac. § 367; Newell, Mal. Pros. § 102; Railway Co. v. Christian, 97 Ga. 56, 25 S. E. 411; Banking Co. v. Richmond, 98 Ga. 490, 25 S. E. 565.

Whether a partnership can be sued as such, and held liable for a tort in the commission of which all of the members united for the purpose of furthering the interests of the partnership, or whether in such a case the individuals only are liable to be sued, either jointly or severally, is a question which is for the first time presented to this court for decision. Can a partnership itself be regarded as being so separate and distinct from the individual members of the same that it may be treated as the wrongdoer, and a judgment rendered against it which would bind partnership assets in the same manner that a judgment rendered against it on a contract would bind such assets? A corporation is a person, and therefore it is clear that the decisions uniformly holding that it may be rendered liable for a tort committed by its agent are undoubtedly sound. "Though a firm or partnership is not a person, it is a legal entity, and for some purposes is recognized as a quasi person, having powers and functions exercisable by one of the partners severally, or all of them jointly." Drucker v. Wellhouse, 82 Ga. 129, 8 S. E. 40, 2 L. R. A. 328. In the opinion in the case just cited, Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley says: "A firm adds nothing to population, and in this respect is unlike a corporation, which augments population in the legal, though not in the natural, world. Still the law does take note, on a wide scale, of partnership as a legal entity, and regards it as a unit both of rights and obligations. Judgment may be entered and execution issue for or against it. Code, §§ 1899, 3576 (Civ. Code, §§ 2638, 5346). Attachment may issue against it as nonresident (Chambers v. Sloan, 19 Ga. 84; De Leon v. Heller, 77 Ga. 740), or as absconding (Hines v. Kimball, 47 Ga. 587). It may be served with process. Peel v. Bryson, 72 Ga. 332. It may be taxed. Mayor v. Hines, 53 Ga. 616. And see many provisions in the session laws imposing taxes. It may be insolvent. Code, § 1918 (Civ. Code, § 2660); Bennett v. Woolfolk, 15 Ga. 213; Daniel v. Townsend, 21 Ga. 155; Pullen v. Whitfield, 55 Ga. 174; Anderson v. Pollard, 62 Ga. 51. It may assign its property to pay its creditors, but whether by general law a single partner can make for it a general assignment seems open to question. Burrill, Assignm. § 67 et seq.; Story, Partn. §§ 101, 310; T. Pars. Partn. (3d Ed.) pp. 165, 166, 400. As to restrictions on limited partnerships in the matter of assignments, see Code, §§ 1939, 1940 (Civ. Code, §§ 2681, 2682). According to T. Parsons (Partn. [3d Ed.] p. 449), there is a 'general tendency of the law at this day to complete its recognition of a partnership as a body of itself, with its own means appointed to its own debts.' In view of this tendency, which is everywhere traceable, and no less in our own local system than elsewhere, we may safely hold that, though a firm or partnership is impersonal or nonpersonal, it is, for some purposes, in contemplation of law, a quasi person, having powers and functions exercisable by one of the partners separately, or all of them jointly. That it may be a debtor or a creditor, within the meaning of modern statutory enactments, we have no question." In that case it was held that an insolvent firm might make an assignment as an insolvent debtor, though the partmselves, as individuals, might be sol-

5. Upon examination of these cases
e found that the suit in each instance

5, it was held that a firm was liable f its members converted to the use rm the property of another, and that immaterial whether the other members of the firm were ignorant of the wrong, or innocent of any wrongful intent. There was in that case, however, no ruling as to how a suit for such wrongful conversion should be brought,—whether against the partnership as such, or against the individuals composing the same. The only cases to which our attention has been called in which the partnership as such was sued for a tort are the cases of Mark v. Hastings (Ala.) 13 South. 297, and Kirk v. Garrett, 84 Md. 383, 35 Atl. 1089. In the former it was held, "A partner is not liable for a malicious prosecution instituted by his co-partner on a charge of larceny of partnership property, unless he advises or directs it, or participates therein, and then only in his individual capacity." In the latter case it was held that under the facts of that case the firm was not liable, but the judge who wrote the opinion recognized that there were cases in which it might be held liable for the torts of its members. See page 410, 84 Md., and page 1093, 35 Atl. While the prosecution of a person for a criminal offense might not be within the scope of a mercantile partnership, even though such offense consisted of a larceny of the partnership property, as was held in the Alabama Case, supra, still it would seem that any proceeding authorized by law for the purpose of reclaiming property of the partnership which had been stolen would be within the scope of the partnership business, and each partner would be authorized to use such remedies as the law gave for that purpose; and if these remedies were pursued maliciously and without probable cause, and a prosecution for a public offense resulted therefrom, the partnership as such would be liable in an action of malicious prosecution. But, be this as it may, it is not necessary for us to decide this question in the present case; for the allegations of the petition are clear and distinct that every act that was done by the partner who sued out the search warrant was authorized and directed by each and every other member of the firm, acting in behalf of the partnership. Treating the partnership as a legal entity and as a quasi person, as we are not only authorized, but bound, to do, following the decision in Drucker v. Wellhouse, supra, we have no hesitancy in holding that under the allegations of the petition an action for malicious prosecution was maintainable against the Citizens' Banking Company as a partnership, and that the plaintiff is entitled, under his allegations, to recover a judgment which will bind partnership assets.

While the decision in the case of Ozborn v. Woolworth, 106 Ga. 459, 32 S. E. 581, is apparently in conflict with what is now ruled, upon a close examination of that case it will be found that it was, upon its facts, correctly decided; and, when it is thus confined, it is not only not in conflict with the present ruling, but it is, rather, in line therewith. In that case it was sought to hold a partnership liable for slanderous words uttered by one of the partners, upon two grounds: First, because the words were uttered in a transaction within the scope of the partnership business; and, second, that the other partner, after the slanderous words were uttered, had ratified the same. It was properly held that the partnership was not liable upon either ground. If a corporation is not liable for a slander uttered by its agent, although in a transaction within the scope of his agency, unless the corporation directed the speaking of the very words complained of, as was held in Behre v. Register Co., 100 Ga. 213, 27 S. E. 986, it would seem, upon principle, that a partnership would not be liable for a slander uttered by one of its agents, even though that agent be a member of the firm, unless all the partners directed the speaking of the very words complained of. The action was therefore not maintainable upon the first ground. While one may render himself liable by ratifying the tort of another, such liability arises only where the original act was done in the interest, and intended to further some purpose, of the person who ratifies the act of the wrongdoer, as in a case where property of which the ratifier is the owner is seized, and thus passes into the possession of the real owner, or where one, in behalf of another, without authority seizes property which the other has no interest in, and the person in whose interest the seizure was made receive the property thus seized. See Cooley, Torts (2d Ed.) p. 146. It is hard to conceive how this principle can apply to a slander. Uttering without authority a slander in the interest of another, and approving or ratifying such slander for the reason it was so uttered, or because of a benefit supposed to arise from the wrongful act, are transactions which, if at all possible, are beyond legal comprehension. Even if a slander can, in contemplation of law, be uttered, without authority, in the interest of another, or if a benefit can be received from a slander uttered in one's behalf, such interest or benefit would generally, if not in every case, be so remote that a legal investigation should not be entered into for the purpose of connecting the interest or benefit with the slander. The headnote and the language of Presiding Justice Lumpkin in the opinion in Ozborn v. Woolworth must be taken in the light of the questions then under consideration, and there was nothing in that case to call for a ruling on the question whether a partnership would be liable for a tort committed by one of its members under the direction and express authority of all the members.

2. As it was distinctly alleged in the petition that the partnership, the individual members thereof, and Rogers, the sheriff, confederated and conspired together for the purpose of injuring the plaintiff in instituting and carrying on the prosecution which was the foundation of the action, there was no merit in a demurrer that there was a misjoinder of parties defendant. Cheney v. Powell, 88 Ga. 629, 634, 15 S. E. 750.

3. It was not only proper, but in the present case it was necessary, so far as the liability of the partnership was concerned, that the plaintiff should allege that the prosecution was instituted and carried on in furtherance of the partnership's interests; and it was therefore proper that the plaintiff should allege exactly in what way the partnership was involved in the matter which was the foundation of the prosecution. Those portions of the original petition relating to the manner in which the partnership was interested in the prosecution were not subject to the special demurrers filed to the same, and the amendment which was rejected should have been allowed in so far as it related to this matter.

4. Before a criminal prosecution will give rise to a cause of action in favor of the person prosecuted, against the prosecutor, it must not only appear that the prosecution was without probable cause, and that damage ensued therefrom, but it must also appear that the prosecution was maliciously carried on. In Swift v. Witchard, 103 Ga. 193, 29 S. E. 762, it was held that, before a criminal prosecution will be actionable, there must at least have been an arrest and an inquiry before a committing court. The Code declares that an inquiry before a committing court or justice of the peace amounts to a prosecution. Civ. Code, § 3849. Where a search warrant is issued, and under authority of the same the premises of the person named therein are searched, and goods seized which are not described in the affidavit, and the person named therein is arrested and carried before a justice of the peace, and, after the prosecutor is allowed a reasonable time to secure evidence, he fails to do so, and in open court announces that the prosecution cannot make out a case of larceny or receiving stolen goods against the person arrested, and asks that an order be entered discharging the accused from custody, and restoring to him the property which had been wrongfully seized, a prosecution has been "carried on," within the meaning of the statute, and, if the same is malicious and without probable cause, will give the person prosecuted a right of action against those who instituted and carried it on. Especially would this be true where the hearing was continued from day to day, and pending the same the accused was compelled, in order to obtain his liberty, to give a bond for his appearance before the magistrate to answer the charge of larceny.

5. The Code provides that the prosecution must be ended before the right of action accrues. Civ. Code, § 3850. When the attorneys representing the prosecution announced in open court that they had no evidence to offer against the accused, and procured an order dismissing the warrant and discharging the accused from custody, and no further action was ever taken thereon, the prosecuwas at an end, within the meaning of aw. See, in this connection, Woodruff oodruff, 22 Ga. 237; Horn v. Sims, 92 121, 17 S. E. 670. The ruling in Harts- v. Smith, 104 Ga. 235, 30 S. E. 666, does conflict with this. It was there held though one arrested upon a criminal ant be discharged, the prosecution would e at an end, if the prosecutor with due nce follows up and carries on the prose- n in a court having jurisdiction to try ase upon its merits; this, in effect, being ntinuation of the original prosecution. he present case no further action was by the prosecutors after the warrant dismissed by the magistrate.

If a partnership is liable to be sued as for a malicious prosecution, it will also able to be sued in the same manner, r similar circumstances, for a malicious t, as the two causes of action are of a ed nature. Causes of action for ma- s prosecution, malicious arrest, and false isonment, all sounding in tort, may be d in the same action, when the plaintiff defendants in each cause of action thus d are identical. Civ. Code, § 4944.

The warrant upon which the accused arrested was neither defective nor void. affidavit complied with the law, which res that a search warrant should not is- except upon probable cause, supported by particularly describing the place or s to be searched, and the person or per- to be seized. Pen. Code, § 1243 et seq. being the case, the imprisonment result- from an arrest under a warrant thus is- was not a false imprisonment. In Joiner eamship Co., 86 Ga. 238, 12 S. E. 361, it held that "where a warrant is regularly properly sued out, and the prisoner has properly and legally arrested under it, imprisonment cannot be false." In the on Mr. Justice Blandford says: "Where arrest is by valid process, regularly sued action for malicious prosecution is the remedy;" citing Melson v. Dickson, 63 82; Riley v. Johnston, 13 Ga. 260; Sewell tate, 61 Ga. 496. "It is a rule of law in connection, which admits of no excep- that, where there is an arrest on a warrant,—one neither void nor voidable, is not a false imprisonment, and no lia- y is incurred by any person whomsoever, ther immediately or only remotely con- ed therewith. And the rule applies, no ter how corrupt or unfounded or mis- n the motives which induced the issu- or execution of the warrant may have ." 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 740, and cases there cited. The ruling 3 Ga., supra, does not in any manner con- with the decision in Thorpe v. Wray, 68 359. While the headnote in the latter says that the unlawful detention of an- r, though under a warrant, will give a of action if done in bad faith, an exam- on of the facts of the case and the opin- ion will show that the decision was placed upon the distinct ground that the warrant was void. Even in a case where the warrant is defective or void, the imprisonment thereunder would not give rise to an action for false imprisonment, if the party suing out the warrant acted in good faith, and the officer executing the same acted in like manner. Civ. Code, § 3552. The court below committed no error in sustaining the demurrer to the petition, so far as the count which claimed damages for false imprisonment was concerned.

8. Error is assigned in the bill of exceptions upon the refusal of the court to strike the answer of the defendants. No ruling will be now made on the question as to whether the answer set up a sufficient defense to the action. If the court below passed upon this question at all, it was in an irregular way. It must have passed on the question either before considering the demurrers to the petition, which would have been irregular, or it must have heard demurrers to the answer after the petition was dismissed, which would have been without authority. When the petition was dismissed the whole case went out, and there was nothing left to answer. In either view the question is not properly before this court for decision. The proper practice where there are demurrers filed to both the petition and the answer is to first consider the demurrer to the petition. If this is sustained, the demurrer to the answer need not be considered. Direction will be given that all questions relating to the sufficiency of the answer be left open until another hearing.

9. The court erred in sustaining the demurrers so far as the counts for malicious prosecution and malicious arrest were concerned. These counts were not subject to any of the objections set up in the demurrers thereto, either general or special. There was no error in sustaining the demurrers to the count for false imprisonment. Direction will be given that the case be reinstated as to the counts for malicious prosecution and malicious arrest, and that the count for false imprisonment stand as stricken. Judgment reversed, with directions. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

WOOD et al. v. COLLINS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1900.)

EXEMPTIONS—OBJECTIONS TO ALLOWANCE—AMENDMENT—VALUATION OF HOMESTEAD—APPLICATION BY WIFE—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL.

1. A creditor who files objections to the allowance of an exemption on the ground that specified articles of personalty were omitted from the schedule, should, on the trial, be confined to the articles mentioned in his objections, and should not be allowed to show by evidence that other articles of personalty were omitted from the schedule.

2. An amendment to such objections, which merely in loose and general terms alleged that the head of the family owned property not scheduled, some of which consisted of debts owing to him by persons unknown to the objector, without further specifying or describing the property charged to have been omitted, was properly disallowed for want of fullness and certainty in these respects.

3. It is not incumbent on the applicant for a homestead to fix the valuation of the real estate sought to be set apart. This duty devolves upon the surveyor, his valuation being subject to review by appraisers.

4. Though a gift of money or other property by an insolvent to his wife would be void as to creditors, it would be good as to the wife; and, if she had actually disposed of such money or property before applying for an exemption out of the husband's property, her failure to include what was given her in the schedule will not vitiate her application, when it did not appear that the gift was made in anticipation of the application, and for the purpose of concealing the property.

5. A failure to charge a proposition of law applicable to the case cannot be taken advantage of by assigning error on a charge that is abstractly correct.

6. Striking a ground of a motion for a new trial, which alleged an act or omission on the part of the judge, is the equivalent of refusing to certify to its correctness, and so doing is not reviewable here.

7. While the judge should have instructed the jury to find first whether any of the property described in the objections should have been embraced in the schedule, and, if so, was the applicant guilty of a willful fraud in concealing the same, a charge which restricted them to finding what was fraudulently omitted would not be cause for a new trial, when the evidence demanded a finding that none of the property embraced in the objections should have been included in the schedule.

Error from superior court, Montgomery county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Application of Catherine Collins for the setting apart of homestead and exemption of personalty. J. S. Wood & Bro., creditors of her deceased husband, appealed from the judgment to the superior court, and from its decision bring error. Affirmed.

J. H. Martin, for plaintiffs in error. H. W. Carswell, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Mrs. Collins made an application for the setting apart of a homestead and exemption of personalty out of the property of her husband as the head of a family consisting of herself and her minor children, it being alleged that he refused to make the application. The realty sought to be set apart consisted of a tract of land containing 341 acres, and the schedule of personalty consisted of numerous items, with the value of each affixed, aggregating $551. The affidavit of the surveyor was to the effect that the land sought to be exempted was worth $1,000. Wood & Bro., creditors of Collins, filed objections to the proceeding on the grounds that the land was worth $2,500 instead of $1,000, and the personalty contained in the schedule was worth $200 more than the amount therein stated, and that the schedule did not contain "a full disclosure of the personalty of said W. W. Collins, because it does not contain $300 cash, and one pistol, value $15." Appraisers were appointed, who made a return that the realty was worth $1,000, and the personalty $493.75. Wood & Bro. entered an appeal to the superior court. The case came on for trial in that court, and the result was a verdict finding "the land to be worth $1,000, and no personal property fraudulently left out of the schedule." The case is here upon a bill of exceptions sued out by Wood & Bro. assigning error upon the refusal of the court to grant a new trial in the case at their instance.

1. It is the duty of one who claims the benefit of the law allowing the setting apart of a homestead and exemption of personalty to act in perfect good faith, and to that end he must "make a full and fair disclosure of all the personal property, including money, stocks, and bonds of which he may be possessed at the time" his application for exemption is made. If a debtor is "guilty of willful fraud in the concealment of part of his property from his creditors," the law imposes as the penalty upon him that he shall lose the benefit of his exemption, so far as the rights of creditors whose debts were in existence at the date of the application are concerned. Civ. Code, § 2830. The section above cited does not, in terms, apply to a case where the application is made by the wife to have the exemption set apart out of the property of the husband; but it would seem that, when the wife is the applicant, and she willfully omits from the schedule filed by her property belonging to her husband which is subject to the payment of his debts, the penalty which the law imposes upon her husband if he is the applicant and guilty of such conduct should also fall upon her. In having the exemption set apart she claims through him, and, construing the law in relation to homesteads and exemptions in its entirety, it seems clear that when the wife is the applicant she is charged with the same duties and subject to the same penalties that the law imposes upon the husband when guilty of fraudulent conduct. Indeed, the law goes even further than this, and makes the wife responsible for the fraud of her husband in concealing his property; and, if any property be left out of the wife's schedule through the fraud of the husband, even though the wife was no party to the fraud, and was ignorant of it, she will have to suffer the penalty which the law imposes upon the husband when he is the applicant. Kirtland v. Davis, 43 Ga. 318. Creditors are permitted to object to the schedule for want of sufficiency and fullness, or for fraud of any kind, as well as to dispute the valuation of the personalty, the propriety of the survey, or the value of the land; but they are required to "specify" their objections in writing. Civ. Code, § 2836. The purpose in requiring the objection to be thus specified is that the applicant may remove it by amendment if it is well taken, or may be in a position to intelligently combat it if he does not admit that it is well founded. When the schedule is objected to for want of fullness or sufficiency, the objections must put the applicant on notice of what he is charged with having omitted, describing with reasonable certainty the property claimed to be omitted. When this is done, the issue to be tried is whether the articles described in the objections were the property of the applicant, or person out of whose property the exemption is sought, at the date of the application, and, if so, whether such articles were concealed by the willful fraud of the applicant. If the jury find that the property described in the objections was omitted from the schedule without any fraudulent intent, and it is thereafter delivered up, the fact that it was omitted would not defeat the application. If, on the other hand, the property described in the objections was omitted in consequence of a willful and fraudulent intent to conceal the same, then the application would be defeated, and the applicant would lose the benefit of the exemption so far as "pre-existing creditors" were concerned. Such being the result of a finding that property had been omitted from the schedule, it is not only not unreasonable, but it is entirely proper, that the objections should be so framed that the applicant would know exactly what charge he has to meet; and the objector should be held to strict proof of the charge as made in the objections. The objectors in this case having alleged that the omissions in the schedule consisted of $300 cash and a pistol worth $15, there was no error in requiring them to confine the proof to these items, nor in charging the jury, in effect, that their investigations on this branch of the case must be confined to the question whether either of these items was omitted. The rulings in Torrance v. Boyd, 63 Ga. 23, and McNally v. Mulherin, 79 Ga. 614, 4 S. E. 832, did not in any manner relate to the sufficiency of the pleadings.

2. The objectors offered an amendment to their objections, in which they set forth that sundry parties unknown to objectors were indebted to Collins, and by the collusion and fraud of Collins and his wife all reference to these debts was omitted from the schedule, and that the schedule did not contain a full and fair disclosure of the property of Collins, and that his property had not in good faith been delivered up, but had been in part fraudulently concealed. The court refused to allow this amendment, for the reason that its allegations did not state what property was omitted, and were not sufficient to put the applicant on notice of what she was to meet at the trial. That there was no error in this ruling will sufficiently appear from what has already been said in this opinion.

3. The judge charged the jury as follows: "I charge you that the applicant would have nothing to do with the value of the land. The law requires the surveyor to survey the land, and to value it, under oath, and, if that was done, and the caveators were dissatisfied, then appraisers should be appointed to appraise the land. The applicant could have nothing to do with putting a value on it." The court then read the jury Code, §§ 2828, 2830, 2834, 2836, 2837, and 2838. This charge is assigned as error, "because it misstated the law, and is also an expression of opinion on the evidence in the case." The charge is not subject to either of the objections made. If there is in it any opinion on the evidence in the case, we have not been able to discover it. That it is not the duty of the applicant for a homestead to value the land sought to be set apart, but that that duty devolves upon the surveyor, subject to review by appraisers, clearly appears from the sections of the Code which were read by the judge as a part of the charge excepted to. See Civ. Code, §§ 2828-2834.

4. If a husband, who is insolvent, make a gift of money or other property to his wife, the gift is void as to creditors, but is good as to the wife. If, subsequently to such gift, the wife applies for a homestead and exemption to be set apart out of the husband's property, the failure on her part to include in the schedule the money or other personalty which was the subject of the gift would not invalidate the homestead, unless it be affirmatively shown that the alleged gift was made in anticipation of the application, and was the result of a collusive arrangement between the husband and wife to willfully conceal the property from the creditors. Especially would such omission not affect the application when it appeared, as it did in the present case, that the wife had disposed of the property that had been given her before the filing of the application, and there was nothing to indicate that the property was given to her with a fraudulent intent; at least not so far as the application for a homestead was concerned. The creditors could have followed the property in the hands of the wife if they had seen proper to do so, and this was the extent of their rights under the facts of the present record. The charge of the judge was in substantial accord with what is now ruled, and it was, therefore, not erroneous, as claimed.

5. The motion for a new trial contained an assignment of error upon the following charge: "I further charge you, gentlemen of the jury, that if you find that it was not fraudulently left out, and not done to defraud creditors, and it was done in the utmost good faith on the part of the applicant, it would not void it, if you find that it was not left out for the purpose of defrauding creditors. It is for you to say whether or not it was intended to defraud creditors, if you find anything was left out." The objections to the charge were in the following language: "Articles could not have been left out in good faith. The omission of articles from the schedule and the failure to put them in after their attention has been called to it, or any effort to do it, was in itself fraud; and it was not a question for the jury to say whether or not it was intended to defraud creditors. The fact of leaving out, by itself, is, under the law, a fraud, unless satisfactorily explained, and the consequences repaired." The charge complained of contained a correct abstract proposition of law. See Torrance v. Boyd, 63 Ga. 23. The complaint is not that what is charged is not the law, or not applicable to the case, but that another principle of law should have been charged in addition to what was charged. A failure to charge cannot be taken advantage of in this way. See Lucas v. State (Ga.) 36 S. E. 87.

6. The bill of exceptions recites that one ground of the motion for a new trial was as follows: "Because the court failed to charge the jury to find whether any of the property had been left out from the schedule, and the legal effect of omitting such property from the schedule without placing it in by amendment, or otherwise, when attention was called to it;" and that "the court struck out this ground," and this action of the court is assigned as error. The matter stands thus: A motion for a new trial is presented to the judge, and he strikes out a ground which alleges that he failed to do a certain thing. This action on his part is equivalent to saying that he did not so fail, and is, in effect, a refusal to certify the ground. The ground, not being certified, cannot be considered; and, as the judge practically says that the statement in the ground is not true, of course he did not err in refusing to certify the ground. The point sought to be raised in this ground is the one which the movant attempted to raise in the ground of the motion dealt with in the preceding division of this opinion.

7. Error is assigned upon the following charge: "If you find that there has been any personal property left out fraudulently, as I have instructed you to mention it, and say that 'We, the jury, find that' such and such personal property 'is left out fraudulently.'" This charge was error, for the reason that the jury should have been instructed to return a verdict finding—First, whether any of the property described in the objections should have been embraced in the schedule; and, second, if so, was the applicant guilty of a willful fraud in concealing the same? The error was, however, harmless in the present case, for the reason that the evidence demanded a verdict that none of the property mentioned in the objections should have been embraced in the schedule.

8. The request to charge which was refused was covered by the general charge in almost the language of the request. On one of the main issues in the case, the evidence, as has been seen, demanded a verdict in favor of the applicant. A verdict in her favor on all of the issues was warranted, and there was no error which required the granting of a new trial. Judgment affirmed. WRIT OF ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SERVICE.

An acknowledgment of service of a bill of exceptions entered thereon before the same was certified by the trial judge constitutes no such service of the paper as the law requires. EVANS v. NAPIER et al.

CONDITIONAL SALE—RECORD—BONA FIDES—CLAIM CASE.

1. Where one delivers to another a certain amount of money with which, as his agent, to purchase live stock, and the purchase is accordingly made, the title to the stock vests in the principal; and if he agrees that the agent shall use the stock for a certain rental, and further agrees that the agent may, whenever he desires to do so, purchase the stock from the principal for the cost, with interest, this latter agreement is not a sale with reservation of title, and need not be recorded, under section 2776 of the Civil Code.

2. The fact that the agent made and delivered to the principal a bill of sale of the stock does not estop the principal to set up the above-stated facts. The intention of the parties and the bona fides of the transaction is a question for the determination of the jury.

3. It was therefore error, in a claim case, to refuse an amendment offered by the claimant, and averring the above-stated facts.

The transaction was a ilment. In the case of Wiggins v. Tumlin, 96 Ga. 753, 23 S. E. 75, Copeland delivered to Shannon a wagon and two mules, with the understanding that, if the wagon and mules suited Shannon, they would make a sale of them at an agreed price, and would then execute papers reserving title in Copeland until payment; and this court held that this constituted a mere bailment, and that it did not become a sale until Shannon desired to purchase the property, and executed a note, secured by mortgage, in payment, and that the title did not pass to Shannon until the contract of sale had been thus made and completed. This ruling was approved in Harp v. Guano Co., 99 Ga. 752, 27 S. E. 181. In the present case we think there was no sale at all, under the allegations of the offered amendment. There was therefore no sale with reservation of title, and the agreement was not such as is required by section 2776 of the Civil Code to be recorded.

2. The acceptance by Evans of the bill of sale from Beck does not estop him to set up the true relation between him and Beck and the circumstances surrounding the transaction. It will be remembered that this litigation is not between Evans and Beck, but between Evans and parties who had obtained judgment against Beck long prior to the execution of this bill of sale. The plaintiffs in fi. fa. were not parties to the bill of sale, and did not in any way act upon the fact that Beck executed the bill of sale and that Evans accepted it. They were not in any manner hurt by the conveyance, or led by it to do anything to their disadvantage. It is said by Herman in his work on Estoppel (volume 1, § 7, par. 5): "Nobody ought to be estopped from averring the truth or asserting a just demand, unless by his acts or words or neglect his now averring the truth or asserting the demand would work some wrong to some other person who has been induced to do something, or to abstain from doing something, by reason of what he has said or done, or omitted to say or do." We think that there was no estoppel arising from the facts alleged in the amendment offered by the claimant, and that the latter had the right to show the circumstances under which the bill of sale was executed. He could show that, although he accepted this conveyance from Beck, the latter had really no title to convey. Of course, his acceptance could be treated by the plaintiffs in fi. fa. as an admission that the title had theretofore been in Beck. It would then be for the jury to say what such an admission was worth under the circumstances and facts proved, and to find as to the true relation of the parties and the bona fides of the transaction. We think that the facts alleged made a question for the jury, and not for the judge, and did not in any way estop the claimant to set up the truth of the transaction. This court, in discussing almost this identical question, in the case of Sims v. Dorsey, 61 Ga. 488, said: "In the trial of a claim case, the property in question being a crop of corn, cotton, etc., produced on the claimant's land by the labor of the defendant in fi. fa., the claimant is not estopped to set up that the defendant in fi. fa. was not his tenant, but cultivated the land as a mere cropper, though he took from him, while the crop was growing, a landlord's lien thereon for provisions and supplies, and, after the crop matured, sued out a distress warrant against him for rent, and caused said warrant to be levied upon the crop. These acts, though of great force as evidence on the question of title to the crop, did not prejudice the plaintiff in fi. fa. so as to work an estoppel in his favor; it not appearing that they induced him to extend the credit by which the defendant became his debtor, or in any way lessened his security or affected his interest. See Davis v. Collier, 13 Ga. 486. The claimant had a right to explain and account for them, and thus harmonize them with his final position, that the title to the crop was in himself, and so remained." See, also, Darke v. Bush, 57 Ga. 180.

3. For the reasons given, we think that the court erred in refusing to allow the amendment offered by the claimant. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

FOUNTAIN et al. v. MILLS et al.

ACTION—DISMISSAL—RECEIVER—DISCHARGE—JURISDICTION OF ASSETS.

1. A plaintiff may dismiss his suit which is pending in any court of this state, either in term time or vacation, where some right of the defendant is not prejudiced thereby; but the dismissal by the plaintiff of an equitable proceeding, in which a receiver to take charge of the assets of the defendant has been appointed, does not necessarily operate to discharge the receiver. He is an officer of the court, his possession of the assets of the defendant is possession by the court, and while in such a case the functions of the receiver, as between the parties, are ended, his custody of the assets in his hands continues, subject to the order of the court.

2. Where, in such case, the holder of a lien, or other creditor of the defendant, before the receiver has been ordered to surrender the assets in his hands, makes a claim thereto, the judge may, notwithstanding the dismissal of the original suit, retain jurisdiction over the fund, under a proper petition of the creditor for such distribution as may be legal and equitable, but it is not good practice to order a reinstatement of the original case.

Error from superior court, Decatur county; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Petition by Coombs & Co. against H. J. Fountain and others in which one Harrell was appointed receiver. Thereafter the action was dismissed, and T. T. Mills and others filed a petition to turn over to them certain moneys. From an order reinstating the case, Fountain and others bring error. Affirmed, with directions.

Albert H. Russell and M. E. O'Neal, for plaintiffs in error. Bower & Bower, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. Coombs & Co. filed a petition against Fountain and E. Swindle & Co., in which, after making certain allegations, he prayed, among other things, for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of certain property of Fountain, and after a hearing Harrell was appointed receiver of such property. Subsequently the petition was dismissed by the plaintiffs, and the cost paid.

Thereafter, and before a discharge of the receiver had been ordered, Mills, for himself and as agent of others, filed a petition against O'Neal, Fountain, and Harrell, receiver, in the court where the receiver had been appointed, praying that the defendants turn over to them a certain sum of money. This petition was subsequently amended by incorporating a prayer that the case of Coombs & Co. against Fountain and Swindle be reinstated, and that certain money in the hands of O'Neal be turned over to Harrell, receiver. The petitioner offered evidence of certain attachments and foreclosure of laborer's liens which had been levied upon the property of Fountain, which was originally included in that which the receiver was ordered to take possession of. Reference was had in the original petition to these attachments and foreclosures of laborers' liens, from the existence of which the plaintiffs therein alleged that a receiver should be appointed, and in appointing the receiver the judge referred to same, and directed the receiver appointed to pay them if he realized sufficient funds from the sale of the property. So that not only were the claims presented by Mills recognized by the plaintiffs at the time the bill was filed, but provision was made by the judge for their payment. On the hearing of the petition, O'Neal, one of the attorneys of Fountain, gave certain testimony, which it is not material here to set out, other than that after the dismissal of the case against Fountain and Swindle the property in question was sold, and the proceeds went into his hands for the purpose of making certain settlements. On the hearing of the petition filed by Mills, the court ordered that the case of Coombs & Co. against Fountain and Swindle & Co. be reinstated, and that O'Neal be ordered to deposit the sum in his hands, subject to the draft of the receiver, until final adjudication on this petition was had. To this order Fountain and O'Neal excepted.

It is contended by the plaintiffs in error that the plaintiffs had the legal right to dismiss their action either in vacation or term time, and it is further contended that, when this was done, necessarily the funds in the receiver's hands went to the party from whom they were taken. There is no question but that the plaintiff may dismiss his action in any court of this state, either in vacation or in term time, where some right of the defendant is not prejudiced by such dismissal (Smith v. Smith, 101 Ga. 298, 28 S. E. 665); but we cannot assent to the proposition that on the dismissal of this action the funds necessarily went to Fountain, a defendant to the original petition, from whose estate they were realized, and which are now in the possession of Mr. O'Neal. For the proposition that such a disposition necessarily follows the dismissal, we are referred to the case of Warren v. Bunch, 80 Ga. 124, 7 S. E. 270. It will be noted, however, in that case, that the ruling was made on the principle that the court in which the petition was filed and by which the receiver was appointed had no jurisdiction. If it had not, then, under plain principles of law, all the proceedings taken were absolutely void, and, being void, parties must, upon the plain principles of equity, be restored as nearly as possible to their original status quo. The ruling in the case is that property which has been left in the hands of a receiver, after the bill has been dismissed for want of jurisdiction, ought to be restored to the party from whom the receiver took it. That case can have no bearing upon the question here raised. A receiver is the officer of the court, and the possession by a receiver of property belonging to the defendant is the possession of the court. In his work on Receivers (section 833), Mr. High states the rule to be that the abatement of the action, or the entry of final judgment therein, does not have the effect of discharging the receiver ipso facto; that although, as between the parties to the litigation, the functions of the receiver have terminated with the determination of the suit, the receiver is still amenable to the court, as its officer, until he has complied with its direction as to the disposal of the funds which he has received during the course of his receivership. Mr. Beach, in his work on Receivers (section 800), declares that the determination of the suit will not, of itself, discharge the receiver, but his functions must be terminated by a formal order of the court. In the case of Whiteside v. Prendergrast, 2 Barb. Ch. 471, it was ruled by the court of chancery of the state of New York that the discontinuance of a suit does not discharge a receiver appointed therein. To the same effect, also, see Crook v. Findley, 60 How. Prac. 375. In the case of Field v. Jones, 11 Ga. 413, it was ruled that, on the dismissal of a bill, the functions of a receiver who had been appointed ceased between the parties, but that his amenability continued to the court, and that the fund in his hands was subject to the order of the court, and would be returned to the party from whom it was taken, unless retained upon a claim properly made known and presented to the chancellor. The rule laid down in the Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice (volume 17, p. 847) is that, "after final disposition of the pending suit, the discharge of the receiver is usually a matter of right; but where other interests than those of the parties to the suit, such as the interests of lienholders or other creditors, have come into the litigation, a dismissal or other final determination of the cause will not preclude the court from taking any action, even to continuing the receivership, if necessary to protect such interests"; and this rule is supported by numerous authorities cited in note 1 on page 848 of the same volume. The appointment of a receiver is a harsh remedy, and is not to be exercised by the court in any case, except where interests of creditors and others concerned can only be fully protected; but, when exercised, the effect is that the court takes possession of the property of the defendant for the purpose of subserving these interests. The right of the defendant to settle, and of the plaintiff to dismiss his petition, is not to be abridged. With the exercise of these rights the court has but little concern, but neither the settlement by the defendant, nor the dismissal of his suit by the plaintiff, operates to discharge the receiver, or to take the fund in his hands out of the possession of the court. That can only be done by an order of the court, which will not be granted until it has been made satisfactorily to appear that the interests of the creditors of the defendant will not be prejudiced. In this case the plaintiff had a right to dismiss his suit. He did so. It did not operate to discharge the receiver, nor to make disposition of the property which the receiver was directed to take and sell. On the petition of certain creditors of Fountain, claiming to be lienholders and asking for the appropriation of the fund in the hands of the receiver, the court ordered the original case in which the receiver was appointed to be reinstated. This was error. Conquest v. Bank, 97 Ga. 500, 25 S. E. 343. It was further ordered, however, that the fund arising from the sale of property which had been placed in the hands of the receiver, and which was at that time in the hands of Mr. O'Neal, attorney for one of the original defendants, be paid over to the receiver. In this it must be ruled that the court did not err, but it had jurisdiction to make final disposition of that fund among the creditors and holders of lien against Fountain, notwithstanding the dismissal of the original bill, such disposition to be legally and equitably made under the petition filed by Mills and others, but not under the original bill. The judgment is therefore affirmed, with direction. Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

INSOLVENCY—USURY—ACTION TO RECOVER—LIMITATIONS — APPEAL AND ERROR — INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL OF REQUESTS—NEW TRIAL.

1. Any plea or suit for the recovery back of usury voluntarily paid by a debtor to his creditor must be brought within a period of one year after such payment is made. Hence, in a contest between two creditors over the assets of their insolvent debtor, one creditor cannot make the other account for usury voluntarily paid him by the debtor before insolvency, without instituting proceedings for this purpose within 12 months from the time of such payment.

2. The instructions requested, so far as legal and pertinent, were sufficiently covered by the general charge given to the jury, and the failure to charge in the precise language requested is not cause for a new trial.

3. While the evidence upon the sole issue submitted to and passed upon by the jury was decidedly conflicting, that introduced for the defendant in error was sufficient to support the verdict, and it does not appear that the same was contrary to the charge of the court.

Error from superior court, Douglas county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by Gramling, Spalding & Co. against W. H. Pool and others for an injunction and equitable relief. Judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. H. McLarty and J. S. James, for plaintiffs in error. W. A. James and A. L. Bartlett, for defendants in error.

LEWIS, J. It appears that the litigation between the parties to this case has been pending in court for a number of years. The plaintiffs in error in this case filed their bill in December, 1885, as creditors by open account of the firm of Turner & Hudson against said firm, which was composed of G. R. Turner and Allen Hudson, and also against W. H. Pool and others, for injunction, receiver, and other equitable relief. In that bill, among other things, it was alleged that Turner & Hudson were insolvent traders, and attacked as fraudulent and void a deed from G. R. Turner to W. H. Pool, dated March 19, 1884. That case came to this court, and is reported as Pool v. Gramling, 88 Ga. 653, 16 S. E. 52. It seems from that case it was decided that the deed from Turner to W. H. Pool was executed and held for the purpose of delaying and defeating the collection of debts due by Turner & Hudson to complainants and other creditors; that Pool held an absolute deed to the property to secure a debt with his bond to reconvey outstanding; that, upon the debtor afterwards becoming insolvent, Pool took the property in payment of the debt, the value of the property being largely in excess of the debt. On this branch of the case it was decided by this court that the other creditors might have the property administered in equity as the assets of an insolvent, and the proceeds applied first to the secured debt, and the surplus to their own claims. The present case is an ancillary proceeding brought to the May adjourned term, 1896, of court, by the same plaintiffs against the defendants Turner & Hudson, W. H. Pool et al., in which it is alleged that the property described in the original bill in the case has been sold under the decree rendered therein by the commissioner appointed by the court for that purpose, and brought the sum of $2,100, the terms of sale being one-third cash, and the balance in one and two years, payments drawing 8 per cent. interest per annum from date; that the commissioner had collected the cash payment of $700, and had instituted suit on the notes given by Mrs. Mary W. Turner for the balance, due in one and two years after date; that before the final trial of the case in the supreme court Pool had charge of the premises sold as set out in the original suit, and received more rents and profits arising from said property than his entire debt against Turner & Hudson amounted to, and that he should pay back to complainants the sum of $300 for rent on said property, which he received over and above the amount of the debt claimed by him against G. R. Turner. The petition prayed that the matters therein referred to be inquired of by the court, and a final distribution of the money be had in the case as originally directed in the decree, and that said Pool be required to account for all moneys and rents which had gone into his hands. Petitioners amended by alleging that G. R. Turner gave to Pool his note for $50 as interest on $600 for eight months from date, and that in the fall of 1885 Turner paid off the $50 note, which was $16 more than 8 per cent. per annum on the amount borrowed. This balance was claimed as a set-off against the principal sum of $600. The jury, on the trial of the issue formed by this case, returned a verdict in favor of W. H. Pool for $729.78, whereupon plaintiffs made a motion for a new trial, and except to the judgment of the court overruling the same. In the judgment overruling this motion it was ordered by the court that counsel for Pool write off of said verdict and judgment the sum of $65.80, in obedience to which order that amount was accordingly written off.

1. In one ground of the motion for a new trial it is alleged that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury, as duly requested by plaintiff's counsel in writing, as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that G. R. Turner, on the 21st day of March, 1884, borrowed from W. H. Pool the sum of $600, and gave to Pool his note for $50 as interest on same date, and that this note was given as interest on $600 for eight months' time, beginning on the 21st of March, and due 21st of November, 1884, and you further believe that Turner paid the $50 in fall of 1885, and took up the note, I charge you that all over eight per cent. on the $600 for eight months would be usury, and you ought to credit Pool's debt with such usury at the time it was paid in 1885." Exception is further taken in the motion to the following charge of the court: "I will state here that the $50 note has nothing to do with the case. That has already been paid, settled, and gone into, and you need not consider it in any way." There seems to be no dispute in the testimony introduced on the trial that Pool actually made a loan of $600 to Turner, and that he took his note for $600 principal, and also took another note for $50, due in six months, which was stated by Turner to be a premium for the loan of $600. There is no question but that the $50 note was really usurious, and that, as such, it was paid in the fall of 1885, several years before the institution of this proceeding to make the creditor account for the usury. It does not appear that when Turner paid the $50 note he was insolvent. Hence we think the claim of forfeiture of this usury has long since been barred by the statute of limitations. By the act of February 24, 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 105), entitled "An act to regulate and restrict the rate of interest in this state, and for other purposes therein mentioned," after providing that it should be unlawful to charge or take any interest greater than 12 per cent. per annum, and any one violating this provision should forfeit the interest so charged or taken, it was provided further "that any plea or suit for the recovery of such forfeiture shall not be barred by the lapse of time shorter than one year." The act approved December 11, 1871 (Acts 1871, p. 75), made the period of limitation for a forfeiture of usury charged six months; and the act of 1875, which is embodied in section 2891 of the Civil Code, simply intended to extend the period of limitation prescribed by the act of 1871 from six months to twelve months. In the case of Cheapstead v. Frank, 71 Ga. 549, it was decided that the statute of limitations, in reference to any pleas or suits for the recovery of usury paid, is applicable to suits to recover usury which has been paid, or to a set-off claiming such a demand. This decision had reference to the act of 1875 above cited. In the case of Lilly v. De Laperiere, 76 Ga. 348, there seems to have been a question on the mind of Justice Blanford as to whether this act of 1875 was repealed by the act of October 14, 1879 (Acts 1879, p. 184). This question was finally adjudicated by this court in Johnson v. Association, 97 Ga. 622, 25 S. E. 358, which held that "section 5 of the usury act of February 24, 1875 (Acts 1875, p. 105), now embodied in section 2057(e) of the Code of 1882, was not repealed by the usury act of October 14, 1879 (Acts 1878–79, p. 185), and consequently an action for the recovery of money paid as usury must be brought within one year from the time such payment was made, or the same will be barred." Besides, section 2057(e) of the Code of 1882, construed by that decision, is now embodied in the present Code, and would stand as law even if there had been an effort to repeal the same by the legislature of 1879. It follows from the above that the debtor himself could not have recovered back this usury he voluntarily paid his creditor, either by suit therefor or by plea and set-off, unless he had instituted his action within 12 months from such payment; and, of course, the law confers upon his creditors no greater right than it does upon the debtor in such a matter.

2. Another ground in the motion for a new trial is that the court erred in refusing the written request of plaintiffs' counsel, as follows: "If the jury believes from the evidence that G. R. Turner could have rented the storehouse for the term of five years at $12 per month, and went to W. H. Pool, and tried to get him to allow the storehouse to be rented, and pay the same on the $600 note held by W. H. Pool against G. R. Turner, and you further believe that Pool refused to do so, and continued by himself or his tenant to occupy and keep possession of the premises, he would be bound to account for the rent for the five years at the rate of $12.00 per month." It is true, the record disclosed that Turner did testify in effect that he had been offered for five years' rent of the premises the rate of $12 per month. It was denied, on the other hand, that such an offer was ever made known to Pool. It appears from the record that in his general charge to the jury the court instructed them to the effect that if they believed from the evidence that Pool had by himself, or those under him, occupied the premises in question, he would be responsible for whatever rent he had received, or ought to have received, by the use of ordinary care and prudence; and, if others occupied the storehouse with his consent, he would be bound to account for whatever rent the evidence shows the same to be worth. He further instructed them that they should determine from the evidence how long Pool held this property after it was turned over to him by Turner, how long any one held it under him, and if, while in his possession and control, any one used the property by his consent, or he allowed it to be done, he would be responsible for the rent while it was so held, and they should charge him rent for whatever amount the evidence may show it was worth. There was considerable conflict in the testimony as to what this property was worth for rent, some testifying to its only being worth four dollars or five dollars per month, and others to sums in double that amount. The request which the court refused to give had reference to the testimony of one of the witnesses for the plaintiffs. It would have been equally as proper for the court to have specially charged a theory upon the testimony of any other witness in the case. Instead of going into details of this sort, where a number of witnesses were sworn on either side, and were in conflict, we think the trial judge pursued the better course in giving the general instructions to the jury above stated, which fully covered the issues involved between the parties touching the amount of rents that should be chargeable against the defendant; and we do not think, therefore, a failure to give this special request with reference to the testimony of a particular witness is cause for a reversal of the judgment refusing a new trial.

8. There are several other grounds in the motion for a new trial, some complaining of the verdict being contrary to the charge of the court, and also contrary to law and evidence. There is also a ground in the motion for a new trial, because the jury failed to allow a credit of $35 paid by Mrs. Turner on January 10, 1888, which Pool admitted should go as a credit on his claim. We do not know by what calculation the jury arrived at its verdict, and cannot say whether they allowed that credit or not in their findings. The evidence in the case was conflicting, not only as to the value of the premises in dispute for rent, but also as to the time in which Pool was properly chargeable with the rent; plaintiffs contending that he was in possession until the sale by the commissioner, which was in 1893,—eight years from the time he first acquired possession; the defendant introducing testimony tending to establish the fact that he abandoned possession of the storehouse in question about the time of the decision by this court in the case, which was rendered in 1891. What amount per month, and for what length of time, the jury credited his claim with rent does not appear from their verdict, which was simply one of a general nature. Besides this, the court required Pool's counsel to write off from the verdict an amount exceeding the credit which plaintiffs claim the jury failed to allow; and it may be that in ordering this deduction the judge intended to provide for the payment of that credit, as well as some others, which, in his judgment, might have been omitted. The sole issue in this case was passed upon by the jury under testimony that was decidedly conflicting, the main issue being as to what rents or profits the defendant Pool was chargeable with under the evidence presented both for plaintiffs and defendants. After carefully reading the testimony, we think that introduced in behalf of the defendant in error was sufficient to support the verdict, and we cannot say that there was anything to indicate that the verdict was contrary to the charge of the court. This was really a jury contest. It does not appear that any error of law was committed on the trial, and where, in an issue of fact, there is any evidence to sustain the finding of the jury, the invariable rule of this court is not to interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in overruling the motion for a new trial, though the record may tend to indicate a preponderance of the testimony in favor of the unsuccessful party. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

HORKAN v. BENNING.

EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS OF ADMINISTRATOR—EJECTMENT.

1. Admissions made by an administrator after his appointment are admissible against the estate of his intestate.

2. The amount of damages or of mesne profits to be recovered is a question for the jury, and not for the court. It was therefore error to direct the jury to find a specified sum as mesne profits.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Colquitt county; H. C. Sheffield, Judge.

Action by M. A. Benning, administratrix, against G. A. Horkan. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

I. A. Bush & Sons and D. H. Pope & Son, for plaintiff in error. W. C. McCall, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. An action of complaint for certain land in Colquitt county was brought by Mary A. Benning, as administratrix de bonis non of the estate of Seaborn Jones, against Horkan. The plaintiff put in evidence a grant from the state to Seaborn Jones, of Baldwin county, Ga., and her letters of administration. Horkan defended, and put in evidence a deed, dated in 1873, from John I. Hall, as administrator of John Hall, to Guzzard; a deed from Guzzard to Henry Banks, dated in 1877; a deed from Henry Banks to James Banks, dated in 1890; and a deed from James Banks to Horkan, dated in 1892. Horkan was shown to be in possession, but there was no evidence as to the length of time he had been in possession. There was evidence that the value of the timber on the land for turpentine purposes had been, before Horkan began to cut it, from $300 to $400, and that it was still worth, for turpentine purposes, from $1.50 to $2 per acre. There appears in the record nothing to show the number of acres in the lot. Horkan claimed that the intestate of the plaintiff was not the grantee named in the grant from the state relied upon by the plaintiff, and he showed by uncontradicted evidence that there had been, at the time of the grant, two men of the name of Seaborn Jones residing in Baldwin county, Ga. He showed that both these men subsequently moved to Muscogee county, where the intestate of the plaintiff resided up to the time of his death. The defendant also offered in evidence an application by the plaintiff to the ordinary of Muscogee county for leave to sell all the wild lands owned by the estate of her intestate, and not in Muscogee county. In this application were set out many and divers lots of land as the property of the estate, but among them did not appear the lot now in controversy. The defendant also offered in evidence certified copies of tax returns, showing that from 1866 to the time of the trial the administratrix of the intestate had never returned the lot for taxes, but that such lot had been returned, and the taxes on it paid by the defendant and those under whom he claimed. This evidence (the application and the certified copies of returns) was, on motion of plaintiff's counsel, rejected. The court thereupon directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the land and for $300 as mesne profits. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, in which he complained of the exclusion of the evidence mentioned above and of the direction of the verdict. This motion was overruled by the court, and the movant excepted.

1. The application to the ordinary, purporting to set out all the wild lands belonging to the estate of the intestate, setting out many such lands, and omitting this particular lot, was in the nature of an admission, and should have been received by the court. It is well settled by decisions of this court that admissions by an administrator or executor, made after he had been clothed with the trust, are admissible against the estate he represents. Sample v. Lipscomb, 18 Ga. 687; Lawson v. Powell, 31 Ga. 681; Floyd v. Wallace, 31 Ga. 688 (Syl., point 4). The court, therefore, erred in excluding the application. For the same reason it was error to exclude the certified copies of tax returns. We hold now simply that this evidence was admissible. What probative force it should have with the jury we are unable to say, and on that matter desire to express no opinion.

2. The present suit was brought for the land, and also for mesne profits. In an action of ejectment, mesne profits are given to a successful plaintiff as compensation in the nature of rent for the period, within the statute of limitations, for which the land has been illegally held by the defendant. What was the rental value of the land involved in the present case should have been determined by the jury. The evidence as to the rental value of the land was merely advisory, and the jury had the right to fix their own valuation. Further than this, the evidence did not point to any fixed or specific amount. It was therefore error for the court to direct the jury to find a verdict for $300 for mesne profits. Under the evidence and in the nature of the question, the determination of the amount of mesne profits should have been left with the jury. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

Ex parte GREGORY.

In re BUFFINGTON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 3, 1900.)

INSANE PERSONS—JUDGMENT WITHOUT NOTICE—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

Const. 1895, art. 5, § 15, provides that the court of common pleas shall have appellate jurisdiction of cases within the jurisdiction of inferior courts, unless the general assembly shall provide for appeals directly to the supreme court. The general assembly has not made such provisions in regard to appeal from the probate court. Article 5, § 19, provides that the court of probate shall have jurisdiction in cases of lunacy, unless changed by act of the general assembly, and no such change has been made. Code Civ. Proc. § 57, provides that any person injured by any final order or decree of the probate court may appeal to the circuit court. Held, that certiorari would not lie to a judgment of the probate court declaring a person to be of unsound mind, but that appeal was the proper remedy.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Saluda county; James Aldrich, Judge.

Certiorari by Henrietta Buffington to review a judgment of the court of probate declaring her insane. From an order dismissing the petition, she appeals. Affirmed.

N. G. Evans and E. W. Able, for appellant. C. J. Ramage, E. S. Blease, and J. N. O. Gregory, for appellee.

POPE, J. Henrietta Buffington, without any notice to her, was adjudged by the probate court of Saluda county, in this state, to be a person of unsound mind, and one A. J. Gregory was appointed by such probate court to be the committee of her person and estate. From this judgment of the probate court the said Henrietta Buffington, through her attorney, E. W. Able, Esq., has, within the time prescribed by statute, served notice of appeal, and such appeal is now pending. However, after the notice of appeal above referred to, the said Henrietta Buffington, through her said attorney, E. W. Able, Esq., applied to James Aldrich, while presiding over the court of common pleas for said Saluda county, for the writ of certiorari to be directed to the judge of probate for Saluda county, requiring him to have the records of his court relating to the matter of Henrietta Buffington as a person of supposed unsound mind before Judge Aldrich. Due return was made by said probate judge, whereupon Judge Aldrich dismissed the petition for writ of certiorari, and refused to issue said writ, upon the ground that the petitioner has an ample remedy by appeal, and that said appeal is her proper remedy. She now appeals, and by her appeal, on the grounds thereof,—(1) that the circuit judge erred in holding that Henrietta Buffington had the right of appeal from the proceedings in the probate court; and (2) that the circuit judge erred in holding that an appeal was the proper remedy, and not writ of certiorari,—the appellant concedes that practically but one question is before us, namely, whether there is right of appeal from the probate court in such a proceeding as that testing the soundness of mind of a party who is alleged to be of unsound mind, when such person so charged is served with no notice of such proceedings. We may remark that since the recent case of State v. Moore, 54 S. C. 556, 32 S. E. 700, it is not an open question in this state that when a right of appeal is provided from an inferior jurisdiction writ of certiorari will not be allowed also, except, possibly, in very exceptional cases. Let us see if there is a right of appeal from the probate court to the court of common pleas. Our constitution of 1895 (section 15, art. 5) provides: "They [courts of common pleas] shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases within the jurisdiction of inferior courts, except from such inferior courts from which the general assembly shall provide an appeal directly to the supreme court." It is admitted that there has been no legislation in this state by which appeals may be taken from the orders, judgments, decrees, or other proceedings of a court of probate directly to the supreme court of this state. Such being the case, the courts of common pleas have appellate jurisdiction in all cases within the jurisdiction of probate courts. Our next inquiry is, have probate courts jurisdiction of matters relating to persons non compos mentis? Section 19 of article 5 of our constitution of 1895 provides: "The court of probate shall remain as now established in the county of Charleston. In all other counties of the state the jurisdiction in all matters testamentary and of administration, in business appertaining to minors and allotment of dower, in cases of idiocy and lunacy and persons non compos mentis shall be vested as the general assembly may provide, and until such provision such jurisdiction shall remain in the court of probate as now established." It is admitted that there has been no provision by the general assembly of this state vesting jurisdiction in the cases enumerated in this section of the constitution in any other court than the probate. Both under the constitution of 1868 and the laws pursuant thereto courts of probate were intrusted with jurisdiction "in cases of idiocy and lunacy and persons non compos mentis." See Const. 1868, art. 4, § 20; 14 Acts Gen. Assem. § 38; also 2 Rev. St. § 37.

To show that Henrietta Buffington, though not served with process in the proceedings affecting her in the probate court, and not made a party to such proceeding, has the right of appeal preserved to her therefrom, we have but to cite section 57 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, which supplies the machinery to carry into effect the "appellate jurisdiction in all cases within the jurisdiction of inferior courts" confided to courts of common pleas in this state by article 5 of section 15 of our constitution of 1895. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE v. JAGGERS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 19, 1900.)

DYING DECLARATIONS—EVIDENCE IN REPLY—THREATS.

1. The statement of deceased, after he was shot, that "he was shot, and shot bad," does not show that he was aware that death was imminent, so as to admit statements as dying declarations.

2. That deceased, just after he was shot, used language indicating that he then feared that the shot would prove fatal, will not authorize the admission, as dying declarations, of statements made five to seven hours later, when he seemed to be resting perfectly easy, and did not manifest any concern about himself; nor is their admission authorized by the fact that five or six hours later he had no hope of recovery.

3. Testimony for defendant that deceased had made threats to injure him does not authorize the state, in reply, to prove threats made by defendant against deceased prior to the homicide.

aked him up,—shook him,"—and then de the statement in question. But, examined as to whether the deceased
onscious of his condition, he testified as follows: "Q. The boy, George, said nothing to you about whether he was going to die or not? A. No, I told him that he could make it [referring to the statement] if he wished; that he might die; that, if he had any statement to make, to make it now. Q. You told him he might die? A. Yes, sir. Q. He didn't say whether he was going to die or not? A. No, sir; he didn't say. Q. You say he was under the influence of morphine at the time? A. Seemed so. He was breathing pretty heavy, and seemed resting. Q. Didn't seem concerned about himself? A. No, sir; we had to shake him to keep him awake. Q. But he didn't seem to manifest any concern about himself,—whether he would get well or not? A. No; he seemed to be perfectly easy." It seems that another witness (J. N. Gillespie) had previously testified that he had seen the deceased in the morning after he was shot, and when asked if deceased had said anything about dying, replied: "Yes, sir; he just told me he had no hope of himself." But, there being some doubt as to the time when the deceased made this statement, the witness Gillespie was recalled, when he said that this statement was made to him by the deceased after dark, about 9 or 10 o'clock at night of the day deceased was shot; and that the deceased lived until about 12 o'clock the next day.

The rules in regard to the admissibility of dying declarations are well settled: (1) That death must be imminent at the time the declarations in question are made; (2) that the declarant must be so fully aware of this as to be without any hope of life; (3) that the subject of the charge must be the death of the declarant, and the circumstances of the death must be the subject of the declarations. State v. Johnson, 26 S. C. 153, 1 S. E. 510, and the cases therein cited, recognized and followed in the subsequent cases of State v. Bradley, 34 S. C. 139, 13 S. E. 315, and Same v. Banister, 35 S. C. 295, 14 S. E. 678. Now, while the third of these requirements was met in this case, and possibly the first, also, although the death did not occur until the next day, yet we are unable to discover any evidence that the second requirement was met; for there is nothing to show that the deceased, at the time he made the declarations in question, was so fully aware that his death was imminent as to have lost all hope of recovery, but the testimony, rather, tends to show the contrary. The deceased was sleeping quietly,—"he seemed to be perfectly easy,"—and, when roused up and asked if he did not want some milk, sat up in bed and drank a glass of milk, and then made the declarations admitted in evidence. He certainly said nothing and did nothing tending to show that he was conscious of impending death. The doctor, who had seen him and given him some powders, was not examined as to his condition, nor asked his opinion as to whether death was imminent, so far as the record before us shows. Even when told by the witness who took the statement that he might die, and if he wished to make any statement he could do so, the deceased expressed no apprehension, and in no way indicated that he was uneasy about his condition. On the contrary, when the witness was asked whether deceased seemed to be concerned about himself, he replied: "No, sir; we had to shake him to keep him awake. Q. But he didn't seem to manifest any concern about himself,—whether he would get well or not? A. No; he seemed to be perfectly easy." This certainly is not such evidence as the rule contemplates. But it is contended that the testimony of Cato Williams, copied above, is sufficient to show that deceased had lost all hope of recovery. This witness seems to have been the first person who reached the deceased after he was shot,—a very few minutes afterwards; and, when first asked what the deceased said, did not say that the deceased said anything about dying, only said "he was shot, and shot bad." Subsequently, when asked: "Q. Did George [the deceased] say anything about dying? A. He never said anything to me about dying, except at the well. He said he was shot, and didn't expect to live. He said he was shot bad, and didn't expect to get over it. And the other, at home, I don't know anything about that." This conversation between the witness and the deceased, thus amplified beyond his first statement of such conversation, manifestly occurred at the well, but a very short time after the deceased was shot down, and several hours before the deceased was removed to his home; and while it may be true that, under the excitement of the moment, he may have used the language last attributed to him by the witness, indicating that he then feared that the shot would prove fatal, yet, several hours afterwards, when he had been removed to his house, and seemed to be resting "perfectly easy," it does not at all follow that he still entertained the same apprehensions. On the contrary, the witness who took the statement offered in evidence says that he did not then seem to manifest any concern about himself, which he undoubtedly would have done if he then supposed that death was imminent. Again, it is said that his declaration to the witness Gillespie that "he had no hope of himself" shows that he was conscious of his condition; but it is manifest that such declaration was made some four or five hours after the witness Sandifer took down the statement offered in evidence, and it might well be that he had then lost hope of himself, though it is far from showing that he had lost hope when he made the statement to Sandifer, several hours before. It is true that Gillespie, when first on the stand, did testify that the statement made to him was before Sandifer had seen the deceased; but, when recalled to the stand for the purpose of explaining when it was that he heard deceased say that he had no hope of himself, he not only says that it was after Sandifer had seen the deceased, but fixes the time specifically, as after dark (about 9 or 10 o'clock at night), which was some four or five hours after the statement was made to Sandifer about 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Now, in view of the fact that dying declarations constitute one of the exceptions of the rule rejecting hearsay evidence (1 Greenl. Ev. § 156), and in view of the following language in section 158 of the same volume, "It is essential to the admissibility of these declarations, and is a preliminary fact to be proved by the party offering them in evidence, that they were made under a sense of impending death," it seems to us that there was error in receiving in evidence the statement taken down in writing by the witness Sandifer as the dying declaration of the deceased.

The second question is whether there was error in receiving the testimony of one Wilson, when offered in reply by the state, tending to show that defendant had made threats against the deceased prior to the homicide. This testimony was objected to by defendant's counsel upon the ground that it was not in reply to any testimony offered for the defense, but the objection was overruled. It does not appear in the "case," as prepared for argument here, or from the supplement found in the argument of the solicitor, that the defendant had offered any testimony to which the testimony of the witness Wilson could, in any sense, be regarded as a reply. Nor does it appear in any part of the record before us that the testimony of Wilson tended to contradict anything testified to by the defendant. Indeed, it nowhere appears that defendant was ever examined as a witness in his own behalf. All that we can find in the "case" in regard to threats is the following statement: "After the state had rested its case, the defendant introduced his testimony, showing, among other things, that deceased was unfriendly to him [the accused], and had made threats to do him injury at various times before the homicide. The state, in reply, offered, also, to prove threats made by the accused, and for this purpose examined Steve Wilson,"—followed by the testimony of said Wilson to the effect that the accused had said, "When I meet George [the deceased] again, I am going to shoot his heart strings out." This testimony, while, no doubt, competent if it had been offered by the state when developing its testimony in chief, when the defendant would have had an opportunity to contradict or explain it, was clearly incompetent in reply; for it was not in reply to any testimony adduced by the defendant. It certainly was not in reply to the testimony offered by the defendant tending to show that the deceased had made threats to do him (the defendant) injury at various times before the homicide; for it might be perfectly true that each of the parties had made threats against the other, and the fact, if fact it be, that the de-had made threats against the defend- l not in any way tend to show that fendant had or had not made threats t the deceased. The testimony of Wil- as clearly incompetent when offered state in reply, and upon this ground, here should be a new trial. The judg- of this court is that the judgment of rcuit court be reversed, and the case led to that court for a new trial.

on by the Gem Chemical Company t A. G. Youngblood and others. Judg- or plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Afl, Cothran & Cothran, for appellants. on & Giles, for respondent.

Y, A. J. As the questions raised by ceptions involve the construction of adings, the material allegations of the int and answer will be set out. They follows:

plaint: The first paragraph alleges rporate existence of the plaintiff. The paragraph alleges the co-partnership defendants. "(3) That on the 11th July, 1898, at Greenwood, S. C., an t was stated between the said plain- d the said defendants, and upon such ent a balance of two hundred and sev- dollars and sixty-four cents was found due from the said defendants to this ff. (4) That thereupon on the same wit, the 11th day of July, 1898, the laintiff made its bill of exchange in , dated the 21st day of June, 1898, d to the said defendants, under their ame of Youngblood & Cothran, at vood, S. C., and thereby required the efendants to pay to the order of the ff two hundred and seventeen dollars xty-four cents, sixty days after said or value received, a copy of which exchange is hereto attached as a part complaint, and marked 'Exhibit A.'" th paragraph alleges the acceptance of the draft by the defendants on the 11th of July, 1898. The sixth paragraph alleges that no part of said bill of exchange has been paid.

Answer: "(1) The defendants admit that they accepted the plaintiff's draft as set forth in the complaint, and that no part thereof has been paid. (2) They deny the third paragraph of the complaint. (3) The defendants allege that the said acceptance was executed by them in consideration of the sale to them by plaintiff of 162 gallons of Kola Pepsin, and for no other consideration, under a representation and warranty by the plaintiff at the time of sale that the said Kola Pepsin was a fit and proper material for soda-water drinks, and suitable for such purposes. (4) That the defendants then accepted and purchased said goods for sale to proprietors of soda fountains, trusting in the said representation and warranty of the plaintiff, all of which the plaintiff then knew. (5) That the said goods were not fit or proper for said purpose, but altogether unsuitable, and have always been and are altogether useless to the defendants." The defendants also set up in their answer a counterclaim for $100 arising out of the facts alleged in paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 of their answer.

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants appealed upon exceptions, which will not be considered in detail, as the argument of the appellants' attorneys shows that they raise practically but three questions, to wit: "(1) Did the circuit judge err in deciding the issue of account stated? (2) Did he err in excluding evidence to the effect that the alleged account stated was procured by misrepresentations and fraud? (3) If defendants are precluded from attacking the account stated, were they entitled to show that there was a failure of consideration in the acceptance of the draft, which was brought about by the misrepresentations of plaintiff?"

We will first consider whether there was error on the part of his honor, the presiding judge, in his ruling as to the account stated. The account stated is as follows:

"Baltimore, Oct. 1st, 1898.

"Youngblood & Cothran, Greenwood, S. C., bought of Gem Chemical Co., of Baltimore city:

	Cr.
July 12th, freight		$ 9 36
" rebate 10c. per gallon		16 00
			$217 64

"Rec. accepted draft, $217.64, dated 60 days from June 21st, and accepted by Y. & C. on July 11th, 1898."

The only grounds upon which the defendants relied to defeat the plaintiff's recovery herein were fraud, misrepresentation, and want of consideration in the acceptance of the draft. The circuit judge ruled that under the pleadings these grounds could not be considered. The construction of the account stated presented a question of law to be determined by the court, as it does not contain any words of a doubtful meaning, which required the jury to decide in what sense they were used. If the circuit judge was correct in ruling that the grounds relied upon by the defendants could not be considered, as they did not properly arise under the pleadings, it was his duty to instruct the jury as to the force and effect of the said instrument of writing. After the ruling of the circuit judge hereinbefore mentioned, there was no testimony before the jury from which they could find that the instrument of writing had any other effect than that which appeared upon its face.

This brings us to a consideration of the second question, whether the presiding judge erred in excluding evidence to the effect that the account stated was procured by fraud and misrepresentations. In 9 Enc. Pl. & Prac. pp. 684, 685, it is said: "Fraud is never presumed, and in order to entitle a party to relief, either at law or in equity, on that, it is essential that the fraud be distinctly alleged in the pleadings, so that it may be put in issue, and evidence thereof given. This rule is applicable as well to the pleadings of the plaintiff as to those of the defendant. In the absence of such an allegation, evidence of fraud will not be received at the trial." On pages 686 and 687 of the same volume we find the following: "In alleging fraud it is well settled, both at law and in equity, that the mere general averment, without setting out the facts upon which the charge is predicated, is insufficient. Whether the fraud be alleged in the declaration, complaint, or bill, or set up by way of defense in the plea, answer, or replication, it is essential that the facts and circumstances which constitute it should be set out clearly, concisely, and with sufficient particularly to apprise the opposite party of what he is called upon to answer." In order to constitute a defense to the plaintiff's cause of action, on the ground that the defendants were deceived by misrepresentation and fraud, it was necessary to allege the scienter on the part of the plaintiff. Wood v. Ashe, 3 Strob. 64; Read v. Duncan, 2 McCord, 167; Houston v. Gilbert, 3 Brev. 64. The words, "all of which the plaintiff then knew," in paragraph 4 of the answer, do not refer to the allegations set forth in the fifth paragraph thereof, but to an entirely different state of facts. The answer failed to allege fraud and misrepresentations, and there was no error in rejecting the evidence offered to prove them.

We will now consider the third question, which is as follows: "If defendants are precluded from attacking the account stated, were they not entitled to show that there was a failure of consideration in the acceptance of the draft, which was brought about by the misrepresentation of plaintiff?" The defense of failure of consideration, in the absence of deceit on the part of the seller, arises ex contractu. All matters of contract growing out of the sale, whether express or implied, were merged in the account stated. Until the jury reached the conclusion that the account stated was a nullity, they could not consider the question of failure of consideration by reason of the breach of warranty implied by law. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

MARCHBANKS v. MARCHBANKS.

CONSTITUTION—CONSTRUCTION—MAGISTRATES—INSTRUCTING JURY.

Magistrates are within Const. art. 5, § 26, providing that judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but shall declare the law; they being included in the word "judge" in section 6, and there being nothing to show a different intention in section 26.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by S. P. Marchbanks against S. S. Marchbanks. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Blythe & Blythe, for appellant. Adam C. Welborn, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The appeal herein raises the question whether magistrates are included within the terms of section 26, art. 5, of the constitution, which provides, "Judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but shall declare the law." Generally, when the constitution refers to the members of the supreme court, they are mentioned as "justices of the supreme court." Circuit judges are referred to as "judges of the circuit court," while those formerly known as "trial justices" had their title changed to "magistrates." Delk v. Zorn, 48 S. C. 149, 26 S. E. 466. The word "judge," without the superadded words "of the circuit court," is sometimes used in the constitution so as to embrace "magistrates" as well as "justices of the supreme court." For instance, section 6, art. 5, of the constitution is as follows: "No judge shall preside at the trial of any cause in the event of which he may be interested or when either of the parties shall be connected with him by affinity or consanguinity within such degrees as may be prescribed by law, or in which he may have been counsel or have presided in any inferior court. In case all or any of the justices of the supreme court shall be thus disqualified or be otherwise prevented from presiding in any cause or causes the court or the justices thereof shall certify the same to the governor of the state, and he shall immediately commission specially the requisite number of men learned in the law for the trial and determination thereof. The same course shall be pursued in the circuit and inferior courts as is prescribed in this section for causes in the supreme court. * * *" Having shown in this part of the constitution that the intention was to include "magistrates" when using the word "judge," it is but reasonable to suppose that, when this word is found in other parts of the constitution, it has the same meaning, unless the context showed otherwise. There is nothing in section 26, art. 5, of the constitution tending to show that the word "judge" was intended to have a different meaning from that which it had been shown to have in section 6 of said article. Any other construction of the constitution would deprive a litigant of the important right to have the jury instructed by the court as to the law of the case. If the magistrate knows the law, it is his duty to instruct the jury; and, if he is not sufficiently versed in the law to charge the jury, he should not hold the office. Our construction of the constitution renders unnecessary consideration of the additional grounds upon which the respondent relied. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE v. WINE et al.

CRIMINAL LAW—HANDING LETTER TO JUROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In the absence of anything to show prejudice, it will not be held error that, a letter addressed to a juror having been received by the clerk during the trial, the judge, without examining it or asking counsel if there was any objection, allowed the juror to receive it.

2. Counsel having submitted to the court certain propositions of law, not with the request to charge them, but simply as a suggestion to him as to what the law is, it is enough that he charges substantially the law applicable to the case.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Orangeburg county; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Warby Wine and Major Green were convicted of murder, and appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. C. Wolfe, for appellants. W. St. J. Jervey, for the State.

GARY, A. J. The following preliminary statement is set out in the argument of the appellants' attorneys: "On the night of December 17, 1898, one H. H. Pauling was found intoxicated and wounded near the town of Ft. Motte, in Orangeburg county. Pauling died from his wound the next day. Warby Wine, Major Green, Dick Duncan, and John Taylor were arrested and lodged in jail, charged with the homicide. At the trial the solicitor elected to put only Wine and Green on trial for murder, Duncan and Taylor having been since released. The theory of the state was that Wine, Green, Duncan, and Taylor had conspired together to rob Pauling, and that during the consummation of the robbery Wine shot, killing Pauling, and that hence all were guilty of murder. The theory of the defense was: (1) That Pauling, deeply intoxicated, was making his way to the house of Jessie Parker; but on account of his intoxication failed to reach the house, and fell and lay on the ground where he was afterwards shot. (2) That Wine, Green, Duncan, and Taylor, also more or less intoxicated, going to their homes, passed near where Pauling lay; that some one of the party, seeing the object (Pauling) on the ground, called attention to it; whereupon Wine shot at it with the intention of scaring it, or making it move, in order that they might know what it was. (3) That when Wine shot Pauling made some exclamation, or it became known to these men in some way that it was a man instead of an animal. (4) That, even if Pauling had been robbed as charged by the state, such robbery was committed after the firing of the shot, and that the robbery was not the ulterior design, nor was there any connection between the robbery, if there was such, and the firing of the shot. (5) That the possession of Pauling's watch by Green could be accounted for and explained by several more reasonable hypotheses than a conspiracy to rob and murder, as charged by the state. The defendants were convicted. New trial was refused by circuit judge, and they appealed."

The first exception is as follows: "For that the juror C. N. Zeigler, who resides in or near the community where the homicide occurred, was allowed during the trial, and while the evidence was being heard, to receive a letter or some written communication." It seems the facts are as follows: Some one handed a letter to the deputy clerk addressed to Zeigler, one of the jurors. Upon the judge's attention being called to it, he directed that the letter be handed to the juror. It was not examined by the presiding judge, nor did he ask counsel if there was any objection to allowing the juror to receive the letter. The conduct of a trial must, in a great measure, be left to the sound discretion of the presiding judge. There are no facts in this case tending to show that the appellants were prejudiced by the action of the circuit judge. The exception is therefore overruled.

The second, third, and fourth exceptions are as follows: "(2) For that the court erred in charging the jury: 'And so in this case, if the evidence satisfied you that the defendants, or either of them, took the life of H. H. Pauling intentionally, without just cause or excuse, it constitutes a malicious killing, or a killing with malice aforethought, which the law holds to be murder.' (3) For that the court erred in charging the jury: 'The killing of a person for the purpose of committing an unlawful act, the other unlawful act being the ulterior design and moving cause, is murder.' (4) For that the court erred in charging the jury: 'And so, if a person shoot at an object supposing it to be some article of property, and not a person, and it turns out that he is mistaken, unless he is grossly negligent and careless in the doing of that act the law would not hold it to be more than manslaughter.'". These exceptions fail to specify the particular errors which the appellants desire to bring to the attention of the court. But waiving this objection, these exceptions, when considered in connection with the other parts of the charge, will be found to be free from error.

The fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth exceptions are as follows: "(5) For that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury: 'Before the jury can convict Green of any offense in this case, the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt, and to your satisfaction, that Green and Wine conspired together to rob Pauling, and while both of them were actually engaged in the very act of robbery Wine fired the fatal shot.' (6) For that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury: 'There must have been an actual agreement, intention, or conspiracy, either express or implied, between Green and Wine to rob Pauling previous to the firing of the fatal shot, else the jury cannot convict Green in this case.' (7) For that the court erred in not charging the jury as requested: 'It is absolutely necessary that there be a community of intention or interest, proven beyond a reasonable doubt by the state, between Green and Wine to rob Pauling, during the consummation of which Wine fired the fatal shot, before the jury can convict Green of either murder or manslaughter in this case.' (8) For that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury: 'If Green and Wine acted separately and distinctly in the commission of the robbery or the shooting, or either, then each must answer separately and distinctly for his offense. Wine must answer for the shooting and Green for the robbery, if there was such.' (9) For that the court erred in refusing to charge the jury: 'Finding of stolen property no legal presumption of guilt of murder or manslaughter.'" The presiding judge at the conclusion of his charge used the following language with reference to the appellants' attorneys: "They have submitted to the court some propositions of law, not with the request that I charge them to you, but simply as suggestion to the court as to what the law is, and some of them I deem it proper for me to read to you as being law applicable to this case in some of its aspects, and which you may apply to the facts, if you should take the view of the facts which these propositions contemplate." The presiding judge was not requested to charge the propositions of law just mentioned. And as he charged substantially the law applicable to the case, the exceptions cannot be sustained. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit be affirmed, and the case remanded to that court for the purpose of having another day assigned for the execution of the sentence.

MASON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

RAILROADS—ACCIDENT ON TRACK—INFANTS—NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE—EVIDENCE—CONTRADICTING WITNESS—DAMAGES — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Under a complaint for the killing of a child on a railroad, alleging that there was a highway crossing a mile away; that, when the statutory signals were given for that crossing, the mother, whose house was near the place of the accident, was accustomed to look out on the track to see if any of the children were in danger; and that on the occasion of the accident no signals were given,—evidence of the omission of the signals is admissible on the question of proximate cause.

2. A witness, being sworn, may be cross-examined, though not examined in chief.

3. Testimony that a witness made a certain statement just after the accident is admissible to contradict him; he having been asked if he made the statement, and having denied it.

4. Under Rev. St. § 2316, providing that the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties for whom such action shall be brought, a pecuniary loss need not be shown in an action for death of the infant.

5. It is immaterial that an illustration in the charge is inapplicable, where it is not misleading.

6. While an infant 16 months old may be technically a trespasser, he cannot be guilty of contributory negligence.

7. Where the direct and proximate cause of the death of an infant 16 months old, killed by a train, is negligence in failing to keep a reasonable lookout and to discover the child in time to have prevented the injury, the railroad company is liable, the same as though its negligence had been after discovery of the child on the track.

8. The jury having been instructed at the time evidence was admitted that it was to be considered only to contradict a witness, such an instruction need not afterwards be given.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Robert Mason, administrator, against the Southern Railway Company, for death of intestate, an infant 16 months old. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. P. Cothran, for appellant. A. H. Dean and Jos. A. McCollough, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The facts of this case are thus succinctly set forth in the preliminary statement prefacing the argument of the appellant's attorneys, and admitted to be correct by the respondent's attorneys, to wit: "Action for damages, $1,999.99, instituted in the court of common pleas for Greenville county September 29, 1899, by Robert Mason, as administrator of Clara Belle Mason.

deceased, for alleged negligent killing of intestate by defendant, Southern Railway Company, near South Tiger trestle, in Spartanburg county, on Atlanta & Charlotte Air-Line Railway, August 21, 1898. The intestate was a child sixteen months old, and was killed on the track, about 70 yards from a neighborhood crossing, near the house of her father, the plaintiff in this suit. Tried before Judge Gary and a jury at Greenville November 24, 1899. Verdict for plaintiff, $1,999.99. The plaintiff alleges that on the day named the child crawled, unobserved, from the plaintiff's house, which is near the track and in full view, and got upon the track, the mother at the time having no servants about the place, and being herself engaged in domestic duties; that the plaintiff was away from home at the time; that, about a mile from the point of collision, defendant's track crosses a public highway, and the mother was accustomed to watch upon the track for her children when the signals for that crossing were given; that upon the occasion in question the defendant failed to give the signals, and, if the signals were given, the mother did not hear them; that, while the child was seated upon the track, one of the defendant's trains, which was behind time, and run at an unusually rapid speed, recklessly and with grossest negligence ran over the child and killed it; that at the time the child was seated on the track at a point where a neighborhood road or 'traveled place' crosses said track, and the required signals were not given; that the agents of the defendant knew the location of the plaintiff's house, and for almost a mile in the direction from which the train approached the track was straight; that the engineer and fireman saw the child upon the track in ample time to have stopped the train before striking it, and, if they did not actually see and recognize it, they could, by the exercise of ordinary care in keeping a lookout, have seen and recognized it, and stopped the train in time to avoid striking it. The specific acts of negligence recapitulated in the complaint are stated to be (1) in not stopping the train, after having observed the child, in time to avoid the collision; (2) after first seeing the object, in not keeping a strict watch upon it, by which they would have recognized it as a human being in time; (3) in not keeping a proper lookout along this stretch of track, which ordinary care and a proper regard for life (human and animal) demanded, as well as the law of the land, which would have enabled the fireman or engineer to have seen the child in time. The remaining allegations of the complaint are formal, referring to the incorporation of defendant, the heirs at law of the intestate, the appointment of the plaintiff as administrator, and the amount of damages. The answer of the defendant admits its corporate existence, that the child was killed by its train, and denies the other allegations of the complaint. It alleges that the child was a trespasser upon the track at a place where she had no legal right to be, and where the servants of the company had no reason to suppose she would be; that as soon as she was discovered they did all in their power to avoid the accident; that the defendant owed no duty to the child, save to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring it after discovery; that it was impossible for the engineer to have seen the child in time to avoid striking it, as the child crawled upon the track on the left side of the engine, when the train was not more than 150 feet away, and too close for the engineer to avoid the collision. The defendant also pleads the contributory negligence of the parents." The appellant has argued the exceptions under the heads of "Evidence," "Motion for Nonsuit," "Burden of Proof," and "Judge's Charge."

Subdivision "a" of the first exception assigned error as follows: "(a) The presiding judge erred in admitting evidence to the effect that the defendant failed to ring the bell or blow the whistle for the Burnett crossing, a mile from the scene of accident, for the reason that said testimony was irrelevant to the issue. This exception applies to the testimony of Robert Mason, T. J. Burnett, Ida Mason, Henry Pinson, and William Smith upon this point, and the ruling of the presiding judge to this effect: 'I think the failure to blow the whistle or ring the bell is, according to law, evidence of negligence.'" The complaint alleges gross negligence and recklessness on the part of the defendant in running its train at the time the accident occurred, and the answer sets up the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the infant's parents. The complaint also alleges that the highway crosses the defendant's track about a mile from the place where the collision took place, and that when the statutory signals were given when approaching said crossing the mother of the child was accustomed to look out upon defendant's track to see if any of the children were in danger; that the defendant failed to give the statutory signals (at least, she did not hear them) on that occasion. Under these circumstances, the circuit judge properly allowed the jury to consider this testimony in determining the proximate cause of the injury. Mack v. Railroad Co., 52 S. C. 323, 29 S. E. 905, 40 L. R. A. 679.

Subdivision "b" alleges error as follows: "(b) The presiding judge erred in refusing to allow the witness J. D. Pettus to answer the question: 'If it had been one of your own children on that track at the time, could you have done anything to prevent striking it?'—such question being competent and relevant to show that degree of care exercised by the engineer after he discovered the child crawling upon the track." This question merely called forth an expression of opinion, and, even if it could be regarded as erroneous, it was harmless.

Subdivision "c" is as follows: "(c) The presiding judge erred in refusing to allow the defendant to cross-examine the witness Ed. James, who was put up by plaintiff." When a witness is sworn, he becomes subject to examination in chief and to cross-examination. The right of cross-examination is not destroyed by the failure to examine in chief. This error was, however, cured when the defendant's attorney thereafter was permitted to cross-examine the witness.

Subdivision "d" is as follows: "(d) The presiding judge erred in overruling defendant's objection to, and allowing the witness Ed. James to answer, the question: 'Did Mr. Pettus say, down there at the track, that he thought that it was a dog or a chicken until he got too close? Answer. Yes, sir; he did,'—upon the ground that the declaration was not a part of the res gestæ and was irrelevant to the issue." When Pettus was on the stand he was asked if he did not say to Mason, the father of the child, when the train backed to the place where the collision took place, at the time Mason climbed up in the cab, that he thought it was a dog or a chicken on the track, and that he did not have time to stop then. He answered, "No." The foundation was properly laid for contradicting the witness, and the testimony was at least admissible for that purpose.

Subdivisions "e," "f," and "g," are as follows: "(e) The presiding judge erred in overruling defendant's objection to, and allowing the witness Hampton Mason to answer, the question: 'Did you hear the fireman say to the engineer, "If you had paid attention to me when I told you that there was something on the track, maybe this thing would not have happened"? Yes, sir,'—for the same reason as in 'd,' supra. (f) The presiding judge erred in overruling defendant's objection to, and allowing the witness Robert Mason to answer, the question: 'And did he [engineer] say, "I thought it was a dog or a chicken until I got up close to it"? Yes, sir,'—for the same reason as in 'd,' supra. (g) The presiding judge erred in overruling defendant's objection to, and allowing the witness Ida Mason to answer, the question, 'Did you hear the engineer say to your husband that he thought that the child was a dog or a chicken until he got too close to it'? for the same reason as in 'd,' supra." They are disposed of by what was said in considering subdivision "d."

The second exception is as follows: "The presiding judge erred in overruling defendant's objection for a nonsuit: (a) There was an entire failure of proof of negligence on the part of the defendant. (b) The evidence shows that the child was upon the track at a point where it had no legal right to be, and where the defendant is not presumed to have supposed that it would be. It was incumbent upon plaintiff to offer testimony tending to show that the child was discovered by defendant's agents in time to avoid striking it, and that they negligently failed, after such discovery, to avoid the disaster. There is a total failure of the testimony upon both of these points. (c) It was error to hold that a child could not be a trespasser on a railroad track. (d) It was error to hold that the child was not wrongfully on the track. (e) It was error to apply the rule in Danner's Case to the facts of the case at bar. (f) It was error to hold that the burden of proof was upon the defendant to show that the accident was unavoidable; that it could not be helped. (g) There was no proof of damages." The defendant made a motion for a nonsuit on two grounds: "(1) Because there was no negligence on the part of the railroad company; and (2) that there was no proof of damages resulting to the plaintiff in this case from the death of the child." The presiding judge, in overruling the motion for nonsuit, stated somewhat at length the reason that induced him to refuse the motion. The only questions, however, that are properly before this court for consideration, are whether there was error in refusing the motion for nonsuit on the grounds that there was an entire failure of testimony showing negligence, and that there was no proof of damages resulting to the plaintiff from the death of the child. Without stating the different circumstances tending to show negligence, this court is satisfied that there was evidence tending to prove that fact. We will next consider the second ground of the motion for a nonsuit. Section 2316, Rev. St., provides that "the jury may give such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom, and for whose benefit, such action shall be brought." In the case of Petrie v. Railroad Co., 29 S. C. 303, 7 S. E. 515, cited with approval in Strother v. Railroad Co., 47 S. C. 375, 25 S. E. 272, the court says: "Again, it will be noticed that our statute, unlike many others of a similar character, does not speak of a pecuniary loss or injury, which might possibly tend to show that the injury for which damages are allowed was confined to the deprivation of some legal claim, susceptible of measurement by a pecuniary standard; but its language is much broader, and gives to the jury the right to award such damages as they may think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death." The statute and the cases construing it show that the second ground of the motion for nonsuit was properly overruled. We have not considered whether the circuit judge erred in his interpretation of the rule in Danner's Case, as his remarks in reference thereto were made in refusing the motion for a nonsuit. We are not, however, to be tood as approving his construction

(c) The presiding judge n refusing defendant's third request rge, which was as follows: 'The law s upon a railroad company no duty passers upon its track, except the duty rcising reasonable care not to inflict upon them after they are discovered,' in holding: 'A child cannot become asser. A child can do no wrong. It appreciation of right or wrong, and re can do no wrong;' it being submit- at said request embodied a correct le of law, applicable alike to adults ildren. Every animate object upon ack must occupy the relation either passer or of one lawfully there. (d) residing judge erred in refusing de- t's fifth request to charge, which was ows: 'A railroad company owes no o trespassers, to be on a lookout for at a point where they have no legal o be, and where the company has no that they will probably be.' It is sub- that this request embodied a correct le of law applicable to the case. (e) residing judge erred in refusing de- t's sixth request to charge, which s follows: 'The above rules apply equally to adults and children of very tender age. Up to the point of discovery of the trespasser by the employés of the company, the duty of railroads to adults and children of tender years is exactly the same.' It is submitted that the request embodied a correct principle of law, applicable to the case. (f) The presiding judge erred in modifying the defendant's seventh request to charge by adding the following: 'That is true, unless they had been negligent in not discovering the child.' It is submitted that the defendant was entitled to the charge unqualified; the rule being that, up to the point of discovery, the defendant owed the child trespassing on its track no duty, and consequently could not be guilty of negligence in not discovering it. The seventh request is as follows: 'Seventh. After discovery of a child by the employés of the company, the duty of the company to children incapable of realizing their danger is higher than that due to adults. The employés may assume that an adult will heed the signals of danger and get off the track. An infant, however, cannot be assumed to possess this capacity, and the employés, upon discovering it, must use all reasonable efforts to stop the train. This duty, however, does not arise until the perilous position of the child has actually been discovered by the employés.' (g) The presiding judge erred in modifying the defendant's ninth request to charge by adding the following: 'That I charge you, unless they were negligent in not seeing the child.' It is submitted that the defendant was entitled to the charge unqualified; the rule being as stated in 'f,' supra. The ninth request is as follows: 'Ninth. If the jury believe from the evidence that the employés of the company made every reasonable effort to avoid striking the child after discovering it upon the track, the company is not liable, and their verdict should be for the defendant.'" The exception of these subdivisions raises two questions, to wit: (1) Was there error on the part of the presiding judge in charging the jury that the infant, by reason of its tender years, could not be a trespasser? (2) Was there error in refusing to charge the jury that the law does not impose upon a railroad company any duty to trespassers upon its track, except the duty of exercising reasonable care not to inflict injury upon them after they are discovered? We will first consider whether the presiding judge erred in charging that the infant, by reason of its tender years, could not be a trespasser. While, in strictness of law, an infant may be a trespasser when it goes upon the track of a railroad company without its permission or without lawful authority, there are, nevertheless, well-defined distinctions between an adult and an infant trespasser. An infant 16 months of age does not know right from wrong, and therefore when it goes upon a railroad track it cannot be said that it intended to commit such an act as in an adult would make him a trespasser or wrongdoer. It cannot be guilty of contributory negligence. It is not answerable to the criminal law, and is not liable in damages when an adult would be under similar circumstances. When all the remarks of the presiding judge are considered together, it will be seen that he drew the attention of the jury to this distinction, and, although he was technically in error in saying that an infant could not be a trespasser, the jury, after his explanation, could not have been misled. We will next consider whether there was error in refusing to charge that the law does not impose upon a railroad company any duty to trespassers upon its track, except the duty of exercising reasonable care not to inflict injury upon them after they are discovered. The ruling of the presiding judge must be considered with reference to the fact that the infant was of very tender years, to wit, only 16 months of age. The question whether a railroad company owes any duty to an infant trespassing upon its track, until it discovers the infant, has given rise to much discussion, and the authorities upon this subject are in irreconcilable conflict. Even conceding that a railroad company is not bound, as a general proposition, to look out for trespassers upon its track, it nevertheless is bound to exercise ordinary care in running its trains. The law imposes upon it the duty of keeping a reasonable lookout for obstructions on its track. The safety of its passengers and the rights of the public generally demand the enforcement of this rule. It is a general rule of law that a railroad company is liable in damages for an injury inflicted by it, when its negligence was the direct and proximate cause of the injury. If the direct and proximate cause of the infant's death was negligence of the defendant in failing to keep a reasonable lookout, and to discover the child in time to have prevented the injury, it is as much liable in damages as if the proximate cause of the injury had been its negligence after discovering the child upon its track. Bottoms v. Railroad Co. (N. C.) 19 S. E. 730, 25 L. R. A. 784; Gunn v. Railroad Co. (W. Va.) 26 S. E. 546, 36 L. R. A. 575; Wood, R. R. pp. 1275–1280.

Subdivision "h" is as follows: "(h) The presiding judge erred in not charging defendant's eleventh request to charge, which was as follows: 'If the jury believe from the evidence that an employé of the company has made a statement or declaration after the accident, and not a part of the res gestæ, inconsistent with his testimony in this case, they may consider such inconsistency as tending to discredit his testimony, but not as independent evidence of the company's negligence;' it being submitted that such request embodied a correct principle of law, applicable to the case." The plaintiff, in opening his case, offered in evidence the said declarations; but they were held to be inadmissible, on the ground that they did not form part of the res gestæ. The employés, when examined in behalf of the defendant, were cross-examined by the plaintiff in regard to the said declarations, and they denied making them. The plaintiff, in reply, then offered the witnesses originally produced to prove the declarations. The record shows that the following took place: "Mr. Cothran objects on the ground that this question is irrelevant, and that counsel proposes to contradict the witness upon an irrelevant point, and submits that it can't come in unless it is part of the res gestæ, and within the proper scope of his agency. The Court: The testimony must be relevant. I think it is competent. Mr. Cothran excepts. By Mr. Dean: Did Mr. Pettus say that you went back there to see whether the track was straight or curved? Mr. Cothran: I ask that your honor will instruct the jury, upon the delivery of that testimony, that they can consider that testimony only for the purpose of discrediting the witness, if they believe this evidence. If they believe the statement to be true, and that the engineer is mistaken, then they can consider this testimony only to the extent of discrediting the engineer, and not for the purpose of introducing it as independent evidence. The Court: Yes, gentlemen of the jury, Mr. Cothran has stated the ground upon which the testimony is to be considered, clearly, to you, and it is correct." The request was not read to the jury, and there was no necessity to charge the proposition therein stated, as the jury had already been instructed upon the subject.

Subdivision "i" is as follows: "(i) The charge of the presiding judge was inconsistent, contradictory, and confusing to the jury. For instance, he charged the fourth and eighth requests, which we submit were good law, and qualified the seventh and ninth requests by holding that the defendant may have been guilty of negligence in not discovering the child." When the charge of the presiding judge is considered in its entirety, it will be seen at a glance that the objections urged by the appellant are unfounded. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BRAMLETT v. CITY OF LAURENS.

ALTERING SIDEWALK—DAMAGES—LIABILITY OF CITY.

A city charter conferring on the mayor and aldermen power, with the consent of the adjacent landowners, to "close or change" all streets, as they may deem conducive to the public convenience, and to sell the freehold of any street they may "close," and to "lay" out, adopt, open, and keep in repair all such "new" ways as they may deem necessary, with a proviso that they first obtain the consent of the landowners through whose land the same may run, and, if their consent cannot be obtained, then the street may be "opened" in the same way as provided for opening of public roads by county commissioners, does not make the city liable for damages to an abutting owner for raising the sidewalk in front of his property without his consent.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by A. W. Bramlett against the city of Laurens. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ball, Simkins & Ball, for appellant. F. P. McGowan and W. R. Richey, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. As the appeal herein is from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, it will be necessary to set it out. It is as follows: "The plaintiff complains, and alleges: (1) That the plaintiff, at and before the times hereinafter mentioned, was the owner of a lot on Harper street, and the dwellings and buildings thereon, in the city of Laurens. (2) That the city of Laurens is a municipal corporation, organized under the laws of the state of South Carolina, with power to sue and be sued. (3) That formerly for more than twenty years, and for time immemorial, a sidewalk, suitable and convenient for pedestrians, existed and was maintained on the eastern side of the said street, of which street it was a part, and that the lot of said defendant was immediately adjacent to, and abutted upon, said sidewalk, and that access to the said sidewalk from the said lot was easy and unobstructed, as well as access across it by horses and vehicles, to that part of the street traveled by horses and vehicles. (4) That the plaintiff was and is entitled to easy and unobstructed access, both to the sidewalk of the said street and to that part used for travel by horses and vehicles. (5) That during the year 1898 the defendant, through its officers and servants, changed and altered the said street without the consent of the plaintiff, and against his will, destroying the said sidewalk, and building a new sidewalk in another part of the street, building the said new sidewalk a considerable height above the level of the old sidewalk, and above the level of the plaintiff's lot; thus rendering the new sidewalk difficult and inconvenient of access, and rendering access from the said lot to that part of the street used by horses and vehicles impracticable. (6) That the said alterations and changes in the said street were made by the defendant negligently, and without reasonable care and skill, to the injury of the plaintiff, and in wanton disregard of the right of the plaintiff. (7) That the said changes and alterations in the said street greatly injured and impaired the appearance of the said lot, thereby diminishing its value. (8) That the defendant elevated, and thereby altered, the grade of that part of the street used for horse and vehicle travel, without the consent of the plaintiff, and against his will, rendering impracticable his access thereto. (9) That by the changes and alterations in the said street by the defendant, and by the negligent manner in which they were made, without reasonable care and skill, the defendant has been damaged five hundred dollars."

The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in the following particulars: "(1) In that the action is predicated upon a claim for consequential damages, alleged to have been caused by the grading of the public street and sidewalk within the limits of said street, and that no right of action exists at law for said alleged damage, in the absence of any statute to that effect, and there is no statute giving such a right of action in this state. (2) Because the charter does not give any right of action for damages which any abutting landowner may sustain in consequence of work or repairs done upon public streets by the municipal authorities. (3) Because no right of action is given against the city of Laurens by any act of the legislature for any damage sustained away from and off the street. (4) Because the complaint does not state the facts connected with the repairs referred to in the complaint, from which any negligence occurred in the raising the grade of the street or sidewalk." The circuit judge sustained the demurrer on the aforesaid grounds, and the appeal herein brings in review the correctness of his ruling.

If the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, it did not arise ex contractu, but ex delicto. A municipal corporation cannot be sued for a tort unless it is made liable by statute, and, when this is the case, the statute must provide the remedy; otherwise, the action cannot be maintained. Black v. City of Columbia, 19 S. C. 412; Young v. City Council of Charleston, 20 S. C. 118; Garraux v. City Council of Greenville, 53 S. C. 575, 31 S. E. 597; Fuller v. Edings, 11 Rich. Law, 245; McLauchlin v. Railroad Co., 5 Rich. Law, 597.

Section 12, p. 925, Act 1890, chartering the city of Laurens, contains the following provisions: "The mayor and aldermen shall have full and exclusive control over all streets, roads, and ways in the said city, and it shall be their duty to keep them open and in good repair. They shall have power, with the consent of the adjacent landowner, to close or change all such roads, streets, or ways within the said city as they may deem conducive to the public convenience, and may sell the freehold of any such street, road, or way as they may close, either at public or private sale, as they may deem best. And they shall have power to lay out, adopt, open, and keep in repair such new ways, roads, or streets, as they may deem necessary for the improvement and convenience of the said city: provided, that they first obtain the consent of the landowners through whose land the same shall run; or, if their consent cannot be obtained, that the said street or way be opened in the same way as provided by law for the opening of public roads by county commissioners. * * * And said city council shall have all the powers over the streets, roads, or ways therein which are now given, or may hereafter be given, to county commissioners over the roads in the several counties, subject, nevertheless, to the limitation herein prescribed."

It will be observed that the foregoing confers upon the mayor and aldermen (1) power, with the consent of the adjacent landowners, to "close or change" all such streets as they may deem conducive to the public convenience, and to sell the freehold of any street they may "close"; and (2) it confers upon the mayor and aldermen power to "lay out, adopt, open, and keep in repair" all such "new" ways as they may deem necessary. There is a proviso which requires that they first obtain the consent of the landowners through whose land the same may run, and, if their consent cannot be obtained, then the said street may be "opened" in the same way as provided by law for the opening of public roads by county commissioners.

The foregoing act is quite different from that incorporating Gaffney City. The act incorporating Gaffney City (St. at Large 1894, p. 1002) confers upon the city council power to "open" new streets in said town, and to "close up, widen, or otherwise alter" those in use. That act further provides that, if the owners through whose premises such streets run refuse their consent to the action of the city council in "opening, closing up, widening or altering" such streets, the said city council shall have the right to condemn such land according to the provisions of the law of force for condemning land for public use. In construing said act in Wilkins v. Town Council of Gaffney City, 53 S. C. 199, 32 S. E. 299, this court says: "The intention of the act was to confer upon the abutting landowners the right to compensation for damage to their property in consequence of opening, closing up, widening, or altering the streets. The right to condemn according to the provisions of the law imposes the corresponding duty to render compensation for the damages sustained. The provisions of the law for condemning land for public use show that compensation must be made to the landowners before the highway is established. Rev. St. § 1179. It would be an alteration and a partial closing of the street for the railway company to lay its track through it."—citing Paris Mountain Water Co. v. City Council of Greenville, 53 S. C. 82, 30 S. E. 699; Garraux v. City Council of Greenville, 53 S. C. 575, 31 S. E. 597. Under the statute incorporating the city of Laurens, compensation is allowed the landowner when the new street is "opened," while in the statute chartering Gaffney City compensation is allowed, not only for "opening," but for "closing up, widening, or altering," the streets. As the case herein is not for damages for "opening" the streets, plaintiff is not entitled to compensation. While it is true the statute does not make the municipality liable for damages, it by no means follows that the individuals committing the alleged wrongful act are exempt from liability. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

TOWN OF WESTON v. RALSTON.

CANCELLATION OF DEED—CLOUD ON TITLE—PUBLIC EASEMENT.

1. The supreme court of appeals having determined that a certain strip of land, adjacent to a property owner's lot, was part of a public highway, and subject to the public easement therein, and directed a mandatory injunction to place the public in possession of such easement to be awarded by the circuit court, and such court refusing to award the same, and such property owner, in total disregard and in contempt of such adjudication, proceeding to purchase other pretended titles to such strip of land, for the purpose of beclouding the public easement therein and further litigating the same, a court of equity will cancel such deeds in so far as they operate as a cloud upon the public easement, and will perpetually enjoin the further litigation of the public's right, as an effort to maintain and continue in force a public nuisance in derogation of the sovereignty of the people of the state.

2. When a public easement has once been lawfully established over land for a public highway, either by dedication to the use of the general public by individuals, and acceptance by the proper authorities, or by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, such easement is good against any and all titles.

Appeal from circuit court, Lewis county; W. G. Bennett, Judge.

Bill by the town of Weston against Er. Ralston. From an order dissolving an injunction restraining defendant from further litigating the title to certain real estate, complainant appeals. Reversed.

Edward A. Brannon, for appellant. W. W. Brannon, for appellee.

McWHORTER, P. The town of Weston, by its mayor and common council, undertook, by means of its authority, to remove from Water street (one of the public streets of said town) certain obstructions maintained thereon by Er. Ralston, who enjoined in the circuit court the action of said town authorities, upon the hearing of which the circuit court perpetuated the injunction, when the defendant appealed to the supreme court, and upon the case there being heard the decree of the circuit court was reversed, the court finding that plaintiff was maintaining a public nuisance, subject to abatement either by the municipal authorities, under their statutory powers, or by an appeal to a court of equity; and said cause was "remanded to the circuit court, with direction that plaintiff's injunction be dissolved, and a mandatory injunction be awarded the defendant, at the plaintiff's costs, directing the plaintiff to abate the nuisance maintained by him thereon, and that the strip of ground in controversy be restored to Water street, and made subject to the public easement therein." The case is reported in 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326. The circuit court not only failed and refused to award the mandatory injunction directing the plaintiff to abate the nuisance maintained by him on said street, as required by said decree, but, on the other hand, when the municipal authorities undertook to abate the nuisance the said circuit court entertained an action by said plaintiff of trespass on the case for damages against said town for removing the obstructions from said street, and also another action by him against said town of unlawful entry and detainer for the possession of said strip of ground upon which plaintiff had maintained the said nuisance, and which strip was by the decree of the supreme court ascertained to be a part of the said Water street; said plaintiff having, after the decree of the supreme court aforesaid, obtained two deeds conveying said strip of ground,—one from W. B. McGary, special commissioner in the case of George C. Cole, trustee of James P. Cole, and others, dated May 15, 1899, and the other from James P. Cole, dated May 13, 1899,—and under which plaintiff claimed that he had a right and title to said strip of land, and to the possession thereof, notwithstanding said decision adverse to his rights as they existed when the case was heard, and also adverse to any and every title and claim of any and every person whomsoever. The town of Weston filed its bill in equity in the said circuit court, praying that said Ralston be perpetually enjoined from prosecuting said actions of trespass on the case and unlawful entry and detainer, and compelled to dismiss the same, and that a decree be entered setting aside the deeds from W. B. McGary, special commissioner, and James P. Cole, to said Er. Ralston, and declaring said deeds null and void as against the rights of the town to the strip thereby conveyed as a part of its said Water street, and for general relief. The defendant, Ralston, answered the said bill; setting up title to said strip of ground, and claiming that he was not holding under the Flesher title, so as to estop him from his present claim, as alleged in the bill, but that since the decision of the supreme court he had acquired what he was advised was a perfect and indefeasible title to said strip of land; averring that in July, 1889, the town of Weston instituted a suit in equity against James P. Cole, M. S. Holt, and others, one of the chief objects of which was to cancel and annul a deed dated April 10, 1889, from M. S. Holt to James P. Cole, whereby said Holt conveyed to Cole a tract of land, running as described, so as to include the strip of ground, and, indeed, all of Water street from First street to Fourth street. Said bill sought to enjoin the building of a large livery stable by the said Cole on what the plaintiff, the town of Weston, contended was ground which had been dedicated to the use of the town for a street; claiming that "all the land known and used as Water street, and embraced by said deeds, was * * * included in a grant from the commonwealth of Virginia to —— Flesher, and that said grant was made while an act passed by the general assembly of the commonwealth of Virginia was in full force and effect, which act provides that all unappropriated lands on the bay of the Chesapeake, on the sea shore, or on the shores of any river or creek, and the bed of any river or creek in the commonwealth, which remained ungranted by the former government, and which has been used as a common to all the good people thereof, shall be, and the same are hereby, excepted out of this act, and no grant issued by the register of the land office for the same either in consequence of any survey already made, or which may hereafter be made, shall be valid or effectual in law, to pass any estate or interest therein." And plaintiff averred that the greater portion of the land conveyed by the deeds is the shore of the West Fork river; that it remained ungranted by the former grant, and that shore was used as a common to all the good people of the commonwealth; and that said shores were by the provisions of the said act excepted and excluded from the said grant to the said Flesher, and were passed thereby to him or any other person. And plaintiff therefore claimed that by virtue of the dedication by Flesher of the street on the bank, and the exception and exclusion of the shore by said act, all the land lying between the lots which extended towards the river from their front on Main street, 150 feet, and the river, constituted Water street, and had been for more than 40 years known, treated, held, used, and occupied as Water street; that said James P. Cole had commenced to deposit material, such as stone and lumber, on Water street, along between lot No. 12 (which ran from Main street back towards the river 150 feet) and the river, as represented by the plat of the town just above the bridge, and near Second street and the Staunton and Parkersburg turnpike; and that he had commenced to dig and excavate for the foundation of a large building, to be used as a livery stable, etc. James P. Cole answered the bill, denying the most of the material allegations of the bill, and that he had deposited material and excavated on Water street, and says: "Moreover, the defendant, in excavating as aforesaid and depositing material, left a space between the river and a point 150 feet from Main street, of 40 feet, to allow the said town of Weston, should it see proper to do so, to open, construct, and keep in repair a street as provided in the deed from Woffindin and McBride to O. H. P. Washburn, and is still willing to allow such street to be maintained." And after denying that his livery stable, as he proposed to build and maintain it, would be a nuisance, he says "that it is not the habit of defendant to allow manure or other filth to accumulate about his stable, but as fast as it is accumulated it will be conveyed to the extreme end of said stable, 150 feet from Second street, and nearly 200 feet from Main street, on the river bank, when it will be hauled away as fast as a wagon load accumulates. * * * This defendant alleges that the said stable will be so constructed as to keep his horses in the basement thereof, and, by its close proximity to the river, all surplus filth, if there be any, can easily be drained off. There is to be a rock wall on the upper side of said basement, next to the proposed Water street, and a water-tight floor over the same," etc. Upon the hearing the injunction was dissolved, the bill dismissed, and the building was erected on the west line of Water street, 40 feet from the back line of the lots fronting on Main street. A copy of Cole's said answer was filed with plaintiff's bill in the case at bar. When the cause of Ralston v. Town of Weston was reversed by this court, the plaintiff, Ralston, procured a stay of execution of the decree on the 5th of May, 1899, for the period of 90 days, for the alleged purpose of taking an appeal therefrom to the supreme court of the United States; but, instead of executing the bond required, and taking the proper steps to obtain his appeal, he immediately set to work to place himself in position, if possible, to avoid the effect and force of the decree against him, and to reopen and relitigate the questions that had been settled by the decision of the court of appeals. On the 13th day of May, 1899, eight days after Ralston procured a stay of 90 days of said decree, he took from James P. Cole a deed, with special warranty, for the strip of ground which by the said decision was decreed to be a part of Water street, which Ralston had in actual possession himself for many years, and which Cole never claimed, and of which he never had possession; and in the cause of the town of Weston against him, 10 years before, he had admitted the existence of Water street, 40 feet wide, and that such part of it as he might have claimed as being covered by the deed from M. S. Holt to himself, of April 10, 1889, belonged to, and was a part of, the public street. And, further, under a decree entered in the cause pending in the circuit court of Lewis county of George C. Cole, trustee of James P. Cole, and others, on the 11th day of May, 1889, appointing W. B. McGary a special commissioner to make sale of the several lots, tracts, and parcels of land, or any of them, belonging to said James P. Cole in the town of Weston, said Ralston purchased from said Commissioner McGary the said same strip of ground, which sale was reported to said circuit court by said commissioner on the said 13th day of May, 1899, and confirmed by said court on the same day, and said W. B. McGary was appointed a special commissioner to execute a deed to said Ralston for said strip of ground; and by deed dated May 15, 1899, said Special Commissioner McGary conveyed the same to said Ralston, both of which deeds were admitted to record the day on which they were executed; thus manifesting a determination to relitigate the questions already so decided in the courts of the state, instead of taking the same to the supreme court of the United States, as he had proposed. And the circuit court seems to have been willing to reopen the matters settled by the first decision of the court of appeals, as upon the hearing of the case the court dissolved the injunction, from which decree dissolving the injunction the plaintiff, the town of Weston, appealed to this court; assigning as error the dissolving of the injunction.

Counsel for the parties have filed very elaborate and well-prepared briefs, which would reflect credit upon any counsel, as far as the research and industry necessary to their preparation are concerned. They have thoroughly discussed the questions already settled, and forever settled, whether right or wrong, in the case of Ralston v. Town of Weston; and the only question to be determined in this case is whether, after it has been finally determined that the title under which Ralston sought to hold the property, as against the town's easement therein for the purposes of a street, was insufficient as against the town, while it had been for half a century held by him and his vendor in actual adverse possession as against all the world beside, he can, by procuring paper titles, which never pretended to claim the particular strip of ground in controversy, and under which possession of said strip was never held for a single hour, successfully contest the rights of the town. The decision in the case of Ralston v. Town of Weston forever settled the question that the town has an easement over the strip of land inclosed by Ralston, and which was in said cause in controversy, which, under the rulings in said case, is good against any and all titles, and is binding on the world. I deem it wholly unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the many questions argued in the briefs. It seems to me that a statement of the case alone is sufficient, the matters at issue having been fully and finally disposed of in the said case of Ralston v. Town of Weston. The circuit court should have perpetuated the injunction against said Ralston further litigating the title of the town of Weston to the public easement over the strip of land in controversy, and from prosecuting his said actions of trespass on the case and unlawful entry and detainer set out in plaintiff's bill, and annulled and set aside the deeds mentioned, from James P. Cole and from W. B. McGary, special commissioner, to Er. Ralston, in so far as they becloud the title or affect the public easement over said strip of land. The decree of the circuit court is set aside, reversed, and annulled, and, this court proceeding to render such decree as the circuit court should have rendered, it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the injunction granted in this cause on the 12th day of June, 1899, by the Honorable G. W. Farr, judge of the Fourth judicial circuit of West Virginia, be, and the same is hereby, made perpetual; that the actions of trespass on the case and of unlawful entry and detainer brought by Er. Ralston against the town of Weston, as set out in the bill, be dismissed; and that said deeds from James P. Cole to Er. Ralston, dated May 13, 1899, and from W. B. McGary, special commissioner for Er. Ralston, dated May 15, 1899, conveying the strip of land in controversy, be, and they are hereby, set aside and annulled in so far as they becloud the public easement over said strip of land, and said Er. Ralston is perpetually enjoined from further litigating the public right to said easement, as an effort to maintain and continue in force a public nuisance, in derogation of the sovereignty of the people of the state.

BRANNON, J. I fully concur in the foregoing opinion. We are asked to reconsider and overrule the decision of this court in Ralston v. Town of Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326; holding that the statute of limitations, under adverse possession, does not bar the right of a town or city to its streets. I have carefully examined this subject, and the opinion has constantly grown upon me that that decision is only the expression of sound law,—law that is held all over the United States, with the exception of 4 or 5 states. At least 30 states have considered this question, and announced the same law as that stated in Ralston v. Town of Weston. I consider the exposition of the law given in the opinion by Judge Dent as a correct, able, and unanswerable one. He bases it upon the sovereign right of the people to retain, against private claim without title, the use of their streets and roads for public and necessary easement. There can be no more vital principle than the preservation of the highways of the people for their use, against those who, without color of title, would set up a private claim by mere possession, ripening into title only from sheer negligence of the public officers of the city or town. It is of the highest public interest to preserve such public right for the many over the claim of the few. Against this public interest there is no statute of limitation. Sovereignty is not barred by limitation, and ought not to be. You must show a statute infallibly applying to it. And in addition to this sovereign right, to which no statute applies in terms, there is the consideration that the obstruction of a street or other highway is a public nuisance, which no length of time will ripen into a right, because that would be to make a public offense give good title against the public right. Statutes of limitation, operative upon the private right of individuals, are wise, to prevent private strife and litigation; and they largely proceed on the theory that the private individual who has the better right has been sleeping, and allowed his adversary, by possession, to take away his right. But that cannot be said of cities and towns,—there being no private right, no private vigilance, to watch and protect the public weal,—and it cannot be said that the public right has been abandoned. No one but the officers can act, and their negligence should not destroy the public right, and cannot justify the claim that a party has slept upon his rights, as in the case of a private individual. The books all tell us that this is the very reason why time does not run against the king or commonwealth. In this state the statute makes limitation run against the state, but that does not apply to the public interests in its highways; and, moreover, a town is not the state, and that statute does not apply the bar of limitation to the public right held in trust by the town for the people. I repeat that the occupation of a street or other highway by an individual is a public nuisance, and no time gives right to continue a public nuisance. The supreme court of the United States, in Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659, 24 L. Ed. 1036, only expresses what all the books have long said, and continue to say, in defense of the public interest, in speaking of a public nuisance, that: "In such cases prescription, whatever the length of time, has no application. Every day's continuance is a new offense." How, then, can a public nuisance ripen into vested title against public weal, the public right,—against sovereignty itself?

A case decided April 23, 1900, by the supreme court of South Carolina (Chafee v. City of Aiken, 35 S. E. 800), is very apt in this particular case, and surely expresses the law almost universally accepted in America. It holds: "No rights against a municipality, in a street dedicated to it, can be acquired by adverse possession. Mere nonuser of a street by a municipality will not amount to such an abandonment as will destroy its right to open the same." It is suitable to this case, in the fact that Ralston is a privy in estate with Flesher, who dedicated this street to the town, and Ralston holds by title derived from him. Flesher could not claim against his dedication by adverse possession. Neither can one holding title under him, as does Ralston. "No length of nonuser bars a right granted by deed." Washb. Easem. § 6, p. 550. The very deed under which Ralston claims derivatively from Flesher dedicates this street to the town, and limits the rights of its grantee by it. This is conclusive as to the title held by Ralston under Flesher. See the number of states that hold that time will not give title to a public street by adverse possession, cited in Judge Dent's opinion in Ralston v. Town of Weston. Thus, there are two reasons, distinct reasons, which I have just mentioned, that deny that adverse possession will destroy the public right in a street or other highway. One is that the statute does not run against sovereignty. The other is that such possession is a public nuisance, a public offense, and, no matter how long it continues, it does not mature into right. "Once a highway, always a highway," is found in all the books,—those musty with age, and those that are new. Instead of this doctrine changing in favor of the individual against the public as time goes on, just the reverse is the case; for a critical examination will attest that states which once held that time would bar this public right have flatly overruled their own decisions, and now hold that time will not bar this public right. It is stated in the opinion in City of Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 36, that the courts of New York, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Mississippi, Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa hold that time will bar the public right in streets; but if they ever so held, their recent decisions have overruled former ones cited in City of Wheeling v. Campbell, supra, as shown by the following cases: Driggs v. Phillips, 103 N. Y. 77, 8 N. E. 514; Ulman v. Avenue Co., 83 Md. 130, 34 Atl. 366; Taylor v. Com., 29 Grat. 780; Yates v. Town of Warrenton, 84 Va. 337, 4 S. E. 818; Depriest v. Jones (Va.) 21 S. E. 478; Buntin v. City of Danville, 93 Va. 200, 24 S. E. 830; Crocker v. Collins, 37 S. C. 327, 15 S. E. 951; Chafee v. City of Aiken (S. C.; 1900) 35 S. E. 800; City of Vicksburg v. Marshall, 59 Miss. 563; Witherspoon v. City of Meridian, 69 Miss. 288, 13 South. 843; Heddleston v. Hendricks (1895) 52 Ohio St. 460, 40 N. E. 408; City of Quincy v. Jones, 76 Ill. 231; Board of Logan Co. Sup'rs v. City of Lincoln, 81 Ill. 156; City of Chicago v. Middlebrooke, 143 Ill. 265, 32 N. E. 457; City of Sullivan v. Tichenor, 179 Ill. 97, 53 N. E. 561; Rae v. Miller, 99 Iowa, 650, 68 N. W. 899. Some of the states did hold otherwise, but they have reversed their former holding in the cases cited. The state of New Hampshire once held against the public right, but has changed its former ruling. The court, in State v. Franklin Falls Co., 49 N. H. 256, overruled Webber v. Chapman, 42 N. H. 326; the judge who wrote the former opinion requesting the judge who prepared the later opinion to announce his change of opinion. Heddleston v. Hendricks, 52 Ohio St. 460, 465, 40 N. E. 408. It seems that Nebraska has changed its former ruling, by the late case of Krueger v. Jenkins (Neb.; 1900) 81 N. W. 844, holding that title to a part of a county road cannot be acquired by adverse possession. The above cases show that Virginia has changed, if she ever held contra; but, though so cited, she never did so.

This court has received, to some extent, criticism for its action in Ralston v. Town of Weston, overruling City of Wheeling v. Campbell; but it would seem, from cases just cited from other states, that courts considered worthy of authority have chosen to assume the responsibility of overruling their former decisions because, in their opinion, on re-examination of the subject, they deemed it proper that unsound law, hurtful for all future time to the public weal, and law which did not spring from the legislature, but from erroneous ruling of the courts misapplying the statute of limitations, should no longer prevail, to the destruction of public right. That erroneous ruling sprung from erroneous decisions, and the same authority which announced it had equal authority to renounce it, it being a judicial decision, not a legislative act; and, when convinced that such former decisions were unsound, those courts were justified in overruling them, as their further continuance would be highly detrimental to the public interest. So this court thought when deciding the case of Ralston v. Town of Weston, and it is clear that it only did the same thing upon this subject-matter which has been done upon that same matter by courts of eminent authority. We still think that decision is right, and we do not see our way to retract it. If the former rule had continued, private individuals would have, year after year, invaded the highways of the people, and held them forever from their use. The public would have to condemn and purchase, time after time, what justly belonged to it. Judge McWhorter well says in Lovings v. Railway Co. (W. Va.) 35 S. E. 962, 965: "It is better to be right, than to be consistent with the errors of a hundred years." No legal principle is ever settled until it is settled right. The true rule is laid down in 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) 36: "No prior decision is to be reversed without good and sufficient cause; yet the rule is not in any sense ironclad, and the future and permanent good to the public is to be considered, rather than any particular case or interest. Even if the decision affects real-estate interests and titles, there may be cases where it is plainly the duty of the court to interfere and overrule a bad decision. Precedent should not have an overwhelming or despotic influence in shaping legal decisions. No elementary or well-settled principle of law can be violated by any decision for any length of time. The benefit to the public in the future is of greater moment than any incorrect decision in the past. Where vital and important public and private rights are concerned, and the decisions regarding them are to have a direct and permanent influence in all future time, it becomes the duty as well as the right of the court to consider them carefully, and to allow no previous error to continue, if it can be corrected. The reason that the rule of stare decisis was promulgated was on the ground of public policy, and it would be an egregious mistake to allow more harm than good to accrue from it. Much, not only of legislation, but of judicial decision, is based upon the broad ground of public policy, and this latter must not be lost sight of." The reason given in City of Wheeling v. Campbell, supra, is that a statute in this state applies limitation to the state. I have already shown that this statute does not apply to the sovereign rights of the people in their public highways; but, anyway, in states where like statutes exist applying limitations to the state, yet hold, in their decisions, that time does not bar the public right to the streets and other highways, namely, Alabama, New York, Massachusetts, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

There is another reason why the town's right is not barred. Ralston occupied only 13½ feet of the 40-foot street, the balance being always open and used as a street. Now, in some of those states which still hold, and in some which once held, that the statute of limitations bars the public right where the whole street is adversely occupied, yet they held that, where the occupation extended over only a part of the street, the statute did not apply in bar of the public right. This distinction is quite reasonable. Why? Because, when a man entirely closes up a street, there can be no more decided notice to the world of his adverse claim; but where he obstructs it only partially his act is equivocal, and does not so signally notify the world of his claim, and no one notices it as he would if the obstruction was total. He may not really intend finally to claim it. His act does not put the town or city authorities and the public on their guard. Generally, in the case of streets like Water street, in Weston, at one time very little used, no one thinks of opposing a partial obstruction, and takes no steps against it. In such case the states referred to have decided that the town or city may let its rights lie dormant until there is public need for the whole width of the street, and that when that time comes the town or city may open the whole width. Such is the case in Water street, in Weston. Such was the holding in Krueger v. Jenkins (Neb.; 1900) 81 N. W. 844; Fox v. Hart, 11 Ohio, 414; Lane v. Kennedy, 13 Ohio St. 42; McClelland v. Miller, 28 Ohio St. 488; Davies v. Huebner, 45 Iowa, 574.

There is still another reason why the right of Weston is not barred. The right of a town or the public in a street or highway is not ownership of the body of the land, but only the right to use it for passage,—an easement. The statute of limitations never applied to an easement. Jones, Easem. § 161, says: "The statutes of limitation do not directly apply to actions in which incorporeal hereditaments, such as easements, are involved, but only to actions for the recovery of land." Newell, Ej. 53, says: "Ejectment does not lie for an easement, as an incorporeal hereditament. This rule is founded upon the principle that the action lies for something tangible, so that in case of recovery the possession of the property may be delivered on a writ of possession." Consistently with this view, we find that in the late great work, 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 432, where the modes in which easements may be lost are given, limitation is not mentioned. Abandonment is mentioned as a means by which the public may lose its highway. So, Washburn on Easements does not given limitations as a means of loss of a public easement, but does give abandonment as the cause of loss of such easement. You will find the books treat abandonment as a cause of such loss, but they do not apply the statute of limitations to easements. The books do treat nonuser as working, under certain circumstances, the destruction of a public easement; but they say that such nonuser must amount to an abandonment, and mere silence, mere inaction, by municipal authorities, unattended with circumstances displaying and plainly manifesting an intentional abandonment, will not prejudice the right to the easement. Washburn on Easements, speaking of nonuser, in section 6, subsec. 1, uses this language: "Here, as in case of acts of abandonment, the nonuser must be of such a character and duration as to show an intent to abandon the easement, or it must have induced another to expend money upon the supposition of such abandonment, which is known and acquiesced in by the one who might otherwise claim it, and where to enforce the right of easement would work injustice upon an innocent party." Now, just here, note that the town council passed resolutions in 1879, and several times since, directing the opening of Water street to its full width; and Ralston was informed and notified of such resolutions, and of the continued claim of the town. He did not flatly assert a claim when so notified, but practically admitted the town's right. Where is there anything to show an abandonment by the town of its clear right to this strip? Nothing. On the contrary, the evidence shows the opposite. It shows that the town did not intend to abandon its right, and so notified Ralston. It is well established that mere nonuser will not destroy an easement, where its owner sets up a continuous claim, or protests against a use of the locus by the other party that is inconsistent with such claim to an easement. Field v. Brown, 24 Grat. 74. "Nonuser of a highway by the public for many years is prima facie evidence of abandonment, but the abandonment must be voluntary and intentional." City of Hartford v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Conn.) 22 Atl. 37; Chafee v. City of Aiken (S. C.; 1900) 35 S. E. 800. "Acts of the owner of the dominant estate, relied upon to constitute an abandonment, must be voluntary, and must be of such decisive and conclusive a character as to indicate and prove his intention to abandon the easement." 10 Am. &

Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 435. Many cases are there cited. "But nothing short of an intention so to abandon the right would operate to that effect." Washb. Easem. § 5, subsec. 1. Thus, only abandonment, not the length of time fixed by the statute of limitations, can destroy a public easement. That statute has nothing to do with the subject, but abandonment has, as it is the only way, unless it is by release or merger of estate, by which the servient estate can be released from the easement. Ralston held the estate, the soil, the land, that was burdened with this public easement. His grantor dedicated that easement, and so stated in the deed under which Ralston derivatively claims, and this land of Ralston could be relieved of this easement only by the intentional abandonment by the town. Instead of abandoning, the town still claimed. What act of the town evinces an intention to abandon? Mere silent nonuser will not work an abandonment. Board of Logan Co. Sup'rs v. City of Lincoln, 81 Ill. 156. A private individual owning an easement might much more readily lose his right by nonuser and abandonment, than a city or town. How can you show acts by a town amounting to an abandonment? It must be, in the language of the law above quoted, "acts of so decisive and conclusive a character as to prove his intention to abandon the easement." How can you prove such acts by a town? It would be a very difficult task. Mere inaction by its officers would not, should not, work such public detriment. If its acts are to be resorted to to establish abandonment, they could only be recorded acts of its council, and that attempt would be met by the inflexible rule that a town council cannot grant away the public right in a street without legislative authority. It would be an ultra vires and void act, not binding on the public. Therefore I am unable to realize how you can fix a binding act of abandonment upon a city or town, though you may do so as to an individual. Under the head of "abandonment," Taylor v. Pearce, 179 Ill. 145, 53 N. E. 622, is strong in favor of the town. "The opening of a highway its full length, and its use by the public, protect the public right to its full width, and repel any presumption of abandonment which might arise from the fact that the fence of an adjoining owner has stood within the line of the highway for over twenty years." So in Maine, Missouri, and Ohio. Heald v. Moore (Me.) 9 Atl. 734; State v. Culver, 65 Mo. 607, 27 Am. Rep. 295; Kelly Nail & Iron Co. v. Lawrence Furnace Co. (Ohio) 22 N. E. 639, 5 L. R. A. 652. See Elliott, Roads & S. 658. Vacation by authority is requisite to discontinue. No mere implied abandonment will do. The statute says how a street may be vacated. That excludes implied abandonment. Driggs v. Phillips, 103 N. Y. 77, 8 N. E. 514. I therefore repeat that, as the right of the town is an easement only, the statute of limitations does not apply. This is an important consideration in the matter; for in a state where limitation does run against the state, and it is claimed that a city or town is the same as the state, and therefore the statute runs against a town or city, yet this cannot apply to an easement of the town or city, because the statute never runs against an easement. Hence the reason given in City of Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 36, for the position that the statute will bar a city or town of a right to a street (that is, that limitation runs against the state, and therefore also against a city or town), was never good. But while this court might retract the principles settled in the case of Ralston v. Town of Weston, namely, that limitation does not bar the right of a city or town to a street, if this court were now convinced that such decision were error, yet it could not alter the actual decision of this case, for the reason that that decision is res judicata, and forever settles, between Ralston and the town of Weston, that the strip of land in controversy is a part of Water street, and still subject to the public easement.

But Ralston claims that, after said decision in Ralston v. Town of Weston, he obtained a new right to that identical strip by a conveyance from J. P. Cole. This cannot change the result, and why? (1) Ralston's long inclosure had barred Cole's right, if he had any right, and vested Cole's title in Ralston, by force of the statute of limitations; for the statute would bar the private right of Cole, but not the easement of the town, Cole being a private individual. Thus, when this court decided that said strip was not free from the easement of the town, but was still subject thereto, that Cole's title was at that date vested in Ralston by reason of limitation, and the adjudication bound all titles, no matter how many distinct ones he then had, good or bad, and settled that all titles, however derived, vested in Ralston at that date, were subject to this public easement. The conveyance from Cole passed nothing to Ralston, for such title as he had had already vested in Ralston. (2) If Cole had any title to that strip, as he had not, it was subject to the public easement; and, even if the statute could run against that easement, it would not run in favor of the Cole title, because it is not pretended that Cole ever had any possession of that strip, or set up any claim contrary thereto. Where did Cole have any possession to bar the town right, which nobody denies was once good? Ralston had an inclosure, but his right and Cole's right were distinct, and not in privity, and Ralston's possession would not inure to the benefit of the Cole title. And the same rule of law, moreover, which, under principles above stated, would prevent Ralston from using the bar of the statute, would forbid Cole's so doing, and all other persons having any claim to that ground. That was an easement over that ground against all titles, by whomsoever owned. (3) In a suit between the town of Weston and Cole in 1889, the town contested Cole's right to build a stable on the bank of the river, on the west side of Water street, if counted at only 40 feet, and on the opposite side of Water street from the strip now in controversy between Ralston and the town; the town claiming the whole space to the river. Cole, by an answer, claimed that the land between the west side of a 40-foot street and the river had never been a part of the street, and also claimed some grant from the town; but his answer distinctly conceded the existence of a street of 40 feet width, which included the 13½ feet inclosed by Ralston, and now in controversy. If Cole ever had a shadow of claim to that 13½ feet along the east side of Water street, his answer renounced all right to it, in favor of the town, and conceded that the public street included it; that is, that Water street began 150 feet from Main street, and was of the width of 40 feet, which would include the strip now in controversy. He thus, by solemn pleading in a court of record, recognized the pre-existing street over that ground, and also made a fresh dedication of it for the public use, and moreover, for years thereafter (ever since 1889) suffered the public to use the street as such, and the town to work it, and thus made it a lawful street, if it never had been such before, by suffering such user, as section 31, c. 43, of the Code says, "Every road, street or alley used and occupied as a public road, street or alley shall in all courts or places be taken and deemed to be a public road, street or alley." Upon the faith of that answer, conceding this public right, Cole had a decree allowing him to build a stable on the western side of Water street, opposite the ground in controversy. He obtained that decree upon this renunciation of all claim to the ground covered by the street, adverse to the town, and that is an estoppel upon Cole. It is res adjudicata between Cole and Weston to show the existence of that street there; and this answer of Cole, and the decree upon it, as acts of disclaimer, concession, and dedication of a street over this ground, are res judicata in favor of the town against Cole; and, as they bind Cole, so they bind Ralston, as a privy in estate with him. Indeed, Ralston, under his conveyance from Cole, took subject to such renunciation and dedication. He got nothing from Cole adverse to the town, because, as Cole's answer bound him, as an act of renunciation and dedication, so Ralston took subject thereto. Riddle v. Town of Charlestown, 43 W. Va. 796, 28 S. E. 831. The decree is res judicata on both Cole and Ralston, his privy in estate. Cole's answer is an estoppel by record, and more solemn than a private writing, because made in a pleading, and constituting a concession and waiver of a point that might have been in issue but for such waiver. Steph. Pl. 204. "When a pleading is made under the oath of the party, it is especially competent evidence against him, as a solemn admission of the truth of the facts stated." 14 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 21. "An admission made during the course of judicial proceedings, whether it be direct, or by inference from the position assumed, the relief sought, or the defense set up, will estop the one who makes it from subsequently asserting any claim inconsistent therewith." 4 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 304. "Where a party assumes a certain position in a legal proceeding, and succeeds in maintaining it, he cannot thereafter, simply because his interests have changed, assume a contrary position, especially if it be to the prejudice of the party who has acquiesced in the position formerly taken by him." Davis v. Wakelee, 156 U. S. 680, 15 Sup. Ct. 555, 39 L. Ed. 578. An estoppel "may be availed of by privies in blood, estate, or law, as well as by all the parties to the transaction, and is equally binding upon them." 4 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 356. "Where one succeeds to the same rights of property formerly enjoyed by another, there is often such privity that the rights of the owner in such property may be affected by the statements of the latter." Jones, Ev. §§ 240, 241. See Railway Co. v. Ohle, 117 U. S. 129, 6 Sup. Ct. 632, 29 L. Ed. 837; Delaware Co. Com'rs v. Diebold Safe & Lock Co., 133 U. S. 473, 10 Sup. Ct. 399, 33 L. Ed. 674; Pope v. Allis, 115 U. S. 370, 6 Sup. Ct. 69, 29 L. Ed. 393; Bigelow, Estop. 526. "A party cannot recover on a statement of facts entirely at variance with, and inconsistent with, claims set up by him in a prior suit for the same cause." 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) p. 3, note 3. Cole's answer was itself a solemn dedication as a street,—alone enough to make it a street,—and he could not retract the dedication. Board v. Holly, 169 Ill. 9, 48 N. E. 149.

Due Process of Law. It is claimed that the decision of this court in Ralston v. Town of Weston violates the constitution, federal and state, in depriving Ralston of property without due process of law. I regard this question as not relevant to this case. To me it is inconceivable how a party who has himself brought a suit in a state court, and that court has, in the due and regular course of judicial proceeding, heard both parties and rendered judgment, can say that the court violated the federal constitution by taking property without due process of law. If so, then such is the case in every suit where the state court affects the right of property. A regular hearing in a regular suit is the clearest instance of the exercise of due process of law. When a party has been fully heard in the regular course of judicial proceedings, an erroneous decision of a state court does not deprive the unsuccessful party of his property without due process of law. Marchant v. Railroad Co., 153 U. S. 380, 14 Sup. Ct. 894, 38 L. Ed. 751; Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 16 Sup. Ct. 80, 40 L. Ed. 91. If the court erred in failing to observe the federal constitution (though the question was not raised), the only redress is in the federal supreme court, by appeal, because it would then be simply error of law, not a void decree; and this court could not, for error in a past and closed term, nullify its former final decree. Both of said Ralston's titles (his original one and the Cole claim), being vested in him at the date of said decree, are foreclosed by it, and that decree is res judicata upon them both, and beyond the power of recall by this court. In the present case the facts do not sustain or present a federal question, even colorable. This Cole title was unquestionably charged with the street right, and under it there never was one hour's possession of the strip in controversy adverse to such street right,—never any possession. On the contrary, Cole conceded that street right in his answer, and by its subsequent user. If he had not conceded it, he never had any possession to take it away. How, then, could he have any property, except in the soil? How have any vested property to be devested without due process by the exercise of the street right? Ralston's possession under his other claim could not be tacked to the Cole separate title. Jarrett v. Stevens, 36 W. Va. 445, 15 S. E. 177. So Ralston by the pretended Cole title acquired no vested property to be taken by the street easement,—no property hostile to it. This claim of deprivation of property is only colorable, and raises no federal question, under decisions. Wilson v. North Carolina, 169 U. S. 586, 18 Sup. Ct. 435, 42 L. Ed. 865. I can see no shadow to claim any basis under this head, except the theory that the decision in City of Wheeling v. Campbell, that limitation bars a right to a public street, makes a law, and that under it title had already vested in Ralston before this court overruled that decision, and that the overruling decision devested a vested right of property in Ralston. This cannot be, unless we can say that Ralston had a vested right of property under the facts and the law. This he had not. Even if we could regard the first decision (City of Wheeling v. Campbell) as making a law, still Ralston would have no vested property under it, in the view of a federal court or of a state court, for the simple reason that Ralston's possession was never adverse to the town's easement, as held upon the facts by this court in the case of Ralston v. Town of Weston, and thus Ralston did not acquire vested property by adverse possession. But suppose Ralston's possession had been adverse in character; would it give him title? Not unless we can say that the first decision of this court, holding that limitation applies to bar a town or city of its easement in a street, was a law, just like a statute, and that title vested under it. There must be law, to vest a title to property. A decision of a court is not a law, so that by its force alone property may vest. Property will vest under the law, but not under a mere decision, an erroneous decision, except in the particular case; and that is not because such decision is a law, but because it is res judicata upon the subject-matter. A court cannot originate, cannot make, law. It only expounds and applies pre-existing law. In Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 46, 6 L. Ed. 253, Chief Justice Marshall, in a few words, laid down the cardinal rule, in saying, "The difference between the departments [of government] undoubtedly is that the legislature makes, the executive executes, and the judiciary construes, the laws." The Virginia court of appeals, in Griffin's Ex'r v. Cunningham, 20 Grat. 51, said: "The law is applied by the one, and is made by the other. Cooley, Const. Lim. 92. 'To declare what the law is or has been, is judicial power; to declare what the law shall be, is legislative.'" In Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 18, 10 L. Ed. 871, the court, by Justice Story, defined the meaning of a law as follows: "In the ordinary use of language it will hardly be contended that the decisions of courts constitute laws. They are, at most, only evidence of what the laws are, and not of themselves laws. They are often re-examined, reversed, and qualified by the courts themselves whenever they are found to be either defective, ill founded, or otherwise incorrect." This declaration of the court has been reaffirmed in words. Railroad Co. v. National Bank, 102 U. S. 29, 54, 26 L. Ed. 75; New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. Louisiana Sugar-Refining Co., 125 U. S. 18, 8 Sup. Ct. 741, 31 L. Ed. 607. The federal constitution contains a clause that no state shall make any law impairing the obligation of a contract. Again and again the United States supreme court has decided that under that provision a decision of a court is not a law, and that only an act of the legislature is a law. Cases just cited, and Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103–112, 16 Sup. Ct. 80, 40 L. Ed. 91, and Brown v. Smart, 145 U. S. 454, 12 Sup. Ct. 958, 36 L. Ed. 773. Now, what is the difference between the two cases? It requires a law for property to vest. There cannot be a deprivation of property without due process of law, unless the party has vested property, and he cannot have that unless he has a law to vest it in him. Law is of the same nature in both cases. Therefore I repeat that the first decision of this court, in City of Wheeling v. Campbell, is not a law under which property could vest, as if it were a legislative act. Moreover, that decision has been adjudged erroneous, and it and Teass v. City of St. Albans, 38 W. Va. 1, 17 S. E. 400, 19 L. R. A. 802, and Forsyth v. City of Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 318, overruled. The last two simply followed the first, without reconsideration. What is the effect of such overruling? Mr. Justice Miller undoubtedly stated the true law in Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 205, 17 L. Ed. 527, speaking of the effect of overruling former decisions, when he said: "I understand the doctrine to be, in such cases, not that the law is changed, but that it was always the same as expounded by the later decision, and that the former decision was not, and never was, the law, and is overruled for that very reason." 1 Bl. Comm. 70, says: "But even in such cases the subsequent judges do not pretend to make a new law, but to vindicate the old one from misrepresentation; for, if it be found that the former decision is manifestly absurd or unjust, it is declared, not that such a sentence is bad law, but that it was not law." Wood v. Brady, 150 U. S. 18, 14 Sup. Ct. 6, 37 L. Ed. 981. The cases of Allen v. Allen (Cal.) 30 Pac. 213, 16 L. R. A. 646, and Ray v. Gas Co., 138 Pa. St. 576, 20 Atl. 1065, 12 L. R. A. 290, both say that when a former decision is overruled the law is not altered, changed, or amended, but that the erroneous decision never was law, and that the principle of the later decision was the true and sound law at the very time when the first erroneous decision was rendered. So Rockhill v. Nelson, 24 Ind. 424; Frink v. Darst, 14 Ill. 304; Paul v. Davis, 100 Ind. 422. Decision is not a law,—only evidence of what the law is. I assert that the true principle is that when a former decision is overruled the law is, and always was, as it is stated in the later decision. It is different where there is a valid statute which is afterwards repealed. While that statute was in force, title could vest under it; but not so with an erroneous decision, when overruled. It never vests under a decision, but under law. There are decisions, such as Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 205, 17 L. Ed. 520, and Douglass v. Pike Co., 101 U. S. 687, 25 L. Ed. 968, exceptional in character, holding that where contracts are made under judicial decisions, and on the faith of them, before they are overruled, their subsequent overruling will not affect such antecedent contracts. This doctrine applies to commercial contracts. An examination of the United States supreme court cases will show that such cases are properly limited to commercial contracts, because they are comraercial contracts. See Justice Brown's opinion in Travis Co. v. Wade, 174 U. S. 508, 19 Sup. Ct. 715, 43 L. Ed. 1060. Justice Miller said in Gelpcke v. Dubuque that the whole membership of the United States supreme court limited this exception to commercial contracts, and conceded that, if the case were one involving title to real estate, the matter would be tested by the later decision, and that it would furnish the true test of what the law always was. Now, remember, as a material point in this case, that Ralston's title set up under adverse possession was not a title acquired by any sort of contract, but by a continued violation of the law in obstructing a public highway, and thus maintaining a public nuisance,—a public offense. Is it possible that the former erroneous decision can be appealed to as a law under which a title to land could vest by the commission of a public wrong,—that a party could be thus aided by an erroneous decision to take advantage of his own wrong? There is a difference between this case and a title acquired by contract. In the Gelpcke Case there was a strong equity of an innocent purchaser of negotiable bonds, good under the first decision, to call upon that decision to shield him from the effect of the later overruling decision,—a strong equity and call for justice; but can one who has taken up a street, without color of title, and thus committed an indictable offense, present any such claim for protection? He ought not and cannot be allowed to do so.

To enable a party to say that he has been deprived of property without due process of law, he must be able to show a law under which the property could vest. He must show a right of property under the law, recognized by the law. New Orleans v. New Orleans Waterworks Co., 142 U. S. 79, 12 Sup. Ct. 142, 35 L. Ed. 943; Board v. Skinkle, 140 U. S. 334, 11 Sup. Ct. 790, 35 L. Ed. 446. Ralston's only show of title against the easement (for he owned the soil) was by an adverse possession; and he could not get title by it, because there could be no adverse possession against a public easement in a street. Possession ever so long contrary to law (a nuisance) cannot give title. Clearly, this shuts out all claim of Ralston existing at the date of the decree in Ralston v. Town of Weston. How as to Ralston's claim derived from Cole? I repeat that that colorable claim is barred by the former decree, as res judicata. But, for argument's sake, say that it was a title acquired after the former decree. There is no color for claiming title by possession under it against the town's easement, because Cole never had any possession of this strip. All admit that the street was once valid to cover this strip with the public easement, and Cole never acquired any title by possession against that easement, as he never had possession at any time, and Ralston could not get from him a right which Cole himself did not possess. So there is no pretense for Ralston to say that he is deprived of property under this Cole claim without due process of law, since he had no vested property to be deprived of without due process of law. "There can be no vested right to do wrong." Grinder v. Nelson, 9 Gill, 300, 52 Am. Dec. 694.

After writing to this point I come across the case of Alferitz v. Borgwardt, 126 Cal. 201, 58 Pac. 460. The supreme court of California had held that, under a certain kind of mortgage, title vested, but later held that it did not, and in the case cited the court said: "But appellant contends that it [the first decision] states the law upon the subject, and that law was not changed until the decision of Shoobert v. De Motta, 112 Cal. 215, 44 Pac. 487, 53 Am. St. Rep. 207, in 1896, and in the meantime this mortgage was made. It is said that to apply the rule declared in the last case, rather than that laid down in the first, would be to impair the obligation of contracts. Douglass v. Pike Co., 101 U. S. 687, 25 L. Ed. 968, and many other cases cited. In the case named it is said: 'After a statute has been settled by judicial construction, the construction becomes, so far as contract rights under it are concerned, as much part of the statute as the text itself, and a change of the decision is to all intents and purposes the same in its effect on contracts as the amendment to the law by means of a legislative enactment.' No rights are acquired here under a statute, in the meaning of that line of authorities which seem to refer to laws authorizing the government, or some subdivision or department thereof, to contract certain obligations. Beyond this the cases cited do not go. I hardly think the rule would be applied to decisions of state courts in regard to general rules of law, although they may affect contract rights. At best, they but lay down a rule for the federal courts as to how far they will be governed by decisions of state courts in the construction of state statutes. Laws are not made by judicial decisions. The court simply determines the rights of the parties in that particular controversy. Courts have never thought themselves bound by it as they are by a valid statute. No doubt, an appellate court assumes a very grave responsibility when it reverses a former decision which has become a rule of property or the law of contracts; and whenever this is done it must be understood that the court has not only considered the objections to the former decision, but the evils which may follow from its reversal. The matter is ably discussed in Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530, and the views there expressed have been frequently affirmed. The mere fact that an error has been made in a decision of the supreme court is no reason for perpetuating it, but, in a given case, to correct it may be productive of more evil than to permit it to stand. And, as stated in the above case, justice is not always on the side of him who claims under the erroneous decision. Why should one who has honestly acquired property according to the law of the land lose it because a judge, relying upon imperfect presentation, has erred? Or why should the policy of the government, adopted upon great deliberation, be so defeated? And especially so where a decision was never deemed to have the force of absolute law. If the supreme court of the United States shall finally go with the appellants in holding that the courts are prohibited from reversing an erroneous construction of a state statute because such decision is a law which impairs the obligation of contracts, then the courts can never change the erroneous construction; for a court can only pass upon existing rights, and must always look to the past for its law, and, so far as it declares the law, it declares what it was and is, but cannot enact what it shall be. I do not think that august tribunal will adopt this view, which, if adopted, can result only in the perpetuation of error." In Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal., beginning at page 597, is an able discussion of stare decisis; and it is shown that where a renunciation of erroneous decisions, though several in number, and though they concern title to real estate, will promote public interest, they often have been, ought to be, renounced.

Equity Jurisdiction. This is clear in this case. The right of the town to the street being valid, settled by adjudication, as shown by Judge McWHORTER and above, shall it be called upon to relitigate its right in two suits brought against it in denial of that right? If its title to that street is good, those actions are groundless. If judgments were recovered in them, could this court sustain them? Clearly not. To do so would nullify its own decision. This court held the right of the town good, and made a mandatory injunction to enable the town, authorizing the town, to do the very thing for doing which it is now sued. The town only executed its decree. Had this court not adjudged the matter, equity might take jurisdiction on the mere ground of avoiding multiplicity of suits, but the town has established its right by adjudication. Is Ralston to be allowed to recover from the town damages for doing an act held by this court to be a lawful act? Is he to be allowed by his action of unlawful entry to recover possession and stop up this street, and thus perpetuate a public nuisance? Courts of equity have an ancient and unquestionable jurisdiction to prevent or abate public nuisance, and this alone would give jurisdiction, even if it had not been decided that this was a public nuisance, and more clearly so as it has been decided to be a nuisance on a street owned by the town. Hartley v. Henretta, 35 W. Va. 222, 13 S. E. 375. "Courts of equity interfere to restrain and prevent public nuisances threatened or in progress, as well as to abate those already existing." 14 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 1119, note. "In regard to public nuisances, the jurisdiction of courts of equity seems to be of a very ancient date, and has been distinctly traced back to the reign of Queen Elizabeth. * * * An indictment lies to abate the nuisance and punish the offender, but an information also lies in equity to redress the grievance, by way of injunction." Story, Eq. § 921; Kansas v. Ziebold, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205; Beveridge v. Lacey, 3 Rand. 63; Bridge Co. v. Summers, 13 W. Va. 484; opinion in Hartley v. Henretta, 35 W. Va. 238, 13 S. E. 375. "Where a municipality has control of streets it may in its corporate name institute judicial proceedings to prevent or remove obstructions thereon." Yates v. Town of Warrenton, 84 Va. 337, 4 S. E. 818; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 659; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1349, 1350; 1 High, Inj. §§ 768, 769; Wood, Nuis. § 729. Another plain ground of equity jurisdiction is to quiet title by removing the cloud over the town's right caused by the conveyances from Cole and McGary, commissioner, and give peace against litigation, especially as its right has been adjudicated. The town was in possession, and for this reason, and because it had a mere easement, could not bring ejectment, and had no remedy to give adequate relief but in equity. Smith v. O'Keefe, 43 W. Va. 172, 27 S. E. 353; Davis v. Settle, 43 W. Va. 17, 37, 26 S. E. 557; Christian v. Vance, 41 W. Va. 754, 24 S. E. 596; Clayton v. Barr, 34 W. Va. 290, 12 S. E. 704. In the Davis Case, Judge Dent held that equity would plainly interfere to prevent an act to defeat an adjudication of this court. Even if Ralston's procurement of these deeds be ever so free from an intentional obstruction of the former decision, yet if they are in fact such an obstruction, unwarranted in law, equity will step in to cancel and give peace. "The jurisdiction is now maintained to the fullest extent, and these decisions are founded on the true principle of equity jurisprudence, which is not merely remedial, but also preventive of injustice. If an instrument ought not to be used or enforced, it is against conscience for the party holding it to retain it for some sinister purpose." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 700. In no view should Ralston be upheld in using these deeds to defeat the public right, to becloud the public right, fixed and settled by actual adjudication. Equity should say, "Peace, be still." "Jurisdiction in equity will be exercised to enjoin nuisance, and avoid vexatious litigation and a multiplicity of suits." 4 Enc. Pl. & Prac. 1126. Ralston's action cannot be successfully predicated on any idea of forcible entry, because an officer making an entry under process is not guilty of forcible entry. Ogg v. Murdock, 25 W. Va. 139. The order of the council to make such entry to remove such nuisance was warranted by chapter 47, Code, by the actual adjudication of this court, and was due process, even without such statute and adjudication, it being a nuisance. The council order is the writ of process. Driggs v. Phillips, 103 N. Y. 77, 8 N. E. 514. Any one may remove an obstruction on a highway. 2 Tuck. Pl. 4, note; Dimmett v. Eskridge, 6 Munf. 308. A town surely has a plainer right inherent in it. It is commanded to do so, and may do so in a summary way, and destroy the thing creating the nuisance. Yates v. Town of Warrenton, 84 Va. 337, 4 S. E. 818; Yeager v. Carpenter, 8 Leigh, 454; Young v. Gooch, 2 Leigh, 646; Baker v. Boston, 22 Am. Dec. 421; Hart v. Albany, 24 Am. Dec. 165; 2 Beach, Pub. Corp. 1022. As equity has jurisdiction on several grounds, it is useless to cite law to show that no common-law jury right is invaded. Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205. Full discussion. State v. Saunders, 66 N. H. 39, 25 Atl. 588. The federal constitution gives no right to jury trial in state courts. Walker v. Sauvinet, 92 U. S. 90, 23 L. Ed. 678.

SALE — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER — RESCISSION FOR FRAUD.

Where the purchaser of goods seeks to avoid the contract of purchase on the ground of fraud, he must, upon the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud, upon his first opportunity to do so, announce his purpose to rescind. If he remain silent, and retain possession of the goods received under the contract, without complaint, until long after the discovery of the facts, he will be held to have waived the objection, and will be bound by the contract as though there had been no fraud. Smith v. Organ Co., 28 S. E. 392, 100 Ga. 628, and cases cited. This is especially true where the purchaser endeavors to rescind the contract in part only. Maynard v. Render, 28 S. E. 194, 95 Ga. 652.

EMINENT DOMAIN — CONDEMNATION OF WATER POWER—ELECTRIC LIGHT COMPANIES.

1. The act of December 7, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 68), confers the power to condemn the property of others upon such corporations or individuals only as own or control any water power in this state or location for steam plant. It confers no power to condemn a water power, but only to condemn rights of way or other easements upon the lands of others in order to run lines of wire, maintain dams, etc., or for other uses necessary to transmit electricity for the purpose of lighting towns or cities, or supplying motive power to railroads or street-car lines, or heat or power to the public. It confers no power to condemn an undivided interest or easement in a water power the remainder of which is owned by the electric light corporation which is seeking to condemn.

2. There is no general law giving electric light companies power to condemn the private property of others.

Error from superior court, Baldwin county; John C. Hart, Judge.

Suit by W. C. Carter and others against the Oconee Electric Light & Power Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Allen & Pottle and J. R. L. Smith, for plaintiffs in error. Jos. S. Turner, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. It appears from the record that the Oconee Electric Light & Power Company, a corporation chartered by the superior court of Baldwin county, owned land in that county on both sides of the Oconee river, in which there is a water power. In one of the deeds made to the company there was a reservation of the grantors' interest in the water power. The company gave notice to the persons reserving this interest that it intended to condemn their interest in the water power. These persons filed an equitable petition in which they sought to have the condemnation proceedings enjoined. The company answered, admitting that the plaintiffs held an undivided interest or an easement in the water power. The trial judge granted the injunction, and the company excepted. Whether the reservation in the deed of the plaintiffs was a reservation or an exception it is not necessary to decide, nor whether there was reserved the soil over which the water flowed, or only the force or power of the water. We put our decision solely upon the power granted in the act of 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 68). That act, in substance, gives the right to an electric light company which owns or controls a water power, or location for steam plant, to condemn rights of way or other easements over the lands of others, where it is necessary in order to carry out the purposes of its organization, to wit, to light towns or cities, supply the motive power to railroads, or supply the public with power or heat. Under this act, it is a condition precedent to the exercise of the power of eminent domain, by a company which is to run its plant by water power, that the company shall exclusively own or control the water power. The act does not expressly or by necessary implication give the corporation the right of eminent domain except where it has such exclusive ownership or control. The whole object of the act is to give to a corporation "owning or controlling" any water power, or location for steam plant, the right to condemn rights of way, etc., upon the lands of others, in order to be able to transmit the electricity to a place distant from that where it is generated. It is given solely to secure a means of utilizing the water power or location and of transmitting the power generated. Acts giving to corporations or individuals the right to condemn the property of others must be construed strictly, and, unless the power is conferred expressly or by necessary implication, it is not conferred at all. The legislature by this act certainly did not contemplate giving to one of two co-tenants the right to condemn the interest of the other in a water power. The act, in so far as it related to water powers, was predicated upon the exclusive ownership or control of the water power by the corporation or individual seeking to condemn. The record discloses that the plaintiffs and the company were tenants in common of this water power, one having as much right to use it as had the other, and we are clearly of the opinion that it was not the intention of the legislature to confer upon one of two co-tenants of a water power the right to condemn the interest of the other therein. The plaintiffs, as individuals, if they had desired to erect a plant to generate electricity for public use, would have had as much right to condemn the interest of the company as had the latter to condemn theirs, if it should be held that this act applied to cases of this kind. We hold that the act does not apply, and that the company derived no power from it to condemn the interest of the plaintiffs in the water power.

2. Other than the act just discussed, we have been able to find no act of the legislature of a general nature which confers upon an electric light and power company the right to condemn the property of others, nor have we had any such act or provision of law pointed out to us. There are, it is true, acts giving power of eminent domain to railroads, mining companies, etc., but they do not in any way apply to electric light or power companies. As before remarked, the power cannot be conferred except by express terms or necessary implication, and where it has not been so conferred it cannot be exercised. For these reasons we affirm the judgment of the trial judge granting the injunction sought by the plaintiffs. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

GEORGIA S. & F. RY. CO. v. SANDERS.

RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—EVIDENCE.

When it is shown by a plaintiff, in an action against a railroad company to recover damages for killing a cow, that the animal was killed by the running and operation of a train of cars, the law raises a presumption of negligence against the company, and, without more, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the value of the animal killed. Such presumption, however, may be rebutted; and when the evidence of the engineer and fireman on the locomotive which struck the animal is to the effect that she came upon the track suddenly, and immediately in front of the locomotive, and that all reasonable and ordinary diligence was used to prevent striking the animal, but without avail, such presumption is successfully rebutted; and, when there is no evidence disproving or tending to disprove this evidence of the train men, the owner is not entitled to recover.

Error from superior court, Lowndes county; J. S. Candler, Judge.

Action by J. G. Sanders against the Georgia Southern & Florida Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

John I. Hall and J. G. Crawford, for plaintiff in error. A. T. Woodward and Edward R. Austin, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. If there is any one question settled by general law and the interpretation by this court of our statutes, it is, we think, that of the liability of a railroad company to respond in damages to the owner for the killing of live stock by the running and operation of the engines and cars of a railroad company. There are duties owing by the railroad company to the owners of stock, and by such owners to the railroad company. The latter is entitled to the free and unobstructed use of its track, while the owner is entitled to have redress for the willful or negligent killing or injury to his stock, and, while the owner may not be compelled to keep his stock so that they will not trespass on the railroad track, so a railroad company, in an effort to prevent the injury or killing of stock which has wandered on the track, cannot be held liable for such killing or injury when it has been guilty of no negligence, but in good faith has endeavored to prevent such injury or killing. When stock has been injured or killed by the running of a locomotive or train of cars, and such fact is shown, the law presumes that the company was guilty of negligence in injuring or killing such stock, and, if nothing more appears by the evidence, the owner, resting on such presumption, is entitled to recover. This presumption, however, is subject to be rebutted, and when rebutted, and there is no conflict in the evidence, the owner is not entitled to recover. Railroad Co. v. Wall, 80 Ga. 202, 7 S. E. 639.

In the present case it was clearly shown on the part of the plaintiff that a cow of the value of $50 belonging to him was killed by the running and operation of a train of cars of the plaintiff in error in the county of Lowndes. When these facts were shown the plaintiff rested his case, and in rebuttal the engineer and fireman on the train which struck and killed the cow were examined as witnesses for the defendant. It appears from the testimony of these witnesses that the cow suddenly came upon the railroad track in front of the engine; that these employés were on the lookout, and could not discover this particular cow until she made her appearance on the track, and that then the engineer used all ordinary and reasonable diligence by putting on the brakes and otherwise attempting to prevent striking the cow, but that the distance between where she came on the track and the engine was so short that the train could not be stopped, and so she was struck and killed. This evidence fully rebutted the presumption of negligence which the law raised in this case against the company. No other testimony was offered by the plaintiff, according to the record, and, under the well-known rules of law cited above, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover. Had there been a conflict of evidence on the question as to whether there was negligence on the part of the employés of the company in striking and killing the animal, all parties would have been compelled to yield to the determination of the question of negligence made by the court or jury trying the case. But, as there was no conflict of evidence on the question of negligence, it must be ruled that, as the presumption was overcome by the evidence of the witnesses for the defendant, no right to recover rested in the owner of the cow. Railroad Co. v. Walker, 87 Ga. 204, 13 S. E. 511. The court, therefore, committed error in overruling the certiorari, and the judgment is reversed. EQUITY—RELIEF FROM JUDGMENT—LACHES.

Equity will not grant a new trial in a case which has proceeded to judgment in a court of law, when the petition therefor shows that the plaintiff was negligent in making his defense in the court where the judgment was rendered.

Suit by M. O. Berry against August Burghard and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

B. S. Miller, for plaintiff in error. Eugene Ray and Charlton E. Battle, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. In a justice's court in Muscogee county, Burghard obtained judgment against Jerallie. Execution thereon was levied upon certain personal property in the possession of the defendant. It was claimed by Berry. On the trial of the claim case the property was found subject. Berry filed an equitable petition for the purpose of setting aside the judgment finding the property subject and of obtaining a new trial. He alleged that there had been one trial before a jury in the justice's court, resulting in a mistrial; that, after several continuances, the case was finally set for trial before another jury; that his counsel were the Messrs. Miller; that on the day before the trial the member of the firm who had theretofore represented him in the matter informed the magistrate that he would be engaged in another court, and would be unable to represent the claimant, but that his brother would appear in his stead; that on the day of the trial this brother did not appear, the reason being that he was in attendance upon a sick relative, and could neither attend court nor notify the justice that he would be absent. The case went to trial, and the jury found the property subject. By an amendment the claimant set out the facts upon which he based his claim to the property, and alleged that if his counsel had been present, and the evidence brought out, the verdict of the jury would in all probability have been different. The judge refused to allow this amendment, on the ground that there was nothing to amend by. He then sustained a demurrer to the petition, which contained special grounds, and also the objection that there was no equity in the petition. The plaintiff excepted to the refusal to allow his offered amendment, and also to the ruling sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the case.

This court will not reverse a judgment because of the refusal to allow an amendment to a petition when it appears that the petition and amendment, taken together, do not set forth a cause of action. Treating the amendment as having been allowed, and considering it with the petition, we think that the judge did not err in sustaining the demurrer. Equity will never set aside a judgment at law and grant a new trial to a person who has been negligent in the defense of his case in the courts of law, or who has been negligent in the assertion of his rights in such courts. In the present case, while it is asserted that the petitioner's counsel was absent because of providential cause, the petition does not in any way explain the absence of the petitioner himself. From the facts stated in the amendment which was offered, and which was not allowed by the judge, it seems to us that it would have been absolutely necessary for him to have appeared in order to establish the facts upon which he based his claim, or to put his counsel in possession of these facts. It is the duty of a claimant, where a levy has been made and the sale stopped by a claim affidavit, to be in a position to give the proper attention to his case when it is to be called. Had the petitioner in this case performed his duty and appeared at the trial of the claim case, he could have informed the court of the failure of his counsel to appear, and that he could not safely go to trial without counsel. The court would then doubtless have continued the case or postponed it to another day. Instead of doing this, he remained away from the court, and relied entirely upon his counsel. This was such negligence on his part as to debar him from relief in a court of equity. In the case of Mullins v. Christopher, 36 Ga. 584, it was held by this court that "if a party have a good defense at law, and from negligence fail to set it up at the proper time, he must take the consequences of his own laches; he cannot go into equity to be relieved from the consequences of such negligence." FINNEY v. EQUITABLE MORTG. CO.

ACTION ON NOTE—USURY AS DEFENSE—EVIDENCE.

1. When the defendant in an action upon a promissory note admits enough to make out a prima facie case for the plaintiffs, and sets up the defense of usury, it is incumbent upon him to establish the same by evidence, and, if he fails to do so, the court may direct a verdict for the plaintiff.

2. Where, in such a case, it affirmatively appeared that the plaintiff, to whom the defendant had applied for a loan of the money for which the note in suit was given, remitted to a named person a check for the full amount of the note, less a sum which the defendant had agreed to pay to a corporation for negotiating the loan, the check being payable to the order of the person named therein as agent of the defendant, evidence which showed merely that this person was not the defendant's agent to borrow the money, and that he paid over to the defendant a sum less than that named in the check, was not sufficient to show that the transaction was usurious. It was incumbent upon the defendant to show further that the payee of the check was in fact the plaintiff's agent, and that as such he kept a portion of the money with a view to exacting usury on the loan.

Action by the Equitable Mortgage Company against W. B. Finney. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Guerry & Hall, for plaintiff in error. E. A. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The Equitable Mortgage Company sued Finney upon a promissory note, the payment of which it was alleged was secured by a deed which had been by the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff. The petition prayed for a judgment setting up a special lien on the land described in the deed. The defendant filed a plea setting forth that the deed was invalid, for the reason that the debt which it was given to secure was infected with usury. At the trial the defendant admitted the execution of the note and deed, assumed the burden of proof, and undertook to establish the truth of his plea of usury. From the evidence it appeared that the defendant had made application in writing to the Georgia Security Investment Company to negotiate a loan for him for $400, that company being described in the application as the agent of the applicant, and it being agreed therein that the applicant was to pay to such company the sum of $75 as commissions for negotiating the loan. The loan negotiated was represented by the note sued on, which was for $430. The defendant testified that he received only $354 of this amount. It appeared that a check for $355 had been forwarded to R. D. Smith, who is described in the check as the agent of the defendant, and the amount of the check is stated therein to be the "amount of loan negotiated by the Georgia Security Investment Company." The $354 which reached the defendant was paid to him by Smith. Upon this state of facts the judge directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and this is assigned as error in the bill of exceptions sued out by the defendant.

It is contended on the part of the plaintiff in error that as the agreement with the Georgia Security Investment Company was that the commission for negotiating the loan should be $75, and, as $76 was retained, the amount of the note, less this sum, being the amount received by the defendant, the truth of his plea was established. Even if it be conceded that a difference of one dollar in the transaction would authorize the setting aside of a deed on the ground that the debt which it was given to secure was infected with usury, still the defendant failed to carry the burden which he assumed in undertaking to establish the truth of his plea. It does not distinctly appear, except from the recitals in the check, that Smith was the agent of either party. He was the person through whom the money reached the defendant, but just what his connection with the transaction was is not at all clear. The burden of proof was upon the defendant, and therefore, even if Smith retained one dollar of the amount in his hands, before the defendant can be said to have established his plea of usury, he should have shown that Smith was the plaintiff's agent, and as such kept the difference between the amount of the check forwarded to him and the amount actually paid over to the defendant with a view to exacting usury on the loan made to the defendant. As this did not appear, the plea was not established by evidence, and the court did not err in directing a verdict for the plaintiff. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

Jas. Bishop, Jr., and D. M. Roberts, plaintiffs in error. J. E. Wooten and W. Clements, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The material port of the petition of J. B. Cameron against mayor and council of the town of Eastm are as follows: During the years 1895, 1 and 1897 he was the clerk and treasurer said town. It was his duty to receive pay out all money coming to the mayor council from every source. He was e tled, under the charter and ordinances of town, to commissions of 2½ per cent. on sums received and paid out by him. Un an act approved December 15, 1894, the m or and council were authorized to is school bonds to the amount of $10,000. pursuance of said act and the election h thereunder, the said mayor and council, August 26, 1897, declared the provisions said act to be in force, and provided for issue of the said bonds. And on the 1st of September said mayor and council iss said bonds to the amount of $10,000, negotiated them at par, and the proce thereof were turned over to the board of e cation of said town; all of which was d as required by the provisions of said Petitioner avers that he being, at the t said bonds were issued and negotiated, clerk and treasurer of said town, and only officer of said town authorized by law to receive the proceeds of the sale said bonds and pay the same over to s board of education, is entitled to a comm sion of 2½ per cent. on said sum of $10, for receiving the same, and 2½ per cent. said sum for paying the same over to board of education. Petitioner avers, th fore, that said mayor and council of the to of Eastman, a corporation as aforesaid, indebted to petitioner in the sum of $500 his commissions, as aforesaid, besides in est thereon from the 1st day of Septemb 1897, the date on which the said bonds w issued and disposed of." The defendant murred to this petition on several groun and, its demurrer having been overruled, plaintiff had a verdict. The defendant subsequently sued out a bill of exceptions, alleging error in not sustaining its demurrer, and in denying its motion for a new trial. Without dealing with this motion, or with all of the questions raised by the demurrer, we shall confine ourselves to a brief discussion of the merits of so much thereof as is embraced in the following words: "Because the petition shows that the commission to which the plaintiff alleges that he was entitled was 2½ per cent. on money received by him, and 2½ per cent. on money paid out by him, as clerk and treasurer, but it is not distinctly alleged, either expressly or by necessary inference to be drawn from the adroit language employed, that the $10,000 for which plaintiff alleges the bonds were negotiated was ever actually received by him or that it was paid out by him; * * * because said petition is evasive, and does not put the court in full possession of all the material facts in reference to the subject-matter of the suit, so as to enable the court to clearly understand the case intended to be made by plaintiff, and expressions are used in the petition from which different inferences may be drawn."

We think the attack thus made upon the petition was good, and that the demurrer ought to have been sustained. As it directly called upon the plaintiff to say, without evasion, whether or not he actually received and paid out the $10,000, it was incumbent upon him to do so. The evident design of the pleader, so far as the same can be gathered from the allegations contained in the petition framed by him, was to ask for a recovery upon the theory that the facts set forth would warrant an inference that the plaintiff did receive and disburse the money, and was therefore entitled to the commissions claimed; yet, when put to the test, he would not squarely and unequivocally aver that the plaintiff actually received and paid out the money, or that he had really performed any service with respect to this fund. The failure to do this justified the defendant's position that the petition was "evasive," and did not "put the court in full possession of all the material facts in reference to the subject-matter of the suit, so as to enable the court to clearly understand the case intended to be made by plaintiff." If the clerk actually rendered any services in connection with the proceeds of the bonds, or ever in any manner handled the same, it was a very easy matter to say so; and the fact that his counsel, instead of endeavoring to meet the defendant's demurrer by a proper amendment to the petition, deliberately elected to stand upon the same as originally framed, is significant. We therefore have no hesitation in holding that the plaintiff was not entitled to go to trial without curing the defects in his petition which were so plainly and distinctly pointed out by the defendant's demurrer.

This ruling may, at first glance, seem somewhat technical, but the soundness of it is illustrated by the result of the case. It appeared at the trial that the plaintiff had never, in point of fact, received one dollar of the proceeds of the bonds, and therefore his recovery, if sustainable at all, could not possibly be based upon the theory that he had actually rendered services for which he was entitled to compensation. Indeed, his counsel, in a written argument presented to this court, sought to uphold the verdict on an entirely different ground, viz. that the evidence showed that, "to avoid paying this commission, an ordinance was subsequently enacted providing that the mayor and council should deliver the bonds to the board of education of the town of Eastman, which said board negotiated the bonds, and thereby, for the time being, defeated the collection by the said clerk of his commission." In this connection, the case of Beard v. City of Decatur, 64 Tex. 7, 53 Am. Rep. 735, was cited and relied on. As will have been observed, however, there is no hint in the petition of a fraudulent purpose on the part of the mayor and council to defeat the plaintiff's rights in the premises by passing an ordinance the effect of which was to prevent the school fund from passing through his hands. Nor does the plaintiff undertake to therein allege that, although he was ready and willing to discharge the duties of his office, he was by any other means or device prevented from receiving, safely keeping, and paying out the fund, and thereby defrauded out of his just commissions. Had the petition been framed on this line, the case laid would have presented an altogether different aspect.

The necessity of observing at least a semblance of good pleading is apparent from what has just been said. The refusal of the trial court to sustain the defendant's demurrer has brought about the anomalous result of the plaintiff obtaining a verdict upon a theory not even remotely hinted at in his petition. While, of course, it is not permissible to look to the evidence in any case with a view to testing the sufficiency of the pleadings, the probable consequences of not requiring good pleading should never be lost sight of, and what transpired on the trial of the present case may very properly, by way of argument, be referred to as illustrating to what bad results defective pleading, if allowed, must inevitably lead. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

VICKERS v. HAWKINS.

TAXATION—LEVY ON WILD LAND—TAX EXECUTION—ALTERATIONS—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. The levy of a wild land tax fi. fa. cannot be attacked on the ground that it is excessive, when the fi. fa. is issued, not against the owner, but against the particular lot of land levied upon, and commands the levying officer to sell that lot for the taxes due upon it.

2. Where it appears that alterations or changes have been made in the entry of levy upon a tax execution, it will be presumed that such alterations or changes were made at the time of the original entry and before the sale, and the burden is upon the objecting party to show the contrary. (a) The evidence in the present case was not sufficient to rebut the presumption.

Error from superior court, Worth county; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by A. H. Hawkins, by his next friend, against E. L. Vickers. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

C. W. Fulwood, J. J. Forehand, and Fulwood & Murray, for plaintiff in error. Perry & Tipton, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. In the year 1888 the tax collector of Worth county issued a tax execution against lot of land No. 211, in the Fourteenth district of Worth county, as unreturned wild land. The execution commanded the levying officer to levy upon and sell this particular lot in order to raise the unpaid state and county taxes due thereon. On January 30, 1889, a proper officer levied this fi. fa. upon the lot, and, after legal advertisement, exposed the lot for sale on May 7, 1889. At that sale Dixon purchased the lot, and afterwards conveyed it to Vickers. In 1897, A. H. Hawkins, by his next friend, brought suit to recover the land from Vickers. He showed a grant from the state to Horne of this lot; a deed from Horne to S. H. Hawkins, made in 1887; and a deed from him to his son, the plaintiff in the present action, made in 1893. The defendant offered in evidence the deed of the sheriff, made in May, 1889, together with the wild land tax fi. fa. and the entries thereon. The plaintiff's counsel objected to the admission of this evidence upon the grounds (1) that the entry of levy upon the fi. fa. showed that the levy had been excessive; and (2) that the original entry of levy appeared to have showed a levy upon lot "221," and that this had been canceled, and the number "211" inserted instead. The court excluded the evidence, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant filed a bill of exceptions complaining of the exclusion of the evidence offered.

1. We think the judge erred in excluding the deed and fi. fa., upon the ground that the entry of levy showed on its face that the levy was excessive. The execution issued for the amount of $3.26, with costs. It was levied upon the lot of land, the value of which the witnesses estimated at from 50 cents to $1.50 per acre. In the case of an ordinary execution against the person, such a levy would be excessive, but we think there is a difference between an execution issued in personam and an execution in rem. This execution was issued, by virtue of an act of the legislature, against unreturned wild lands. A great quantity of the wild land of the state appears to have been unreturned, and the legislature, in order that the state might not lose the taxes on such land, inaugurated a system by which the tax officers were required to issue executions against the land itself where it had not been returned. This was doubtless for the purpose of collecting the taxes already due, and of placing the title in persons who would return the land and pay the taxes. It was in the nature of a proceeding in rem against the land, and the execution directed that the lot be sold for the taxes and costs. The sheriff was obliged to levy upon the whole lot in obedience to the command of the execution. There being no known owner of the land, and no person returning it for taxes, it was right and proper to levy upon and sell the entire lot in order to place the title in some one who would return the lot for taxes. Had the sheriff sold only a sufficient quantity of the lot to pay the amount of the fi. fa., the balance would have still been without a known owner, and remained unreturned for taxes. This would have rendered ineffectual the policy of the state to put the title in some known person, who would return the lot for taxes. We think that an execution in rem against certain specific property may properly be levied upon that property, and that the levy will not be void for excessiveness, though the value of the property be far greater than the amount of the execution. We therefore think that where a tax execution is issued against a particular lot of land, commanding the levying officer to levy upon and sell that lot, a levy of the execution upon the entire lot is not excessive. This was intimated by Mr. Justice Lewis in Hilton v. Singletary, 107 Ga. 826, 33 S. E. 717, where he said: "We question very much whether this doctrine of excessiveness [of levy] can be applied to a case of this sort, where the fi. fa. issued in rem against specific property, namely, a certain wild-land lot, for taxes due thereon. The sheriff is ordered to seize the identical property levied upon and sold, and in the mandate to him there is no implied authority to seize a greater or less quantity than that specified in the fi. fa. It is in the nature of a proceeding in rem."

2. Nor was the other objection to the evidence good. It was that the entry of levy had been changed by canceling the number "221," originally written therein, and writing the number "211" above, below, and over it. The execution was issued against lot 211, in the Fourteenth district of Worth county. The sheriff advertised lot 211, and made the deed to lot 211. There was some evidence introduced by the plaintiff and defendant as to the change or alteration in the entry of levy. The clerk of the court who recorded the deed testified that he did not know whether the change or alteration had been made at the time of the record. The other evidence was to the effect that the change or alteration had been made before Dixon conveyed the land to the defendant. There was really no evidence tending to show whether the alteration was made at the time of the original entry and before the sale, or whether it was made subsequently thereto. This entry of levy purported to be an official one by the sheriff. He was the person charged by law with the execution of the fi. fa., and, when alterations in his entry appear, it will be presumed that he made them at the time of the original entry, and consequently before the sale. This presumption must be rebutted by the person attacking the levy. Otherwise, the official entry of the officer will stand as correct, and the levy will not be invalidated by the alteration, although the same appear on its face. Collins v. Boring, 96 Ga. 360, 23 S. E. 401. For these reasons we think the court below erred in excluding the evidence offered by the defendant. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—CORRECTION BY JUDGE—VERIFICATION—SALE BY COMMISSIONER—VALIDITY.

1. Section 5528 of the Civil Code requires a judge, when a bill of exceptions is presented to him for his certificate, to change it, if needful, so as to make it conform to the truth. It is better practice, where corrections are made or suggested, to have the paper rewritten; but if the judge makes erasures or interlineations, or writes in the margin or below the signature of counsel for the plaintiffs in error, and then certifies the bill of exceptions, as corrected, to be true, such corrections will be considered as a part of the bill of exceptions, wherever they precede the certificate of the judge.

2. Where such bill of exceptions is thus corrected by interlineations, and by a note immediately preceding the certificate of the judge, and that certificate verifies the "bill of exceptions as corrected by the court," this court will not dismiss the writ of error because of such certificate, where the interlineations and note do not in any way contradict any statement or recital remaining in the bill of exceptions, but merely add additional facts.

3. A commissioner appointed by the court, with the consent of all the parties at interest, to sell the assets of an insolvent company at a sale to be reported by him to the court for confirmation, cannot make a valid sale to a banking corporation in which he is a stockholder and director; and this is true although it is not shown that the property brought less than its value, and there is no allegation of unfairness in the sale. Such a sale is contrary to public policy, and will be set aside upon objection promptly urged.

Courtland Symmes and Spencer R. Atkinson, for plaintiffs in error? Goodyear & Kay, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. 1, 2. Before proceeding to a discussion of the merits of this case, we will consider a motion made by counsel for the defendants in error to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that the trial judge's certificate to the bill of exceptions does not conform to the requirements of section 5532 of the Civil Code. In this connection we will also notice the contention of counsel for the plaintiffs in error that a certain note or correction of the judge should not be considered as a part of the bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions is typewritten, but contains two or three interlineations in pen and ink, which seem to be in the handwriting of the judge, though in no other way identified as his corrections. Further than this there is, immediately following the signature of counsel for the plaintiffs in error and immediately preceding the certificate of the judge, a "note" signed by the judge, and containing a statement of fact additional to what is stated in the bill of exceptions proper. The certificate of the judge is in the usual form, except that it certifies the "bill of exceptions, as corrected by the court." It was urged by the plaintiffs in error that the note made by the court below the signature of the counsel for the plaintiffs in error could not be considered; that the law requires bills of exceptions to be signed by counsel, and nothing appearing below such signatures is any part of the bill of exceptions. Section 5528 of the Civil Code requires that the judge to whom is tendered a bill of exceptions in a case where no motion for a new trial has been made "shall, if needful, change the same so as to conform to the truth and make it contain all the evidence, and refer to all the record, necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of." While it is the better practice for the judge to suggest what changes are necessary, and have the bill of exceptions rewritten before he signs it, still it is in his power to make, by erasures, interlineations, marginal notes, or other notes which precede his certificate, the changes in the bill of exceptions which is presented to him. If he does so, and then certifies the bill of exceptions as true, the changes will be considered as a part of the bill of exceptions. Smith v. Railroad Co., 83 Ga. 671, 10 S. E. 361; Joseph v. Railway Co., 92 Ga. 332, 18 S. E. 294. It would, of course, be much better and safer for counsel for the plaintiff in error, and less troublesome to this court, for the paper to be rewritten so as to come here without marginal or other notes or extensive inter-lineations; and we would respectfully urge the trial judges to have this done, rather than to so mutilate the bill of exceptions by erasures, interlineations, and marginal notes that it is difficult for the court to read it or to determine the errors complained of. In the present case the certificate is not in the usual form, but certifies the "bill of exceptions, as corrected by the court." This, we think, makes no difference in the present case, for the reason that the corrections do not in any way contradict anything remaining in the bill of exceptions. Taking the whole bill of exceptions, in its entirety, there is nothing in any one part to show that any other portion is not true. We are clear, therefore, that the note of the court must be considered a part of the bill of exceptions, inasmuch as it precedes the certificate of the judge, and is expressly certified as a part of the bill of exceptions. See Preetorius v. Barnes, 75 Ga. 313; Masland v. Kemp, 80 Ga. 365, 10 S. E. 124. Indeed, we think that the corrections to which the judge's certificate refers must be taken to include this note, and that, unless the note be considered as a part of the bill of exceptions, there is no certificate that the remainder is true. The bill of exceptions must be considered as certified only when corrected by this note, and, unless we should consider the note, this court could not construe the certificate as certifying the bill of exceptions proper, without the correction made in the note of the court. As before remarked, an examination of the bill of exceptions and of the note of the court shows that the latter does not contradict any statement made in the former, but merely adds to it another fact. We think that we cannot sustain the motion to dismiss the writ of error. The corrections made by the judge are simply additional statements of facts which had been omitted by counsel, and which the judge thought necessary to a clear understanding of the case. The material part of the corrections was to state that a certain decree or order was taken in open court by consent, with counsel for all parties present. This does not contradict anything stated in the bill of exceptions as presented to the judge. One of the interlineations simply specifies this decree as part of the record to be sent to this court, and the note of the court states that the decree was taken by consent. The bill of exceptions, as corrected by the judge, is certified to be true. The certificate is substantially in conformity with that prescribed by the Code, and the case is controlled by the decision in Pusey v. Sweat, 92 Ga. 809, 19 S. E. 816. Counsel for the defendants in error relied upon the cases of Hawkins v. City of Americus, 102 Ga. 786, 30 S. E. 519; Fort v. Sheffield (Ga.) 33 S. E. 660; and Sanges v. State (Ga.) 34 S. E. 327. These cases differ materially from the present one. In Hawkins v. Americus the certificate of the judge verified the bill of exceptions in part only, and showed it to be in part untrue. The opinion of Little, J., in that case showed that this court had no jurisdiction of a writ of error when the judge did not certify that the bill of exceptions was entirely true. In Fort v. Sheffield the certificate was that the bill of exceptions, as modified by the note of the court, was true, and the note showed that the bill of exceptions was in large part not true. The note in that case sought to correct statements in the bill of exceptions, without their having been canceled or erased; and we had before us two contradictory statements of facts,—the bill of exceptions proper, and the note of the court. It followed that the certificate of the judge did not verify the bill of exceptions as being entirely true. The case of Sanges v. State was very similar, and the writ of error was dismissed for the same reasons. In the present case the corrections of the judge did not change or contradict a single allegation or statement in the original bill of exceptions. It merely added to it, leaving the whole consistent in all of its parts, and the certificate verified it all as true. The motion to dismiss is therefore overruled.

3. Coming now to a consideration of the case on its merits, we find the facts to have been substantially as follows: Judgment was rendered against the McCullough Export Lumber & Warehouse Company, and by a decree of the court, to which all the parties at interest consented, Mark Verdery was appointed commissioner to sell the assets of the company. The decree instructed him to advertise the sale for a certain length of time in a certain newspaper, to sell the property at public outcry not earlier than a certain date, to knock off the property to the highest and best bidder, and to report the sale back to the court for confirmation. In compliance with the terms of the order, he duly advertised the sale, and sold the property at public outcry; the National Bank of Brunswick being the purchaser. The commissioner made his report to the court; stating that he had complied in every way with the court's instructions, and had sold the property to the highest and best bidder,—the National Bank of Brunswick,—and praying that the sale be confirmed. Objections to the sale were filed by the defendant company and McCullough on the grounds that the property sold for a sum far below its value; that Verdery was a shareholder and director in the bank, and therefore interested in the bank's purchase; that, being so interested, he was disqualified to act as commissioner to sell; that the counsel for the commissioner was also counsel for the purchaser, the bank, and was one of the shareholders of the bank; that the sale was made at a date earlier than was authorized by the decree of the court; and that the sale was for these reasons void, and should not be confirmed. The issue was heard upon an agreed statement of facts, which was, substantially, that it was an open question whether the amount for which the property sold was more or less than its value, or more or less than it would bring upon a resale; that the purchaser, the bank, was and is a duly-created corporation, and was and is the holder of a large part of the bonds upon which the suit had been brought; that Verdery, the commissioner, was and is a shareholder and director of the bank; and that the counsel for the commissioner was also counsel for the bank, and a holder of stock of the bank. It also appeared that the date of the sale was the very day earlier than which the court's decree had directed that the sale should not take place. After argument, the court overruled the objections and confirmed the sale. To this the objectors excepted. We think that the court should have sustained the objections filed, and have refused to confirm the sale. It is recognized as a general rule that a trustee cannot act for his own benefit in matters connected with the trust, and it is held that, where a trustee becomes himself the purchaser of the trust estate, the cestuis que trustent may set aside the sale, though it was at public auction, bona fide, and for a fair price. The reason of the rule is that the trustee, as the representative of the trust estate, is interested in selling for the highest possible price, while he is at the same time, as the purchaser, interested in buying for the lowest possible price, and that it is against public policy to allow him to assume positions so inconsistent and so full of temptation; there being a direct conflict between interest and duty. So careful are the courts to place the trustee beyond the reach of all temptation, that the sale will be set aside without a consideration of the question whether or not there has been actual fraud, or whether the property did, as matter of fact, bring an inadequate price or sell for its full value. "The cestui que trust is not bound to prove, nor is the court bound to judge, that the trustee has made a bargain advantageous to himself. The fact may be so, and yet the party not have it in his power to distinctly and clearly show it. There may be fraud, as Lord Hardwicke observed, and the party not able to prove it. It is to guard against this uncertainty and hazard of abuse, and to remove the trustee from temptation, that the rule does and will permit the cestui que trust to come, at his own option and without showing actual injury, and insist upon having the experiment of another sale." Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 251. See, also, Harrison v. McHenry, 9 Ga. 164. If this be the rule where the trustee purchases for himself, it would seem to apply with equal force where he is only part purchaser or is interested in the purchase. Had the commissioner in the present case been the holder of all of the stock of the corporation purchasing the property, he would practically have been himself the purchaser; and the fact that he held an amount of stock less than all could make no difference in principle, but only in degree. The same reason would necessarily control and demand the application of the same rule. The temptation might be lessened, but it would not be removed; and it is not against its existence in any specified or certain degree, but against its existence at all, that courts must guard. As was said by Chancellor Kent in Davoue v. Fanning, supra, "The distinction of its being a weaker temptation is too thin to form a safe rule of justice." In the present case there is no proof that the property brought less than its full value, and no allegation whatever of any fraud or irregularity in making the sale; but, as is said in High, Rec. (3d Ed.) § 194, the rule "is entirely independent of the question whether any fraud in fact has intervened." In the same section it is also stated that the rule applies "notwithstanding the sale is a judicial sale." In Railroad Co. v. Bowler's Heirs, 9 Bush, 468, where a judicial sale was set aside, the court said that "an agent or trustee cannot rightfully place himself in a position exciting in his own bosom a conflict between self-interest and the duty he owes to those for whom he acts." And in the case of York Buildings Co. v. Mackenzie, 8 Brown, Parl. Cas. 42, decided in 1795 by the English house of lords, and denominated by Chancellor Kent as "high and authoritative," the sale was a judicial one, and was at public auction. The court had fixed an upset price, and confirmation by the court was necessary to complete the sale. The property was bid in by the "common agent" of the court, on whose information the upset price had been based; and it was held that he was in the nature of a trustee, and incapacitated to become the purchaser, although the sale was a judicial and public one, and the minimum price fixed by the court. Thus, the fact that the sale was a judicial one, not to be complete until after confirmation by the court, is no reason why it should not be set aside. There was still an opportunity for fraud on the part of the commissioner which might not have been discoverable by the court. In such case disqualification is worked by the bare chance or opportunity for fraud. We have no reason to believe that Mr. Verdery did not, as matter of fact, act solely for the best interests of the owners of the property, and without being in the slightest degree influenced by his personal interest in the purchase, but this cannot affect the question at all. In the case of Dimes v. Grand Junction Canal, 3 H. L. Cas. 759, a decree was held voidable because the lord chancellor of England, who was disqualified from interest because a shareholder in an interested corporation, presided. This case was cited with approval in Livingston v. Cochran, 33 Ark. 294, where a sale was set aside because the purchaser was the probate judge who had ordered the sale, although the court said that he might have been perfectly innocent of any willful or intentional wrong in the matter.

It was urged by counsel for the defendants in error that the confirmation of the sale was proper because the defendant had, knowing that Verdery was a shareholder and director of the bank, and that the bank held a large part of the bonds, and that the bank might be compelled, in order to protect itself, to become the purchaser, consented to the decree appointing Verdery as commissioner. We think that a consent to the appointment of Verdery as commissioner to sell is in no sense a consent that he might become the purchaser at his own sale, or that the property might be bid in by a corporation in which he was pecuniarily interested. A knowledge that the bank held bonds was not knowledge that it would in any event become the purchaser at the sale. It was to be presumed that the property would, at public and open sale, bring its fair market value; and no one was chargeable with knowledge that the bank would be compelled, for its own protection, to buy in the property for more than it was worth.

For these reasons, we think that the objections to the sale should have been sustained, and the sale set aside. We cannot see any merit in the remaining grounds of objection to the sale, to wit, those relating to the disqualification of the commissioner's counsel and to the date of the sale; but, as we decide that the sale should be set aside upon other grounds, it is unnecessary to rule upon these. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—LEASE—RENT—PAYMENT—CONDITION PRECEDENT—INJUNCTION.

1. Where a landowner leased to another the timber on three named lots of land "for turpentine purposes," for three years from the time boxing began, and the lease expressly stipulated that the money should be paid before boxing began, the payment of the amount due for all of the lots was a condition precedent to the lease becoming operative. Where, in such case, the landowner claimed that the money for but two of the lots was tendered him, and he thereupon leased the lots to a third party, and the first lessee filed an equitable petition for injunction against the second lessee, and claimed therein title to the timber, and on the hearing before the judge the evidence was conflicting as to whether the petitioner had tendered the money for all three lots, or for only two, the judge, having found in favor of the latter contention, did not abuse his discretion in refusing the injunction.

2. Not having complied with the condition precedent by tendering the whole amount due, the petitioner had no such "perfect title" as would authorize an injunction in his favor under section 4927 of the Civil Code, as amended by the act of 1899, without proof of irreparable damage, or of the insolvency of those whom he sought to enjoin.

Error from superior court, Irwin county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Suit by D. T. Clyatt against one Fletcher and Barbour Bros. & Co. to restrain defendants Barbour Bros. & Co. from operating under a lease of turpentine lands. From a judgment denying the injunction, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Fulwood & Murray, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Martin, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. On October 28, 1895, Fletcher leased the timber on three certain lots of land to Clyatt, for turpentine purposes, for the term of three years from the date of cutting the boxes. The lease fixed the price of the timber at $1.50 per acre, and expressly stipulated that the "timber was to be paid for before boxing." The record discloses that when Clyatt got ready to box the timber, and had in fact commenced boxing, Fletcher appeared, and stopped him because he had not paid for the timber. Subsequently Fletcher leased the same timber to Barbour Bros. & Co., who commenced boxing the timber. Clyatt filed an equitable petition against Fletcher and Barbour Bros. & Co., setting up his lease, and praying that the defendants be restrained from boxing or cutting the timber. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that at the time of the original lease the title to one of the lots was in dispute, and that Fletcher and Clyatt had agreed that the price of the timber on this lot should be deposited in a certain bank, to await the termination of the litigation in regard to the lot. The plaintiff's evidence also tended to show that subsequently to the lease this agreement was ratified and renewed; Fletcher agreeing that the money might be deposited in another bank, and agreeing to receive the certificate of deposit in lieu of cash. His evidence further tended to show that, upon the occasion when plaintiff commenced boxing, he tendered Fletcher the price of the timber upon two of the lots and this certificate of deposit of the price of the timber upon the lot to which the title was in litigation. Fletcher denied having made such an agreement, and insisted that he had demanded the cash to be paid into his hands before the boxing should commence. He positively denied making any agreement in regard to any certificate of deposit, and testified that the price of the timber upon the three lots had never been tendered him. This is the substance of the evidence. The judge, after hearing it, refused the injunction, and Clyatt excepted.

As has been shown, the evidence as to the tender of the price of the timber was conflicting. The lease was of the timber on three lots, without any special mention of the lot which was in litigation. There was an express stipulation that the timber should be paid for before the boxing began. This was made a condition precedent by the agreement of the parties. The estate, therefore, did not vest in Clyatt until the whole price was paid or tendered. Civ. Code, § 3137. If Fletcher's contention be true,—that he had never agreed to receive a certificate of deposit in lieu of the money,—a tender of such certificate would not be a compliance with the condition. The money itself should have been tendered or paid. Clyatt, not having paid for the timber or made a proper tender of payment, had no such title as would authorize a court of equity to grant an injunction without proof of insolvency or irreparable damage. There is no allegation in the petition that the damages are irreparable. On the contrary, they are estimated in dollars and cents, at an amount which the petitioner alleges he is ready to prove. The testimony shows that both Fletcher and Barbour Bros. & Co. are abundantly solvent. Of course, we do not intend to express any opinion as to the truth of the contention of either party as to making tender. That will be a matter for the determination of the jury on the final trial. We simply hold that where the evidence is conflicting, and the judge accepts as true that of one party, we will not control his discretion in so doing. In the present case, taking as true that portion of the evidence which the judge accepted as true, the refusal of the injunction was not improper. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 7, 1900.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—BILLS AND NOTES—COLLECTION—PAYMENT TO AGENT—POSSESSION OF NOTE—AUTHORITY—TRIAL—VERDICT—EVIDENCE.

1. Agency to sell does not necessarily carry with it authority to collect.

2. If the debtor by promissory note makes a payment thereon to one claiming to be an agent for collection, it is incumbent on the former to see that the latter is in possession of the security; for, if he is not, the debtor will be liable to pay again, unless the person making the collection had authority to collect the sums due his principal, or the money actually reached the owner.

3. Such authority is not shown by proving occasional instances of receiving partial payments upon a promissory note, in each of which the person so doing produced the paper and entered the credit.

4. The defense of payment set up in the present case was not sustained by evidence, and consequently the court erred in not setting aside the verdict returned in favor of the defendant.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Wilcox county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Walton Guano Company against J. M. McCall and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hal Lawson and Eldridge Cutts, for plaintiff in error. J. L. Bankston and Bankston & Cannon, for defendants in error.

LEWIS, J. This was a suit brought in the county court of Wilcox county against the defendants upon a promissory note given for $256 for a certain quantity of guano bought by defendants from plaintiff. The suit was for a balance of $47.30 due on the note, besides interest and attorney's fees. Upon the note were divers credits, which seem to have reduced the principal amount to the amount sued for. To the suit an answer was filed, denying that there was anything due on the note, and claiming that defendants had fully paid to one Nasworthy, agent of plaintiff, besides the credits appearing on the note, the following items: January 5, 1895, tie timber, $42.57; March, 1895, 100 bushels cotton seed, $12.50; November, 1894, 17 cross-ties, $2.06. The case was appealed to the superior court of Wilcox county, and, after the evidence was introduced, the jury returned a verdict for defendants. Plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence, and excepts to the judgment of the court below overruling this motion. Plaintiff introduced in evidence the note sued upon, and closed its case. The testimony in behalf of defendants was substantially as follows: Nasworthy sold guano in 1894, and defendants bought guano from him, giving the note sued on. It seems that Nasworthy was an agent of plaintiff for the sale of guano. At various times defendants made payments to Nasworthy in property as shown by the credits on the note. These payments were credited on the note, and he always had the note when the payments were made. Defendants had never heard that plaintiff was engaged in buying and selling ties, and they did not know whether it was engaged in that business or not. In addition to the credits that appeared on the note, in the fall of 1894 or first of 1895 one of the defendants paid Nasworthy in cross-ties to the amount of $42.57, which he agreed to credit on the note, but he never did so. Nasworthy was at that time engaged in cutting and shipping cross-ties, and was buying cross-ties from others. He had these cross-ties cut. Defendants did not know that he expected to ship them to plaintiff. Another defendant testified that he paid Nasworthy 100 bushels of cotton seed at 12½ cents per bushel, who stated that he would credit the value of this cotton seed, to wit, $12.50, on the note. It was not known that the cotton seed was to be shipped to plaintiff. They were simply sold to Nasworthy, with an agreement on his part that they were to be credited upon the note. Another defendant testified that he paid Nasworthy 17 cross-ties at 18 cents each; that Nasworthy was at that time engaged in the cross-tie business. There was no agreement that these ties were to be shipped to plaintiff. They were simply bought by Nasworthy with an agreement that he would credit them on the note. The note was turned over to plaintiff's attorney for suit by Nasworthy.

1, 2, 3, 4. We do not think the evidence in this case was sufficient to sustain a verdict for the defendants. An agency to sell does not necessarily carry with it authority to collect. The evidence clearly established that the party with whom the defendant dealt was an agent of the plaintiff for the sale of its guano, but there is nothing in the testimony to show that he was its general agent to collect these debts. There was, however, proof that he had this note in his possession, and that he made the entry of credits which appear thereon. There is no dispute about these credits, but the fact that this agent had occasionally received partial payments upon a promissory note is not proof of his authority to receive the credits claimed in the defendants' answer to have been paid in addition to what appears on the note. It seems those payments were made by sales of property to Nasworthy for his individual use and purpose. There was no evidence that Nasworthy then had the note at all, or that the property ever reached the hands of the plaintiff, or was ever bought for the plaintiff. As a general rule, a special agent or attorney to collect a debt is not authorized to receive anything as a payment thereon except actual cash, and a payment to him by settling his individual debt or turning over property to be used by him would not be a payment to his principal. Kaiser v. Hancock, 106 Ga. 217, 32 S. E. 123; Hodgson v. Raphael, 105 Ga. 480, 30 S. E. 416; Sonnebom v. Moore, 105 Ga. 497, 30 S. E. 947; Bank v. Tuck, 96 Ga. 456, 23 S. E. 467; Mitchell v. Printup, 68 Ga. 677; Bostick v. Hardy, 30 Ga. 836. When these defendants, therefore, claim to have made payments on the note by selling to this agent for his individual use cross-ties and cotton seed, diligence would require of them to find out whether or not, to say the least of it, he had the note for collection at the time; and even this would not have bound the principal without some special authority given the agent to receive payments in this way. The evident purpose of defendants was to cancel the note by selling to the agent property for his own use, and not that of his principal, and, of course, without ratification of the principal, such method of payment would not constitute a valid credit upon the note. There was not only no evidence of the ratification by plaintiff of these payments insisted upon by defendants, but not even any proof that plaintiff had any knowledge that any such payments were ever made, or ever derived any benefit therefrom. See the case of De Vaughn v. McLeroy (Ga.) 10 S. E. 211, where it is said, "To bind a person by a ratification of an illegal or void act, it must be shown that such person had full knowledge, at the time of the alleged ratification, of the facts which make such act illegal or void." We therefore conclude that the defense of payment set up in the present case was not sustained by evidence, and the court erred in not setting aside the verdict returned in favor of defendants. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

WARD v. REASOR.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—ACQUITTAL—NOLLE PROSEQUI—DISMISSAL—COMPLAINT.

A complaint in an action for malicious prosecution which alleges, as the termination of such prosecution, that it was dismissed by a justice of the peace without hearing any evidence, is bad on demurrer; for such dismissal was equivalent to the entry of a nolle prosequi, which is not such an acquittal of the offense charged as will enable the defendant to maintain this action.

Error to circuit court, Lee county.

Action by one Ward against one Reasor for malicious prosecution. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Duncan & Hyatt and Bullitt & Kelly, for plaintiff in error. R. T. Irvine and Pennington Bros., for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This is a writ of error awarded the plaintiff in error to a judgment of the circuit court of Lee county rendered against him on behalf of the defendant in error in an action for malicious prosecution.

The sole question for decision is whether or not the court below erred in sustaining the defendant in error's demurrer to the declaration filed by the plaintiff in error.

There are two counts in the declaration, and it appears that the defendant in error on the —— day of ——, 1898, caused to be issued by one J. D. Ollinger, one of the justices of the peace in and for the county of Lee, a warrant charging the plaintiff in error with having feloniously stolen three certain hogs, the property of the defendant in error; that the plaintiff in error was arrested and brought before the said justice, who required him to give bond, with security, in the penalty of $300, for his appearance for trial before said justice, or such other justice of said county as might be then there on the —— day of ——, 1898; that the plaintiff in error on the day named appeared before one James Smith, another of the justices of the peace for the county of Lee, who, without hearing any evidence whatever as to the guilt or innocence of the plaintiff in error of the offense charged in the warrant, discharged him, and dismissed the warrant.

The ground upon which the demurrer was sustained is that the declaration does not sufficiently allege the termination of the prosecution; that is, that it ended in the final acquittal and discharge of the accused.

The allegation of the first count of the declaration on this subject is:

"Without the introduction of any testimony, the said defendant had the said justice to dismiss said warrant, and the said defendant has not further prosecuted his said complaint, but has deserted and abandoned the same, and the said complaint and prosecution is now wholly ended."

The allegation of the second count is: "The said defendant, without the introduction of any testimony against the plaintiff, and without giving to the said plaintiff the opportunity of defending himself against said false and malicious charge and showing his innocence therein, caused said plaintiff to be discharged, and not prosecuted for said offense."

Counsel for the plaintiff in error say that the action taken before the justice—the dismissal of the warrant—was equivalent to a nolle prosequi, and contend that it is a final determination of that prosecution, whereby this action may be maintained.

There are a number of decisions by courts of other states holding that a nolle prosequi is sufficient to maintain an action of malicious prosecution, but the text writers, as far as we have been able to investigate, hold the contrary view. Mr. Greenleaf (2 Greenl. Ev. § 452) says: "It must appear that the prosecution is at an end. If it was a criminal prosecution, it must appear that the plaintiff was acquitted of the charge. It is not enough that the indictment was ended by the entry of a nolle prosequi."

Burks, J., in Scott v. Shelor, 28 Grat. 891, quotes with approval 1 Hilliard on Torts: "Although an action cannot be maintained unless the plaintiff has been fully acquitted, and a nolle prosequi is not sufficient, the plaintiff is not bound to prove that he was acquitted by the jury promptly, without hesitation, delay, or deliberation."

The doctrine that the plaintiff must allege and prove that he was fully acquitted, and that a nolle prosequi is not sufficient, is sustained by our own eminent text writers. 4 Minor, Inst. 478; Bart. Law Prac. 183.

In Scott v. Shelor, supra, where there was a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff for a malicious prosecution, and the judgment was affirmed by this court, the opinion says: "To have warranted the verdict of the jury, it must have been proved on the part of the plaintiff—First, that the prosecution alleged in the declaration had been set on foot and conducted to its termination, and that it ended in the final acquittal of the plaintiff," etc. Womack v. Circle, 32 Grat. 335. In the last-named case a peace warrant had been sworn out by the defendant against the plaintiff, and, upon hearing the evidence adduced for and against the accused, the justice required her to enter into bond with security to keep the peace for one year; and she appealed to the county court, where the attorney for the commonwealth abandoned and dismissed the prosecution. Circle then instituted her suit against Womack for malicious prosecution, and obtained a verdict and judgment. Upon a writ of error to this court the judgment was set aside for misdirection of the jury by instructions, and a new trial awarded. It was said by Anderson, J., in the opinion: "The attorney for the commonwealth was not the arbiter of the guilt or innocence of the accused, and his opinion, however honestly formed, was not evidence of her guilt or innocence. A judgment so obtained, not upon evidence, but upon an abandonment of the prosecution by the commonwealth's attorney, could not establish the innocence of the plaintiff in this suit, and lay the foundation for this action. Much less would it show want of probable cause for the prosecution; and, it most probably having influenced the verdict of the jury, the judgment should be reversed on that ground."

The opinion cites Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 217, where it was held that a discharge from an indictment by a nolle prosequi is not sufficient to maintain an action of malicious prosecution, and that the mere abandonment of the prosecution, and the acquittal of the accused, are no evidence of a want of probable cause. The opinion in that case, by Shaw, C. J., says:

"It must appear, before this action will lie, that the defendant in the indictment has been fully acquitted."

Notwithstanding the warrant in the case at bar charges that the larceny committed was felonious, the justice before whom the accused (defendant in error) was brought for trial was clothed with power to convict or acquit him upon hearing the evidence. The offense charged in the warrant is a misdemeanor, under our statute; the word "feloniously" being used to characterize the intent with which the taking and carrying away were done,—a felonious intent being an essential ingredient in the crime of larceny, whether grand or petit, distinguishing it from a mere trespass. Wolverton v. Com., 75 Va. 911.

In this case, therefore, the justice, with full power, upon hearing the evidence, to convict or acquit the defendant in error of the charge made in the warrant, without hearing any evidence, dismissed the warrant and discharged him. This action amounted to no more than the assent of the justice to a cessation of the proceedings, without any examination whatever of the cause upon its merits. It was the equivalent of a nolle prosequi,—nothing more,—and could not establish the innocence of the defendant in error, nor show want of probable cause for the prosecution.

The case of Jones v. Finch, 84 Va. 207, 4 S. E. 342, very much relied on by counsel for defendant in error, was a similar action to this; and it was there held that a discharge of the accused, brought before a commissioner of the United States court upon the charge of robbing the United States mail (the commissioner being clothed with the power to send the accused on for trial or discharge him), was a sufficient termination of the prosecution to maintain an action of malicious prosecution; but the court, in reaching that conclusion, emphasizes the fact that the declaration alleged that the commissioner discharged the accused and dismissed the warrant upon hearing the evidence. That is not this case.

While the declaration here does allege that the prosecution upon which this action is founded "is now wholly ended," it is but an allegation of a conclusion of law, not warranted by the facts recited and upon which it is made. They do not convey the idea of trial and acquittal, but import only a cessation of the proceedings, without any examination whatever of the case upon its merits, and it was, therefore, no bar to the institution of another prosecution for the same offense. McCann v. Com., 14 Grat. 570.

We are of opinion that there is no error in the judgment complained of, and it is affirmed.

SANDS' ADM'R et al. v. DURHAM.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 28, 1900.)

PARTNERSHIP—JUDGMENTS—PAYMENT BY ONE PARTNER—SUBROGATION—PURCHASER—STATUTES.

1. Where one partner has paid judgments against the partnership, he is not entitled to subrogation to the security of the judgment, in the absence of an agreement of the partners creating the relation of principal and surety between them, since the partners are equally liable for partnership debts.

2. Where judgments against a partnership are paid by one partner without an agreement making him a surety for his co-partners, such judgment cannot be enforced by him against the property of a co-partner in the hands of a purchaser.

3. Code, § 2855, making partnership debts joint and several, does not change the rule that one partner who pays a partnership debt out of his private means is not entitled to be subrogated to the creditor's right without an agreement making him a surety for his co-partner.

Appeal from circuit court, Giles county.

Wysor & Gardner, for appellants. W. J. Henson and S. W. Williams, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. In the year 1886, John H. Durham, D. L. Whittaker, and D. A. Early formed a partnership for conducting a mercantile business in Giles county, under the style and firm name of D. L. Whittaker & Co. Whittaker furnished the capital of a stock of goods amounting to $3,000, which he was to get back out of the concern, and they were to be equal partners, dividing equally the profits and losses. The firm, after doing an unsuccessful business, dissolved in October, 1887, by selling out their stock of goods to one G. L. Bane. Judgments had been obtained against the firm, which were unpaid, and many outstanding claims not in judgment were also against the firm. The accounts, notes, etc., were turned over to J. H. Durham for collection. He collected all he could, and applied the collections to the firm debts, and the residue of the judgments against the firm he paid out of his own means. These judgments were duly docketed on the lien docket of Giles county court, and were not marked satisfied. Durham brought this suit in October, 1885, for a settlement of the partnership accounts, and not only to have contribution from his partners, Whittaker and Early, but to be subrogated to the lien of the judgments which he had paid out of his private means to the extent his partners might fall in arrears to him on settlement, and to subject the lands owned by Early at the time of the rendition and docketing of the judgments against the firm to the extent that Early might be indebted to him on the settlement. Early and wife having on the 5th of March, 1890, sold and conveyed to Mrs. Ann J. Sands three small tracts of land in Giles county, five-eighths of which belonged to Early, and the remaining three-eighths to his wife, complainant claimed the right by subrogation to subject the five-eighths interest in those lands, formerly owned by Early, to the payment of one-half of the judgments against the firm discharged by complainant out of his private means, amounting to $4,574.87; the other partner, Whittaker, being insolvent.

The circuit court decreed that Durham was entitled by subrogation to the rights of the judgment creditors whose judgments he had paid off, and subjected to the payment of one-half of them to Durham, not only the property owned by Early at the time of his death, but the five-eighths interest in the land which he had conveyed to Mrs. Sands in March, 1890. From this decree the administrator and heirs of Mrs. Sands, who had died, obtained an appeal to this court.

It is well settled that one partner who has paid out of his own means debts of a partnership of which he is a member may, upon a settlement of the partnership accounts, have contribution from the other partners of their due proportion of the debts so paid. It is also well settled that, where one in the situation of surety pays the debt of him who is primarily liable, equity will put him in the place of the creditor whose debt he has discharged, and give him the benefit of the securities which the creditor has obtained from the principal debtor, and, though no assignment is actually made, equity treats it as having been done. Grubbs v. Wysors, 32 Grat. 129.

Subrogation is the equity by which a person who is secondarily liable for a debt, and has paid the same, is put in the place of the creditor, so as to entitle him to make use of all the securities and remedies possessed by the creditor, in order to enforce the right of exoneration as against the principal debtor in the same rank with himself. To entitle a party to subrogation, his equity must be strong and his case clear. It is an equity called into existence for the purpose of enabling a party secondarily liable, but who has paid the debt, to reap the benefit of any securities which the creditor may hold against the principal debtor, and by the use of which the party paying may then be made whole. Bisp. Eq. 393. But says this learned author (page 396): "The principle of subrogation is a general one, and will apply to every instance (except in the case of a mere stranger) where one man has paid a debt for which another is primarily liable. The right will not, however, exist between parties who are equally bound; as, for example, co-partners, co-obligors, and co-contractors, except, of course, by virtue of a special contract. Such special contract may exist, for example, where an outgoing partner takes a covenant from the remaining members of the firm to pay the partnership debts and save him harmless. He stands, under these circumstances, in the position of a surety, and may be subrogated to the remedies of the creditor, if the covenant be not fulfilled."

A partner who retires from the firm, and for a valuable consideration is indemnified by the remaining partners against all debts and liabilities of the firm, will in equity be considered a surety for them, and subrogated to the rights of the creditor to whom he has been compelled to pay a firm debt. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 237. Among the authorities cited in support of this text is the case of Buchanan v. Clark, 10 Grat. 164.

In that case G., B. & K. were principal obligors in a bond. B. and K. put money in the hands of G. to pay the bond, and he bound himself to pay it, but failed to do so, and became insolvent. A judgment was recovered on the bond against the three, and B. paid it. After the judgment G. conveyed his land to S. to secure a debt due to him and another debt due to C. Upon a bill by B. and K. against S. and C. to subject the land conveyed in the deed to S. to satisfy the debt B. had paid, the court held that it was competent for G., B. & K. to contract that, as between themselves, G. should be the principal, and B. and K. his sureties, and that this had been done; that as between B., K., and G. the former were entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the judgment creditor upon the land; and that they were equally entitled as against purchasers from G., who did not show a better equity. The opinion of the court recognizes that partners ordinarily do not have the right of subrogation to the rights of the firm's creditor holding a security for a debt of the firm paid by one of the partners out of his own means, and puts its adjudication in that case whereby B. and K. were subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditor, whose judgment they paid, solely upon the ground that B. and K. and G. had contracted that, as between themselves, G. should be the principal, and B. and K. his sureties, in the debt; for the opinion says: "As between the partners and the creditor, they were all equally bound, and no understanding and agreement between themselves could change that relation so as to impair his right. But there was nothing in that relation which would prevent the partners, as between themselves, from assuming the relation of principal and securities."

The ground upon which some of the adjudicated cases hold that a partner of a losing concern, paying a debt of a lien creditor of the firm, cannot have subrogation to the rights of the creditor, is that payment by a co-principal extinguishes the debt, and leaves no right of subrogation. It is more accurately stated by Strong, J., in the well-considered case of McCormick's Adm'r v. Irwin, 35 Pa. St. 111, thus: "The reason why subrogation is not allowed to one partner as against his co-partner, or to one merely a joint debtor as against his co-debtor, is because, as between them, there is no obligation to pay the debt resting upon one superior to that which rests upon the other." See, also, Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 148, pt. 1, and Sheld. Subr. §§ 170, 171.

Counsel for appellee contends that the rule is changed by the statute (Code, § 2855) passed in 1849, whereby partnership debts are now joint and several; and also cites Morris' Adm'r v. Morris' Adm'r, 4 Grat. 293, in support of the further contention that, because the partnership debts are now joint and several, one partner who pays off the creditor's debt with his own private means is entitled to be subrogated to the creditor's right. That case only held that a surviving partner, having paid the partnership debts of a losing concern, is entitled to be substituted, for the amount that the estate of the deceased is indebted to him on that account, to the rights of the creditors of the firm whose debts he has paid; that is, the surviving partner paying the debts is entitled to share in the separate estate of the deceased partner. But this, as was said by Sheldon in his work on Subrogation (section 171, supra), is upon the ground that by virtue of the partnership agreement to contribute to losses the partner paying a firm debt out of his private property may in equity enforce contribution from his co-partner, rather than by way of subrogation. In other words, the doctrine of subrogation does not ordinarily apply as between co-partners, though the right exists to have contribution from each other, where one has paid out of his private means a debt of the firm, which is not repaid to him out of the social assets. To entitle a partner, paying out of his private means debts against the firm, to be subrogated to the rights of the creditors whose debts he has so paid, the relations ordinarily existing between co-partners must have been changed by an agreement between them whereby they assumed the relation of principal and surety. Buchanan v. Clark and other authorities, supra. There was no such agreement in the case at bar, and appellee was therefore not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the judgment creditors whose judgments against the firm of D. L. Whittaker & Co. he paid.

Much stress is laid by counsel for appellee upon the constructive notice to Mrs. Sands of the rendition and docketing of these judgments, and the actual notice she is claimed to have had when she bought the land from Early; but leaving out of view the testimony going to show that she was misled by the statements made by appellee to her agent, Hall, who purchased the land for her, and conceding that she had both constructive and actual notice of the judgments at the time of the purchase, it does not alter the case; for she may have actually known of the existence of the judgments on the docket, yet she also knew that they were judgments against the partnership of D. L. Whittaker & Co., that each member of the firm was primarily bound for their payment, and that appellee was solvent. The only risk she ran in taking a conveyance of Early's portion of the land from Early and wife was that the judgments would not be paid by the firm or either of the partners, and could not be made out of either of them. They, however, having been paid by appellant, without a special contract or agreement changing the relations ordinarily existing between co-partners, whereby he became surety for the other partners, are no longer enforceable on the lands alienated by Early to Mrs. Sands. Therefore the decree appealed from, in so far as it holds the contrary, is erroneous, and will be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for such further proceedings herein as may appear proper, in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

REPASS v. MOORE.

TAXATION—PAYING ANOTHER'S TAXES—SUBROGATION.

Where a county treasurer, without any previous request or subsequent promise of indemnity, voluntarily paid taxes on the land of another, he was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the state and county.

Appeal from circuit court, Wythe county.

Creditors' suit by J. Winton Repass and others against R. R. Moore. From a decree refusing to subrogate Repass to the rights of the state and county in delinquent taxes on defendant's land, he appeals. Affirmed.

C. B. Thomas and W. B. Kegley, for appellant. J. C. Wysor, for appellee.

KEITH, P. The case before us is the sequel of that reported in 96 Va. 147, 30 S. E. 458. Repass, who was treasurer of Wythe county, paid certain taxes due by Moore for the years 1884, 1885, 1886, and asked to be subrogated to the lien of the county and state. The case was then reversed and remanded to the circuit court, that Repass might be given an opportunity to prove his claim; the court being of opinion that, if he paid the taxes under circumstances which entitled him to be subrogated to the rights of the state and county, it would be gross injustice to shut him off from the opportunity of producing such proof.

The question before us has never been directly decided by this court. In Lipscomb's Adm'r v. Littlepage's Adm'r, 1 Hen. & M. 453, a sheriff who indulged the taxpayer, who in consideration thereof agreed to indemnify him by paying all damages which the commonwealth might recover in consequence of his failing in due time to pay the taxes into the treasury, recovered a judgment at law for such taxes, with lawful interest. The defendant in this judgment came into a court of equity alleging that the verdict at common law was obtained by surprise; that he could, as he thought, have satisfied the jury that nothing was due,—and he therefore prayed an injunction to the judgment, and for general relief. The chancellor, being of opinion that it was contrary to public policy to permit a sheriff to recover for taxes paid by him in order to indulge the taxpayer, perpetuated the injunction to the judgment. This decree was reversed in this court, consisting at the time of three judges, of whom Judge Tucker dissented in an earnest and able opinion. He considered the agreement on the part of the taxpayer to indemnify the sheriff for the indulgence extended him in the collection of taxes a contract in violation of public policy. "It is," said he, "destructive of the revenue, ruinous to all public creditors, pernicious to the public credit, and fatal to the energies of the commonwealth, under the greatest emergencies. The record accordingly exhibits a series of judgments against the high sheriffs for whom he acted, for upwards of 19,500 pounds,—an evil of sufficient magnitude to show the pernicious consequences of such illegal and nefarious contracts, if, indeed, such a one ever was made on the part of Lipscomb, of which there is no proof whatever. No court of equity that understood even the elements of its functions could sustain a suit founded on such a contract."

The majority of the court did not seem to controvert this view of the case, but rested their conclusion upon the fact that there had been a trial at law, in which this defense might have been made, and that no sufficient reason appeared why a court of equity should disturb the judgment then obtained.

A kindred question was presented in the case of Clevinger v. Miller, 27 Grat. 740. It was there held that a sheriff or other officer who pays an execution in his hands for collection, without an assignment at the time of the judgment or debt on which it is founded, is not entitled to be subrogated to the lien of the creditor whose debt he has paid, as against other creditors having judgment by liens or otherwise. Judge Staples, discussing the general doctrine of subrogation, states that, at law, payment extinguishes the debt and every security given for it; that a court of equity will interpose to keep alive the debt in certain cases; that a surety is subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the creditor, and entitled to enforce his liens, priorities, and means of payment. He points out that the doctrine of subrogation does not stand upon contract, express or implied, but upon principles of natural justice; that, as it is purely a creature of equity, it is only enforced in those cases where its application is just, and sanctioned by the obligations of good faith and sound policy. He declares at page 741 that "it is only enforced in behalf of sureties and others who are required to pay in order to protect their own interests, and never in favor of mere volunteers." He quotes with approval the language of Judge Marshall in Bank v. Winston, 2 Brock. 254, Fed. Cas. No. 944, who said: "There was no case in which the doctrine of subrogation has been enforced in favor of one not bound by the original contract, who discharged it as a volunteer. He would not say it might not be done, but, if it may, equity will consider all the circumstances, and impose equitable terms."

Judge Staples reviews a number of cases in other courts in which it has been held that "an officer charged with the collection of moneys due individuals or the government, who pays the taxes or debts of another person, cannot maintain an action to recover the same in the absence of a prior request or a subsequent promises"; and, upon a careful consideration of them, he concludes that a sheriff could not, in that case, be subrogated to the lien of the creditor, because there was no duty imposed upon him to pay the debt, nor any assignment to him by the creditor.

In Sherman's Adm'r v. Shaver, 75 Va. 1, Judge Burks, speaking of the principle of subrogation, says that it is very comprehensive, and is broad enough to include every instance where one pays a debt for which another is primarily liable, and that in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by him. He quotes with approval from the opinion in Wilkes v. Harper, 2 Barb. Ch. 338, where it is said: "Whereever one is liable in person or estate to a charge which ought to be borne primarily by another or his estate, the person first named will have the equity of a surety, and he is entitled to the securities and remedies of a creditor, as a means of carrying that equity into effect." Judge Burks then continues: "Under the influence of these liberal principles, which appear to me to be sound and just, I am not prepared to say that an officer, who, for default, has been compelled to pay the debt of another, is not in any case, under any circumstances, entitled to relief by subrogation as against the debtor alone. There may be cases in which no fraud is imputable to the officer, no moral turpitude of any description, no semblance of bad faith or even gross negligence; cases in which he is held simply for the failure to exercise the exact care and diligence which the law requires; cases, it may be, in which his liability has been incurred by honestly but indiscreetly reposing in the debtor a confidence which he knavishly abused to his own gain,—in which the parties are not in pari delicto. And yet, even in such cases, considerations of public policy may perhaps require the denial to the officer of any active assistance by the courts against the debtor, though the interests of third parties are not involved."

Every consideration of public policy which requires a sheriff to collect money due upon an execution in his hands, or to levy and sell, and pay the proceeds into court or to the plaintiff, or make prompt return upon it, applies with equal force to the officer whose duty it is to collect the taxes due to the commonwealth. The course which he should pursue is clearly marked out by the statute law. He is clothed with ample power to discharge it, and he and his sureties can incur no liability unless he is guilty of a voluntary deviation from the prescribed course of duty.

In the case before us the treasurer, without any previous request or subsequent promise of indemnity, with no assignment of the tax lien (if it be capable of assignment), voluntarily paid the tax which he now seeks to recover, into the treasuries of Wythe county and the state of Virginia. There was certainly no such duty imposed upon him by law. He was under no obligation whatever, and was bound in no degree or order, to pay or advance the taxes. It was his voluntary act, in derogation of the duty imposed upon him by law; and he is therefore not within the broadest and most comprehensive definition of the right of subrogation as stated by any text writer or decided case that has been brought to our attention. We will not undertake to say that a case may not arise in which the right of subrogation would be enforced for the protection of a collector of taxes. It is not necessary, and would therefore be unwise and improper, to do so. We prefer to walk in the path indicated by the decisions which we have cited, and refrain from adjudicating a question not involved in the controversy before us.

We are of opinion that the circumstances shown in evidence in this case do not warrant the relief for which appellant seeks, and the decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

PAYNE'S EX'RS v. HUFFMAN.

ASSIGNMENTS—ASSIGNEE—RECOURSE AGAINST REMOTE ASSIGNOR—DILIGENCE.

A solvent debtor lived ten years after the assignment of a trust deed conveying land in which he owned an interest. If the deed had been foreclosed promptly after the assignment, his interest in the fee would nearly have paid the debt secured thereby, and the balance could easily have been made out of his life estate. The assignee did nothing until two years later, when he accepted the debtor's note, payable in six months, in consideration of which a sale under the deed was postponed. Plaintiff, an indorser of the note, paid it some time after maturity, and took an assignment, but did not foreclose until about six years later. The debtor died before the sale, thus extinguishing the life estate; and, the proceeds of the sale of his interest in fee being insufficient to pay the debt, plaintiff filed a bill to recover the deficiency from the executors of his remote assignor, on the ground of failure of consideration. Held, in the absence of any agreement exempting either of the assignees from diligence in collecting the debt, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, since his loss resulted from his own and his immediate assignee's delay in enforcing the security.

Appeal from circuit court, Giles county.

Bill by Martin Huffman against the executors of W. A. Payne. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. J. Henson and J. M. Payne, for appellants. S. W. Williams, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Giles county.

In the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to consider the questions arising on the demurrer to the cross bill filed by appellee, so elaborately argued at bar.

The case is as follows: On the 16th day of September, 1878, John L. Sartin and wife executed a deed of trust to John A. Echols, trustee, conveying real estate in Giles county to secure and indemnify Charles H. Payne as surety for John L. Sartin on certain bonds executed by Sartin to one J. D. Johnson, commissioner. These bonds were paid by Payne, and he was proceeding to enforce the deed of trust when Sartin prevailed on one W. A. French to buy Payne's interest in the deed of trust (French paying Payne therefor $430.30), for the purpose of holding it up and giving Sartin more time; and on April 30, 1883, Payne assigned all right, title, and interest he had in the deed of trust to French, and French, as he had previously agreed to do, held up the deed some two years, when he caused the property to be advertised for sale under the deed. On the day of sale, Sartin and the appellee, Martin Huffman, made an agreement with French whereby Sartin was to execute to French a negotiable note for the amount claimed under the deed, with Huffman as indorser, payable six months after date, in consideration of which French was to postpone the sale under the deed until the maturity of the note; and it is alleged, though not clearly proved, that French agreed to assign his interest in the deed of trust to Huffman if the note should be paid at maturity by Huffman. Huffman did not pay off the note at maturity, but finally paid it, and on October 3, 1891, French assigned his interest in the deed to Huffman. In the meantime Charles H. Payne had died, and one Sibold had filed a bill and an amended bill in the circuit court of Giles county to subject to the payment of a judgment he had against John L. Sartin the land conveyed in the deed, making Sartin and wife, Payne's executors, Echols, trustee, French, and Huffman, parties defendant thereto. The bill alleged that, while Huffman claimed to be the owner of the trust deed, it was untrue, and that in fact the deed was no longer a valid lien on the land in question. Upon the bill taken for confessed, an account of liens on the land was ordered, and a commissioner reported that Sibold's judgment was the only lien on the land, and that the rental value of the land was $100 per annum, and that the rent would pay off the judgment in less than five years, which report was confirmed. Huffman, without having answered the bill filed by Sibold, or excepting to the commissioner's report, caused the land to be advertised for sale under the deed of trust; but the sale was stopped by an injunction obtained upon a bill filed by Sartin and wife, to which Huffman and Echols, trustee, were made parties defendant. Sibold's debt having been paid off, and John L. Sartin having died, a sale of the land was decreed for Huffman's benefit, and it was sold April 18, 1893; Huffman becoming the purchaser, at the price of $350. He then let the matter lie for four years, when he had the sale confirmed, and filed his cross bill in the first-named suit to have recourse on the executors of Charles H. Payne, his remote assignor, for the balance due on the debt he claimed was secured to him by the trust deed, after crediting the net proceeds from the sale of the land; and the court decreed in his favor against Payne's executors for this alleged balance, amounting to over $500.

The record shows that the deed of trust was valid as to one-sixth interest in the estate conveyed, and as to the life interest of John L. Sartin in the other five-sixths, and that even the rental value of the land was worth $100 per annum, so that, if these interests of John L. Sartin in the land had been subjected in his lifetime (certainly within a reasonable time after the assignment by Payne to French), the debt secured by the deed would have been paid in full; and even if the one-sixth interest had been subjected immediately after the assignment by Payne, and it had only brought the price it finally sold for, and the proceeds applied then to the debt, they would have nearly extinguished it. But there was a delay of nearly ten years. In the meantime John L. Sartin's life estate in five-sixths of the land was diminishing in value by reason of his advancing age, and finally extinguished by his death; and no sort of effort is shown to have been made to make the money out of the personal estate owned by Sartin, in his lifetime, or after his death.

We leave out of view the question whether or not, by the extension of time given by both French and Huffman to Sartin, Charles H. Payne was released from all liability to either of them on the assignment by him of his interest in the deed of trust; for, while no amount of passive indulgence will relieve an absolute surety, the contract of a guarantor of collection and of an assignor is very different from that of a surety. Due diligence must be used to charge either a guarantor or an assignor. The assignee being entitled to recover of the assignor on the ground of failure of consideration, it will devolve on him to show, unless by agreement it be otherwise arranged, that he used due diligence to collect the debt of the debtor, and used it in vain. What is due diligence is not susceptible of a precise definition. An immediate suit, duly followed up by an execution, etc., is always due diligence, even though it may not be the surest way to make the money. Still, immediate suit is not indispensable, if the assignee can show that, by reason of the debtor's insolvency or otherwise, a suit would have been unavailing. 3 Minor, Inst. 437, pt. 1, and authorities there cited. Says this learned author: "Two years' delay to sue will discharge the assignor in all cases, unless the debtor be insolvent, or the assignee be exempt by agreement from the obligation of diligence." Thompson v. Govan, 9 Grat. 695; 2 Rob. Prac. (2d Ed.) 276, 277.

In the case at bar there is not only a total absence of an agreement exempting either French or appellee, Huffman, from the obligation of diligence, and of allegation or proof of the insolvency of John L. Sartin during the eight years he lived after the assignment by Payne to French, but, on the contrary, the record clearly shows, as we have seen, that, if the deed of trust had been with promptness enforced, the one-sixth interest in the land conveyed would have nearly paid the debt secured and that, if any effort had been made, within a reasonable time, to collect of Sartin the balance, if any, of the debt secured by the deed, it could have been made out of Sartin's life estate in the five-sixths interest in the land owned by his wife, if not out of his personal estate, as this life estate or usufruct in Sartin is shown to have been worth $83.33 per annum, which, added to the one-sixth interest in the land owned by Sartin in fee, would have, in 1883, and for several years thereafter, more than repaid the amount paid Payne by French.

Appellee has not shown, and it is manifest that he could not show, that no loss or damage has resulted from his or his immediate assignor's lack of diligence. As was said by Staples, J., in Wilson's Adm'r v. Barclay's Ex'r, 22 Grat. 542,—a case very similar to the case at bar: "Under such circumstances, a court of equity should refuse to afford a remedy, though no statute of limitations may directly affect the right of recovery."

We are of opinion to reverse the decree appealed from, and this court will enter such decree as the circuit court should have entered; dismissing appellees' cross bill, with costs to appellant.

CROCKETT v. GRAYSON.

BROKER—SALES—COMMISSIONS.

1. Defendant agreed with plaintiff that if plaintiff could sell defendant's land he would give plaintiff all he obtained therefor over $11,000. Thereafter, through efforts of plaintiff, S. agreed with defendant to give him about $10,000 for the land, and pay liens on the property, which defendant represented amounted to $4,000, but S. reserved the right to declare the agreement void if the liens were of greater amount. They did exceed $4,000, and S. avoided the agreement. Held, that defendant was not liable to plaintiff for the difference between $11,000 and $14,000.

2. Defendant could not be held liable to plaintiff for the difference on the ground that the sale was lost through a misrepresentation of the vendor, as defendant's representation as to the liens did not damage plaintiff, since, if not made, S. would not have made the agreement.

Action by J. R. Crockett against Charles Grayson. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Fulton and J. J. A. Powell, for plaintiff in error. S. W. Williams and F. Kegley, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. The defendant in error, wishing to dispose of a tract of land lying in Bland county, entered into a contract with the plaintiff in error as follows:

"This contract, made and entered into between Charley Grayson of the first part and J. R. Crockett of the second part, is that J. R. Crockett is to have all, over and above eleven thousand dollars, he can sell seven hundred acres of the said Grayson's farm, including all of the cleared land, and balance of the seven hundred acres is timbered land adjoining the cleared land. Witness my hand and seal this April 22d, 1896. Charles Grayson. [Seal.]"

Acting under this authority, Crockett entered into a negotiation with William H. Spiller, which resulted in an agreement between Grayson and Spiller, in which the latter agreed to purchase 700 acres of land from Grayson, with the buildings, improvements, and growing crop of hay thereon, and to pay for the same the sum of $14,000, as follows: About $10,000 to be paid by Spiller in property belonging to him in the town of Wytheville, and certain notes due to him secured upon real estate; and the contract then provides "that the said W. H. Spiller is to assume for payment for said Grayson the sum of four thousand dollars, which the said Grayson represents as being the whole amount of the liens against the said property hereby sold the said Spiller, and which said sum the said Grayson states will give a clear title to the land hereby sold; but if the amount of liens, by judgment or otherwise, against the said Grayson, exceeds the sum of four thousand dollars, then the said Spiller is at liberty to declare this agreement null and void."

This contract was duly executed by Grayson and Spiller. When the attorney for Spiller came to examine the title, it was ascertained that the liens upon Grayson's land amounted to more than $40,000; and thereupon Spiller exercised the right which he had reserved to himself under his contract, and declared the agreement entered into with Grayson null and void. Crockett brought suit upon his covenant with Grayson to recover the compensation to which he conceived himself to be entitled. He demands in his declaration the sum of $3,000, being the amount in excess of $11,000 which Spiller had agreed to pay. There was a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the case is before us upon a writ of error.

There is no question here as to Crockett having been employed to make the sale, nor as to the compensation to which he would have been entitled had his undertaking been performed. The sole question is, does it appear from the evidence that he has negotiated a sale which entitles him, in accordance with a just construction of the terms of his employment, to the stipulated compensation?

It is true that, owing to the efforts of plaintiff in error, Spiller was induced to enter into a contract for the purchase of the land in question upon terms satisfactory to Grayson; but that, we conceive, is not sufficient, for that contract contained a provision by virtue of which Spiller reserved to himself the privilege of annulling it if a fact was made to appear over which Grayson had no control. It was a fact that the liens upon Grayson's land amounted to more than $4,000. They approach, as appears from the record, the sum of $40,000. From this fact there was no escape, and its existence, by the very terms of contract by which Crockett induced the b and seller to make the agreement, and for procurement of which he demands compe tion, gave to Spiller the absolute and unq tioned right to avoid it at his pleasure. G son seems to have been anxious to cons mate this contract. He made every effo induce Spiller to abide by it. There is dence in the record tending to show th greater part of the liens against him were parent, rather than real. There is evid tending to show that very little more $4,000 would have satisfied the debts w constituted the liens upon Grayson's la for which he was primarily liable; but contract procured through the agency of plaintiff in error reserved to Spiller the p lege of annulling his liability under it, this privilege he saw fit to exercise.

A real-estate broker, to be entitled to pensation, must complete the sale. He find a purchaser in a situation ready willing to complete the purchase upon terms agreed upon, before he is entitle his commissions. When he has found a purchaser who has entered into a contract, his right to compensation ca be defeated by the fault of the seller, by misrepresentation, or by his whimsica unreasonable refusal to comply with contract. McGavock v. Woodlief, 20 H 221, 15 L. Ed. 884; Kock v. Emmerling How. 69, 16 L. Ed. 292; Tombs v. Alexa 101 Mass. 255; and Mechem, Ag. § 86 seq.

It is claimed in this case that Cro found a purchaser who entered into a tract in exact accordance with instruc which he received from his principal, Ch Grayson; and in one view of it, this is Grayson was ready to sell his property $14,000, and Spiller was able to pay fo The terms of payment were agreed upon a contract signed; but, as we have see that contract there was a right reserve which it was subsequently defeated. contention of Crockett upon this poi that it was defeated by the misrepres tion of Grayson, and that therefore entitled to the compensation for whic had contracted.

There are, perhaps, cases in which a ker may be entitled to compensation w a negotiation for the sale of real estate been broken off by reason of a misrepr tation made by the seller. Such a ca referred to in Mechem on Agency, but authority is not accessible to us. It fundamental principle that the frau which one complains must be accomps by damage to constitute a cause of ac It is true that Grayson represented $4,000 would satisfy the liens upon his l and this statement appears to have bee true; but it is plain that, so far as i fects Crockett's right to recover in thi tion is concerned, it did not injure hi the least degree, for, if the representation had not been made, Spiller would never have entered into the agreement. Had Grayson disclosed the precise state of the record with respect to the liens upon his property, it is safe to say that the negotiation between himself and Spiller would at once have ended.

We do not deem it necessary to enter into a critical examination of the instructions given and refused upon the trial, for upon the facts presented to the jury they could not, with propriety, have found any other verdict than that at which they arrived.

We are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

WISE v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 21, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—DESTROYING FENCE—PROOF OF CLAIM—VERBAL PURCHASE —BONA FIDES.

1. Under Code, § 3729, providing that if any person shall unlawfully, but not feloniously, destroy or injure property not his own, he shall be subject to a fine, where defendant was accused of unlawfully tearing down the fence of the prosecutor, evidence that, according to a survey made on the prior transfer of the farm now owned by the defendant, the boundary line was found at one point to extend slightly onto the land of the prosecutor, and the grantee in such transfer took such title to the disputed land as the grantor possessed, which the grantee subsequently conveyed to the defendant, was admissible to show that defendant acted in good faith.

2. Where defendant was accused of unlawfully tearing down the fence of the prosecutor, to refuse an instruction that if the defendant tore down the fence under a claim of right, believing it to be his own, then the jury should find for the defendant, was erroneous.

Error to Washington county court.

John Wise was unlawfully convicted of tearing down a fence, and he brings error. Reversed.

J. J. Stuart, for plaintiff in error. A. J. Montague, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

KEITH, P. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the county court of Washington county, sentencing Wise to pay a fine of five dollars for unlawfully tearing down and leaving open a fence of one H. A. Mann.

Section 3729 of the Code provides: "If any person unlawfully, but not feloniously, take and carry away, or destroy, deface, or injure any property, real or personal, not his own, * * * he shall be fined not less than five nor more than five hundred dollars."

In support of his plea of "not guilty," prisoner offered to show that the land upon which he resided had formerly belonged to White, who sold to Counts. When a view was made with a view to the making of a deed to Counts by White, the lines of the survey were run at one point upon land claimed by H. A. Mann, the prosecutor in this case. He making objection, White said to Counts that he would not convey to him any part of the disputed land, not because he meant to abandon any right he had, but because he did not consider the subject worthy of controversy, but at the same time agreed verbally with Counts to transfer to him any claim he might have to the parcel of land in dispute. Counts sold to Lilly, and Lilly to Mitchell, the immediate grantor of the prisoner. At the trial the prisoner offered, but was not permitted, to prove by Counts that this verbal contract with respect to the disputed land had been transferred to him. It is not pretended, of course, that this verbal contract or understanding passed title, but it does bear upon the bona fides of a claim of right asserted by the prisoner, and should have been admitted.

The prisoner asked the court to instruct the jury as follows: "The court instructs the jury, if they believe from the evidence that the defendant, John Wise, pulled down the fence and left it down under a claim of right, believing it to be his own, and believing that he had a bona fide right thereto, then the jury shall find for the defendant."

This instruction propounds the law correctly, and should have been given. Ratcliffe's Case, 5 Grat., at page 658; 2 Whart. Cr. Law, § 1072a. The county court seems to have recognized this principle in the instruction which it gave, and it might have been unnecessary to have reversed its judgment upon this ground if it stood alone; but, as the case must go back for a new trial on account of the error committed in the exclusion of evidence, it will be proper, upon a subsequent trial, to give the instruction as requested by the prisoner.

The other objections are not well taken.

The judgment of the county court must be reversed, and a new trial awarded.

VIRGINIA & TENNESSEE COAL & IRON CO. v. McCLELLAND et ux.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 28, 1900.)

HOMESTEAD—DEED—HUSBAND AND WIFE—VENDEE—STATUTES.

1. Under Code, § 3634, providing that real estate set apart as a homestead shall not be aliened by the householder, if a married man, except by the joint deed of himself and wife, a deed of the homestead by the husband alone is void, and conveys nothing to the grantee.

2. Const. art. 11, which gives the homestead right, gives the general assembly power to provide on what conditions the head of a family shall hold such homestead, but restrains the assembly from impairing or defeating the benefits intended to be conferred by that article of the constitution. Held, that Code, § 3634, providing that the homestead of a married man shall not be aliened except by the joint deed of himself and wife, is not an unreasonable restriction of the power of alienation of the homestead, and does not impair the benefits intended to be given by the constitution.

Appeal from circuit court, Wise county.

Suit by M. L. McClelland and Frances E. McClelland, his wife, to set aside a deed from M. L. McClelland to O. Barrett, Jr., and one from O. Barrett, Jr., to the Virginia & Tennessee Coal & Iron Company. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fulton & McDowell and D. D. Hull, Jr., for appellant. R. T. Irvine, for appellees.

HARRISON, J. In 1883, M. L. McClelland, a householder and head of a family, executed and had recorded his deed, describing a certain tract of about 100 acres of land, and claiming the benefit of the same as a homestead, pursuant to the provisions of the statute in such cases made and provided.

In 1886, being still a householder and head of a family, he made a deed, in which his wife did not unite, conveying the coal and timber in and upon the land, theretofore claimed as a homestead, to O. Barrett, Jr. Subsequently, O. Barrett, Jr., sold and conveyed the same to the appellant.

This suit is brought by M. L. McClelland and Frances E. McClelland, his wife, seeking to have set aside and declared void the deed from M. L. McClelland to O. Barrett, Jr., and also the deed from the latter to appellant. In support of the prayer of their bill, appellees rely upon section 3634 of the Code, which, so far as now material, reads as follows:

"The real estate, set apart as aforesaid, shall not be mortgaged, encumbered, or aliened by the householder, if a married man, except by the joint deed of himself and his wife."

There was no error in overruling the demurrer to the bill. No reason has been assigned in its support, and we see no ground for sustaining it. The chief contention of appellant is that the statute (Code, § 3634) is unconstitutional, because contrary to the express language of the constitution, and contrary to the intent of its framers; the argument being that the statute puts a check upon the free alienation of the homestead, and thereby impairs the benefits intended to be secured by the constitution.

Article 11 of the constitution, in so far as now material, reads as follows:

"Section 1. Every householder or head of a family shall be entitled * * * to hold exempt from levy, seizure, garnishing or sale, under any execution, order or other process, * * * his real and personal property, or either, * * * to the value of not exceeding two thousand dollars to be selected by him."

"Sec. 5. The general assembly shall, at its first session under this constitution, prescribe in what manner and on what conditions the said householder or head of a family shall thereafter set apart and hold for himself and family, a homestead out of any property hereby exempted. * * * But this section shall not be construed as authorizing the general assembly to defeat or impair the benefits intended to be conferred by the provisions of this article."

"Sec. 7. The provisions of this article shall be construed liberally, to the end that all the intents thereof may be fully and perfectly carried out."

We cannot concur in the view that the legislature has gone beyond its power in enacting that the real estate set apart as a homestead shall not be aliened by the householder, if a married man, except by the joint deed of himself and wife. By section 5 of the article under consideration, the broadest powers are given the legislature in the matter of prescribing the conditions upon which the homestead should be set apart and held. The restriction placed by section 3634 upon the right to alien real estate set apart as a homestead is not unreasonable, and does not impair the benefits intended to be secured by the constitution. The manifest purpose of the constitution was to secure the family a home, notwithstanding the misfortune of the husband, and it tends in a high degree to accomplish that object to provide that real estate set apart as a homestead shall not be aliened except by the joint deed of the husband and wife.

The learned counsel for the appellant has pressed with much earnestness the view that to declare valid section 3634 is to hold that the framers of the constitution, in drafting article 11, had two irreconcilable intents. The ground of this argument is that in holding the statute, now carried into section 3647, to be a valid exercise of legislative power, this court has held that the constitutional intent was to give the holder of the homestead the unrestrained power of alienation. Reed v. Bank, 29 Grat. 719.

The right to waive the benefit of the homestead exemption in a bond, bill, note, or other instrument is expressly given by section 3647, and the single question decided in the case cited was whether a householder or head of a family had a right under the constitution to waive the benefit of the exemption. The court held that the statute was constitutional, and that the householder or head of a family had the right to waive the benefit of his homestead exemption in the manner prescribed by the statute. The court said that there was neither an express nor implied prohibition of a waiver of the homestead exemption in the constitution, nor was there any interdiction of the powers of the legislature to provide for such a waiver, or the mode in which it may be exercised. As already stated, the legislature is given very broad power and discretion by article 11 in the matter of prescribing the conditions upon which the homestead shall be set apart and held, and we see no sufficient reason why it could not provide, as a basis of credit, that the householder might in a bond, note, or other instrument waive the exemption, and at the same time provide, as a means of protecting, to some extent, the family, that in the case of real estate set apart as a homestead it should not be alienated except by the wife uniting with the husband in the conveyance. It must be remembered that when a householder takes the benefit of the homestead exemption he not only impairs the rights of his creditors, but he surrenders at the same time some of his own rights. He takes the property set apart upon the terms prescribed as the conditions upon which he is permitted to hold it. He is not compelled to take the homestead, but, if he does, the benefit secured is to free the property selected from the attack of his creditors, and in return for this benefit the statute requires him to surrender his former dominion over the land set apart, only to the extent of providing that he cannot alien the same except by his wife uniting with him in the conveyance. In Hatorff v. Wellford, 27 Grat. 356, Judge Staples says that the policy which dictated these homestead exemptions was suggested by considerations both of a political and a benevolent character; "benevolent, because the possession of the homestead is the security of the family against the improvidence, the follies, and the imprudences of the husband or father." This benevolent intent has been carried out in a meager way, for it is a very small protection to the family against the improvidence and follies of the husband to limit his power of alienation only to the extent provided by section 3634. If any conflicting intent is attributed to the framers of the constitution by the decision construing section 3647, and the view here taken of section 3634, it is more apparent than real. Certainly, there is no such conflict as would warrant this court in holding unconstitutional a statute so plainly valid and reasonable as that now before us. We invoke here for our guidance the same rule laid down in Reed v. Bank, supra, that "upon the most familiar principles, repeatedly declared by the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, and by the supreme courts of all the states, and by none more emphatically than by this court, every statute is presumed to be constitutional. It cannot be declared by the courts to be otherwise, unless it be made clearly so to appear. The whole lawmaking power is vested in the legislature, which is omnipotent unless restricted by the express or implied provisions of the state or national constitution."

It is further contended that while section 3634 forbids, it does not invalidate, a conveyance made by the householder alone; that such a deed is not declared by the statute to be void or voidable; and that the statute is to be strictly construed, and nothing can be added to it by intendment.

Homestead statutes are always construed liberally, in order that their purpose may be more certainly accomplished. Section 7 of the article of the constitution now under consideration expressly provides that the provisions of said article "shall be construed liberally, to the end that all the intents thereof may be fully and perfectly carried out." The framers of the constitution are presumed to have known the general rule of interpretation now contended for, and it is a most reasonable presumption that they inserted section 7 into article 11 in order to prevent the application of that rule to the statutes enacted for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of that article. Further, the legislature must have had in mind the constitutional provision for a liberal construction of these statutes when it enacted section 3634, and therefore knew that it was not necessary to declare such a deed as that in question void; otherwise, why should the section have been enacted at all? To give the statute the construction contended for would make it nugatory, and defeat the plain purpose of the legislature. To hold that the householder cannot convey the land set apart, except the wife unite in the conveyance, and then to hold that if he does do it the deed must be held valid, would destroy the law. The only way to carry out the legislative intent is to hold the deed of the husband solus void. This construction is, we think, amply justified by the language of the section and the constitution.

It is further contended that M. L. McClelland owned the land in question in fee simple, and that, inasmuch as the homestead estate must expire after the death of McClelland and his wife and the majority of his youngest child (section 3635), the deed should not be held void as to the remaining or underlying estate, but should be held to operate as an alienation of such right or interest therein as the grantor might lawfully convey. The fallacy of this position is found, we think, in the assumption that there is an estate remaining after or underlying the homestead that the husband can lawfully convey. The "homestead estate" is a unit. It does not consist of a life estate in the land with remainder over. The claimant, when the law is complied with, gets the whole estate in the land, and it is the entire estate thus acquired that he is forbidden to alien, except his wife join in the deed. It would greatly impair the benefits intended to be secured by the constitution were any part or interest in this estate to be vested in the appellant under the deed in question. If appellant held a vested interest, to take effect upon the death of the husband and wife and the majority of the youngest child, the estate created by the law would be greatly depreciated in value. The husband has a right, the wife uniting, to sell and convey the homestead estate, or to consume such estate in any other way recognized by the law. He would be deprived of this right, because unable to make title, if a remaining or underlying part of the homestead was vested in appellant. We conclude, therefore, that no right or interest has been acquired by appellant under the deed in question that the grantor could lawfully convey.

For these reasons, the decree complained of is affirmed.

FRY et al. v. STOWERS et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 28, 1900.)

DISPUTED TRACT—PARTIAL ADVERSE POSSESSION—EJECTMENT—PAROL DISCLAIMER—ADMISSIONS AS EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS NOT CONFLICTING—VERDICT—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE—APPEAL—EXCESSIVE RECOVERY—INACCURATE DISCLAIMER—NEW TRIAL—IMPOSITION OF TERMS—DISPOSITION ON APPEAL.

1. Where a senior claimant is in actual possession of land, and a junior claimant to a portion thereof enters on and incloses a part only of the interlock, and holds his inclosure adverse to the senior claimant, such adverse possession will confer title on the junior claimant only to so much of the interlock as he actually occupies, and will not be extended to embrace constructively all of the disputed portion, as against the actual occupancy of the senior claimant.

2. Instructions in an ejectment suit that disclaimer of title can only be made by deed or court record, and that while a parol disclaimer is ineffectual, yet a solemn admission by the landowner in regard to the boundary disputed is entitled to the same weight in evidence as in any other case, are not in conflict, and it is not error to give them both.

3. Where a verdict settling a boundary dispute is rendered on conflicting evidence, it will not be disturbed on appeal.

4. Where plaintiff in ejectment recovers an excessive verdict, and judgment is rendered accordingly, a disclaimer entered of record in court, which fails to accurately describe the excess, will not prevent the granting of a new trial, or the imposition of terms on plaintiff to execute an accurate release in order to avoid a new trial.

5. Where, in ejectment involving a boundary dispute, plaintiff recovered a verdict for the entire interlock, and judgment was rendered accordingly, and it was conceded that defendant had gained title by adverse possession to a portion of the interlock, it was error not to grant defendant's motion for a new trial unless plaintiff should release such portion; the practice of imposing terms on the party achieving an excessive recovery as a condition for refusing a new trial being applicable to ejectment equally with other actions, notwithstanding the verdict fixes the boundaries of the land recovered.

6. Where plaintiff in ejectment has recovered an excessive verdict and judgment, the judgment will be reversed on appeal, with direction to award a new trial unless plaintiff will release on the record, by proper description, the excess recovered.

Error to circuit court, Bland county.

Action by one Stowers and others against one Fry and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants bring error. Reversed, with directions.

J. H. Fulton, for plaintiffs in error. S. W. Williams and F. Kegley, for defendants in error.

HARRISON, J. This is an ordinary action of ejectment. The land in controversy is an interlock of grants. The plaintiff claims under a grant from the commonwealth to Daniel Robinett in the year 1808, and the defendant under three grants from the commonwealth to James Devor, dated, respectively, in 1826, 1840, and 1842.

It appears that the plaintiff has been in the actual possession of the land embraced in the patent under which he claims for many years, having cleared and cultivated a large part thereof and built a house thereon. It further appears that, while the plaintiff was thus in the actual possession of the land covered by the Robinett patent, the defendant, whose later grant overlapped that of the plaintiff, entered upon and inclosed a small part of the interlock created by the overlap, and held the same adversely to the plaintiff for the statutory period. It is conceded by the plaintiff that the defendant is entitled, by reason of his entry and adversary possession, to so much of the interlock as may be within the actual inclosure made by him, but that his right extends no further than the limits of such inclosure. On the other hand, the defendant contends that, by virtue of his inclosure of part of the interlock, his right extends to the limits of his grant, and includes the whole of the interlock. The contention of the parties is presented by instructions Nos. 1, 2, 5, and 7 given for the plaintiff, and No. 5 asked for by the defendant and refused. The question presented, though much discussed, has never been settled in this state.

It is very clearly stated by Judge Buchanan in Stull v. Iron Co., 92 Va. 253, 23 S. E. 293, to be this: "Does the adverse possession of a claimant under a junior title extend to the whole of his tract, or only to the extent of his inclosures, where there are conflicting grants or deeds to lands causing an interlock, the claimant under the older title being in actual possession of a part of his land outside of the interlock when the claimant under the junior title entered upon and took actual possession of a part of the interlock, claiming title to the whole extent of his boundary?"

Much has been said by judges and learned writers upon this question. It would, however, add nothing to the value of this opinion to review the authorities, or repeat here what has been so well said by others. In the decisions of our own state, as well as learned articles in our Law Register, all has been said by way of discussion that need be said. Proceeding, then, directly to a decision of the question presented, we are of opinion that where a senior patentee settles upon any portion of his land, claiming title to the whole, whether inside or outside of the interlock, before the junior patentee has settled upon any part of the interlock, the senior patentee is in possession to the extent of his grant, and a subsequent entry of the junior patentee upon the interlock only ousts the senior patentee to the extent of the land actually in the occupancy of the junior patentee by residence, improvement, cultivation, or other open, notorious, and habitual acts of ownership.

The conclusion reached is supported by the better reason, and is in accordance with the great weight of authority.

It follows, from what has been said, that there was no error in giving instructions Nos. 1, 2, 5, and 7 for the plaintiff, nor in refusing instruction No. 5 asked for by the defendant.

It is further objected that instruction No. 3 given for the plaintiff is in conflict with instruction No. 8 given for the defendant, and should not have been given.

We are of opinion that both instructions correctly state the law and were properly given. The instruction for the defendant told the jury that a disclaimer of a legal title could only be made by deed or by record in court, and the instruction for the plaintiff informs the jury that while there can be no parol disclaimer of title to land, still, where the owner of land makes a solemn admission in regard to a disputed question of location or boundary, or in regard to the time, location, and existence of a disputed corner, then such admissions are entitled to the same weight in an ejectment case that would be given to them by the jury in any other case. There is no conflict between the two instructions. That for the plaintiff admits the correctness of the instruction for the defendant, and propounds, in addition, a sound proposition touching the weight of admissions as to a disputed boundary or corner.

Instruction No. 8 given for the plaintiff is objected to upon the ground that there was no evidence tending to support it. We think the record in the trespass case, which was introduced by the plaintiff without objection, and read to the jury, was sufficient to justify this instruction.

The last assignment of error is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence.

The real controversy before the jury was the true boundary lines of the Robinett patent, under which the plaintiff Stowers claimed. Upon this question the evidence was conflicting. The jury have established the true lines to be as contended for by the plaintiff, and upon well-settled principles the verdict must stand, unless some other valid objection can be shown thereto. The record shows that the verdict was in favor of the plaintiff for the entire tract within the boundary of the Robinett survey. This included the whole interlock, whereas, as already seen, the defendant Fry was entitled to that portion of the interlock actually inclosed and occupied by him. The court rendered its judgment in accordance with this verdict.

After the judgment was entered, the plaintiff appeared in court, and, by order entered of record, released and disclaimed title in favor of the defendant to that portion of the land within the interlock which was in the actual inclosure and occupancy of the defendant. This release, if accurate, would have accomplished the ends of justice, and secured to the defendant all of his rights. It is, however, contended that this disclaimer does not accurately describe such inclosure, and that the error of the court in giving judgment for the whole cannot now be corrected, and that the verdict of the jury must therefore be set aside and a new trial awarded.

It does not clearly appear from the record what the area of the defendant's inclosure is. It was certainly very small,—less, probably, than an acre. Its trifling value, no doubt, caused no importance to be attached to it except as a basis for claiming the entire interlock, and hence the failure to refer to it in the verdict.

New trials being addressed to the discretion and authority of the court, in order to prevent a material and manifest injustice, the court, as the alternative of a new trial, may impose terms upon the party, requiring him to consent to such a modification of the verdict as will meet the substantial justice of the case. So, the new trial may be limited to a single point, as to a single issue in the case or a particular question, without reopening the whole case, or even, it seems, as to part of the demand sued for, letting the judgment stand for the residue. The new trial may be granted upon any terms which, in the discretion of the court, shall seem requisite to achieve the ends of justice in the particular case. 4 Minor, Inst. pt. 1, p. 930, and the cases there cited.

We do not approve the rule announced in Shiflet v. Dowell, 90 Va. 745, 19 S. E. 848, that the principle stated does not apply in the case of an action of ejectment, because of the statute which requires that the verdict shall "specify the land, particularly as the same is proved, and with the same certainty of description as is required in the declaration." The practice of putting a party upon terms where the verdict is plainly erroneous in part is a wise and salutary one, saving delay, costs, and, above all, ending strife; and we perceive no good reason why the ends of justice are not as much subserved by the application of the principle in an action of ejectment as in any other case.

In 1 Grah. & W. New Tr. p. 609, it is said: "It may be safely asserted that no case can occur, presenting circumstances, timely addressed to the court, in which the rights of the parties may not be fully protected by the imposition of conditions meeting the exigency."

We are therefore of opinion that the court, before entering its judgment, should have put the plaintiff upon terms, so as to have excluded from his recovery that part of the interlock in the actual inclosure of the defendant.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed, and the case remanded, with directions that unless the plaintiff will release on the record, by proper description, that portion of the interlock in the actual possession of the defendant, the verdict be set aside and a new trial awarded; but, if the plaintiff accepts the terms prescribed and makes such release, the motion for a new trial shall be overruled, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, with costs. Buena Vista Co. v. McCandlish, 92 Va. 297, 23 S. E. 781.

The defendant in error, being the party substantially prevailing in this court, is entitled to recover his costs.

1. Where a bond is executed pursuant to a decree in chancery requiring it in order to stay the issuance of an injunction, the fact that the bond does not conform to the requirements of the decree is not ground for demurrer to a declaration on the bond, since the obligation does not derive its efficacy from the decree, but, to determine the liability of the parties, the court must look to the instrument alone.

2. Parties executing a bond in pursuance of a decree in chancery requiring it in order to stay the issuance of an injunction are afterwards estopped to deny the recitals of the bond in a suit thereon, though they contradict the chancery record.

3. Where, to a declaration on a bond, the plea of non est factum was interposed, together with certain special pleas setting up defenses which were also available under the general issue, and the record shows that defendant introduced evidence pertaining to the special defenses under the general issue, it was not error to reject the special pleas.

4. Where, in a suit on a bond given to stay injunction proceedings, the defense relied on is that defendants signed as sureties under an agreement that the principal should also sign, and it appears that the principal's husband signed her name to the bond at her request, and that the bond was filed in the injunction suit and proceedings therein accordingly stayed to the principal's benefit, such signing by the husband is a sufficient compliance with the agreement to bind the sureties.

Error to circuit court, Lee county.

Action on a bond by G. H. Ely against George W. Blankenship and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants bring error. Affirmed.

C. T. Duncan, for plaintiffs in error. Pennington Bros. and M. G. Ely, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. The court is of opinion that the demurrer to the declaration was properly overruled. The bond sued on was executed in pursuance of a decree of the circuit court of Lee county. The defendants craved oyer of the bond and of the decree directing its execution, and then demurred upon the ground that the bond did not conform to the requirements of the decree. The bond does not derive its efficacy from the order. It would be a valid and binding instrument, even though the record of the chancery case had been silent with respect to its execution. In determining the liability of the parties to the bond we must look to the instrument alone, and not to the order of the court in regard to its execution; and, although the instrument may contradict the record, the parties executing it are estopped to deny its recitals. Caskie's Ex'rs v. Harrison, 76 Va. 85.

The court is further of opinion that the four pleas tendered by the defendants were properly rejected. Whether or not these pleas were good we need not inquire. The plea of non est factum, the general issue, was put in. Under this plea it was competent to show any fact that could have been proven under the special pleas, had they been admitted, and it is apparent from the character of the evidence that the defendants availed themselves of their rights in this respect without objection from the plaintiff.

Where the general issue has been pleaded, special pleas that set up matter of defense which can be proved under the general issue should be rejected. Campbell Co. v. Angus, 91 Va. 438, 22 S. E. 167; Richmond Union Pass. Ry. Co. v. New York & S. B. Ry. Co., 95 Va. 386, 28 S. E. 573.

The court is further of opinion that the plea of nul tiel record was properly rejected. The object of this plea was to contradict the recitals of the bond with the record of the chancery suit. This question has been considered in disposing of the demurrer, and what is there said need not be repeated here. Franklin's Adm'r v. Depriest, 13 Grat. 257.

The court is further of opinion that there was no error in giving the two instructions asked for by the plaintiff. The chancery suit in which the bond sued on was executed and filed was brought for settlement of partnership accounts and a dissolution of the firm of M. E. Woodward & Co., composed of M. E. Woodward, one of the parties defendant, and G. H. Ely, plaintiff in the suit at bar. The partnership assets were in the hands of M. E. Woodward and her husband, J. W. Woodward. The bill asked for a receiver, and prayed for an injunction restraining M. E. Woodward and J. W. Woodward from disposing of the stock of goods on hand, or collecting any debts due the firm. Upon the hearing of the motion to grant an injunction and appoint a receiver, the court required M. E. Woodward to execute to G. H. Ely, before the clerk of the court, a bond with approved security in the sum of $600, conditioned to indemnify and save harmless said Ely, and to secure him whatever sum might appear to be due on final settlement of the partnership accounts; the decree further providing for the injunction and receiver, unless such bond was executed within 10 days. It is admitted that on final settlement more than $600 was due G. H. Ely on account of debts against the firm paid by him, and it is not denied that the sums so paid were intended to be secured by the bond sued on. It is, however, contended by George W. Blankenship that he signed the bond with the agreement and understanding that M. E. Woodward and F. A. Munsey were to sign and acknowledge the same before the clerk of the court, and a like contention is made by F. A. Munsey that he signed it with the understanding that M. E. Woodward and George W. Blankenship would sign and acknowledge the same, and that, inasmuch as M. E. Woodward did not sign and acknowledge the bond, they are not bound.

The ground of objection to the instructions under consideration is that they make no reference to these respective agreements touching the execution and delivery of the bond by Blankenship and Munsey. The bond is on its face, in all respects, a complete instrument, duly signed by each of the obligors named in the body of the bond, including M. E. Woodward. It appears from the uncontradicted testimony of John W. Woodward that he signed the bond for his wife, M. E. Woodward, at her request. The bond thus executed was filed in the chancery cause, as shown by the indorsement of the clerk thereon, was acted upon by M. E. Woodward receiving and enjoying the benefits resulting from its execution, and was relied upon by G. H. Ely as his protection in lieu of the injunction and receiver asked for by him. If, therefore, the defendants had the right, in this action, to rely upon the conditions mentioned, which we by no means concede (Miller v. Fletcher, 27 Grat. 403), such conditions were substantially complied with. All of the parties contemplated did sign the bond, and M. E. Woodward has been held liable by the judgment complained of, so that no one has been injured by reason of her failure to sign and acknowledge the bond in proper person.

The court is further of opinion that there was no error in refusing the several instructions asked for by the defendants. Without prolonging this opinion to comment upon these instructions in detail, it will suffice to say that they are based upon the erroneous theory entertained by the defendants, that the bond sued on derives its efficacy from the decree directing its execution. The questions raised by these instructions have already been disposed of in considering other assignments of error.

The court is further of opinion that the evidence was ample to sustain the verdict of the jury, and that it was not error to refuse to set the same aside as contrary to the law and the evidence.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that there is no error to the prejudice of the plaintiffs in error, and the judgment is affirmed.

BROWN v. COMMONWEALTH et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 21, 1900.)

LICENSES — MERCANTILE BUSINESS — WHAT CONSTITUTES—CITY ORDINANCES—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

1. Under Acts 1889–90, c. 244, §§ 27, 28, declaring who shall be required to obtain a state license to conduct business as a merchant, providing that a license shall not be required of any person who may canvas any county or corporation to buy articles designed as food for man, unless he shall keep a place of business for the purpose of selling such articles in or within a half mile of a city or town; and sections 32 and 33, providing that a peddler's license shall not be required of any one for the privilege of selling family supplies of a perishable nature, farm products, etc.; and Act March 3, 1896 (Acts 1895–96, p. 685), making it unlawful for any city or town to collect a tax from any person selling farm and domestic products within the limits of any such city or town outside the regular market houses and sheds,—a person selling on the market square of a city, from his wagon, country produce, some of which was raised on his own farm, and the balance acquired in the course of his business, is not liable to a fine for doing business as a merchant in such city without a license from the commonwealth.

2. The city of Roanoke charter (Acts 1895–96, p. 549) § 104, specifying various kinds of business or employment on which the city may levy a license tax, and providing that a license may be required of any person doing business in such city, whether the business be of a like character as that specially mentioned or not, and whether a license is required therefor by the state or not, does not apply to a person selling on the market square country produce from his wagon.

3. Laws imposing a license or a tax are strictly construed, and where there is doubt as to their meaning or scope they are construed more strongly against the government and in favor of the citizen.

4. General Ordinances City of Roanoke, § 70, imposes on the merchant doing business in the city a tax, including dealers in dry goods, lumber, furniture, groceries, merchant tailors, or persons engaged in any other mercantile business whatsoever, except where otherwise herein specified. Section 472 imposes a curbage tax on the sale of country produce at the city market, and by section 474 the sale of such produce is confined to the city market. Held, that a person selling on the market square country produce from his wagon, and who has paid a curbage tax, is not required to pay a license tax as a merchant.

Error to hustings court of Roanoke.

W. C. Brown was convicted for violating the state license law and for doing business as a merchant in the city of Roanoke without a license, and brings error. Reversed.

Hansbrough & Hall, for plaintiff in error. A. J. Montague, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth. C. B. Moomaw, for defendant in error city of Roanoke.

CARDWELL, J. W. C. Brown is a merchant in the county of Franklin, and has the license required by law for the privilege of doing business as a merchant in that county. In the course of his business he acquires by barter country produce, such as eggs, butter, fowls, and vegetables, which he often gathers up by sending his wagon around among his customers; and from time to time he brings the country produce raised on his farm and acquired through his store to the city of Roanoke for sale. Such produce is sold by him from his wagon on the city market, in accordance with the market regulations of the city, which regulations impose what is known as a "curbage tax" for the privilege of selling each load of produce on the market square, and confines the sale of such produce to the market square. On October 4, 1899, Brown came to the city of Roanoke with a wagon load of country produce, some of which was raised on his own farm and the balance was acquired by him in the course of his business. He paid the curbage tax required by the market laws of the city, and on the market square sold his load of produce to a merchant doing business in the city. After having sold his produce, he was cited to appear before the police justice for the city to show cause why he should not be fined for doing business as a merchant in the city without having first obtained a license from the city and from the state of Virginia to conduct such business. Upon the hearing of these warrants the police justice dismissed them, holding that Brown was not conducting business in the city in such a manner as to make it necessary for him to obtain a merchant's license in the city. From this judgment the commonwealth and the city of Roanoke appealed to the hustings court of the city, and upon the hearing of the causes on appeal the hustings court imposed a fine of $30 on Brown for the violation of the state license law and $2.50 for doing business as a merchant in the city without a license from the city.

By agreement, one bill of exceptions was taken to the rulings of the hustings court, made applicable to both cases, and they are before us upon a writ of error awarded by one of the judges of this court.

We will first consider the question whether or not plaintiff in error, under the facts and circumstances stated, was required by the revenue laws of the commonwealth to take out a merchant's license for the privilege of selling his country produce upon the market square of the city of Roanoke.

Section 549 of the Code requires that a merchant's license shall designate some definite place for the transaction of such business within the district of the commissioner granting the license.

The statute imposing a license tax upon merchants provides that the tax shall be graduated according to the amount of their purchases during the period for which the license is granted, and the section which fixes the amount of the tax declares that merchant tailors, lumber merchants, furniture merchants, butchers, greengrocers, hucksters, dealers in coal, ice, or wood, shall be embraced in that section; but, it further provides that nothing contained in the section shall be so construed as to require a license of any person who may canvass any county or corporation to buy lambs, pigs, calves, fowls, eggs, butter, and such like small matters of subsistence designed as food for man, unless such person shall keep a place of business for the purpose of selling such articles in or within a half mile of a city or town in the state. Sections 27, 28, c. 244, Acts 1889–90. Sections 32 and 33 of that act also expressly provide that a peddler's license shall not be required of any one for the privilege of selling or offering for sale family supplies of a perishable nature, farm products, wood, or coal. And by an act approved March 3, 1896 (Acts 1895–96, p. 685), it is declared unlawful for any city or town, or of any agent or officer of such city or town, to impose or collect any tax, fine, or other penalty from any person selling their farm and domestic products within the limits of any such city or town outside of and not within the regular market houses and sheds of such cities and towns.

It is, therefore, clearly the policy of the law to exempt persons who deal in country produce, as plaintiff in error does, from the payment of a license tax either as a merchant or as a peddler, or any tax for buying or selling outside of the market of a city or town such produce. He does not come under the exception in the statute above referred to by keeping a place of business for the sale of country produce in or within a half mile of the city of Roanoke, but such sales as were made by him in the city of Roanoke were made from his wagon on the market square.

A merchant's license contemplates that the merchant is to have a fixed place of business within a county or city,—a store or shop for the sale of goods. This is the common acceptation of the term as given in 2 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 155. The same author defines the word "merchant" in its legal acceptation to mean one whose business it is to buy and sell merchandise, and says that it applies to all persons who habitually trade in merchandise. Neither in the legal nor common acceptation of the word "merchant" was plaintiff in error conducting a mercantile business in the city of Roanoke when selling on the market square of the city, from his wagon, country produce, and therefore was not liable to a fine for doing business as a merchant in the city without having first obtained a license from the commonwealth to conduct such a business.

It is claimed that section 104 of the charter of the city of Roanoke (Acts 1895–96, p. 549) furnishes authority in the city to impose a merchant's license tax upon plaintiff in error. This section, after specifying various kinds of business or employment upon which the city may levy a license tax, provides that a license may be required of any person whatsoever doing business in said city, whether the business or employment be of a like character or kind as that specially mentioned or not, and whether a license is required therefor by the state or not. Can it be said that plaintiff in error was doing business in the city of Roanoke, within the meaning of the section? We think not. It is clear that selling country produce on the market of the city is not specially mentioned in the section, and the authority to impose a license tax for the privilege of conducting such a business must be derived, if at all, from the powers conferred in general terms.

Laws imposing a license or a tax are strictly construed, and whenever there is doubt as to the meaning or scope of such laws they are construed more strongly against the government and in favor of the citizen. Board v. Tallant, 96 Va. 723, 32 S. E. 479.

Section 70 of the general ordinances of the city of Roanoke, like the statute of the state, imposes upon the merchant doing business in the city a tax graduated according to the purchases he makes in the conduct of his business, the tax imposed being the same as that prescribed in the statute, and concludes: "Dealers in dry goods, lumber, furniture, groceries, merchant tailors, or persons engaged in any other mercantile business whatsoever, and whether they be of like kind or class with those enumerated or not, except where otherwise herein specified, shall be embraced in this section."

Section 472 of the city's ordinances, pursuant to the authority expressly conferred in the city's charter, specifically imposes a curbage tax upon the sale of country produce at the city market, making no distinction between persons selling such produce of their own raising and persons who acquired such produce in other ways; and by section 474 the sale of such produce is confined to the city market.

Here, then, the city has confined the sale of country produce to the market square, specifically imposing a curbage tax for the privilege of selling it there; and in the case at bar, after this curbage tax had been paid by plaintiff in error, demand is made upon him for the payment of a license tax as a merchant in the city, on the ground, as counsel for the city contends, that when plaintiff in error came to the city, and paid his curbage tax, he acquired a place to do business in the city as a merchant, as fully and completely as any merchant in the city doing business in any of the houses in the city, etc. This position is wholly untenable. When occupying a space in the market, after paying the curbage tax, plaintiff in error was not there to buy and sell as is the business of a merchant, but merely to sell, from his wagon, his load of country produce, raised in part on his farm, and the residue bartered for or purchased in the course of his business in Franklin county, as he had the right to do; and when this was done, or the market hours closed, he abandoned the space in the market occupied by him, and had no further right to occupy it. In no sense, therefore, was he doing business as a merchant in the city of Roanoke.

We are of opinion that the charter of the city does not authorize the imposition of a merchant's license tax in such a case, and that the common council of the city has not, by the ordinance relied on, attempted to impose the tax.

The judgment of the hustings court complained of will be reversed and annulled, and this court will enter such judgment as that court should have entered, dismissing the warrants against plaintiff in error, with costs to him as against the city of Roanoke.

JACKSON v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 21, 1900.)

HOMICIDE—QUARRELSOME CHARACTER OF THE DECEASED—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY—SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. To render an assignment of error for the improper exclusion of evidence available, record must show what the party offering the witness expected to prove by him.

2. Where the defendant and the deceased were engaged in a fight, and the defendant struck the fatal blow with a rock while the deceased was running away from him, the quarrelsome and vindictive character of deceased cannot be shown.

3. An instruction that the law of self-defense is the law of necessity, and the necessity relied on to justify the killing must not arise out of the prisoner's own conduct, and that if the prisoner assaulted the deceased, and thereby brought about the necessity of killing him, then the prisoner could not justify the killing by a plea of necessity unless he were without fault in bringing that necessity on himself, was proper.

4. Where there was evidence that the prisoner grossly insulted the deceased, and made an assault on him, in which he struck the deceased a fatal blow with a rock as the latter was running away from him, an instruction that, if the first assault was made on the deceased with a preconceived design to kill or to inflict great bodily harm, then the malice of the first assault, notwithstanding the violence with which it was returned, communicates itself to the last act of the prisoner, and the killing is murder, was supported by the evidence.

5. Where the prisoner and the deceased were engaged in a mutual combat, and the prisoner struck the deceased a fatal blow with a rock as the latter was running away from him, instructions on the law of self-defense were properly refused.

Error to Pulaski county court.

J. C. Wysor and T. L. Massie, for plaintiff in error. A. J. Montague, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

BUCHANAN, J. The plaintiff in error was found guilty of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to the penitentiary for a term of five years.

The first error assigned to the rulings of the trial court was its refusal to allow the character of the deceased as a dangerous man to be shown. Two witnesses were asked if they knew the reputation of the deceased as a dangerous man. They stated that they did, but, when asked what that reputation was, the court, upon the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, refused to allow the questions to be answered. What the witnesses were expected to testify as to the reputation of the deceased is not shown by the bills of exception.

In order that this court can pass upon the action of the trial court rejecting or excluding evidence, its materiality must be shown. Where a question is asked, and the witness is not permitted to answer it, the bill of exceptions should show what the party offering the witness expected to prove by him. If the witness is permitted to answer, and the answer is excluded, the bill of exceptions should show what the answer was; otherwise, this court cannot say that any injury resulted to the party complaining from the action of the trial court. Insurance Co. v. Pollard, 94 Va. 146, 157, 26 S. E. 421, 36 L. R. A. 271, and cases cited; Driver v. Hartman, 96 Va. 518, 31 S. E. 899.

But if the bill of exceptions had shown that the defendant expected to prove that the deceased had the general reputation of being a quarrelsome, vindictive, and brutal man, we do not think that such evidence was admissible. Placing the most favorable construction upon the evidence of the accused, he and the deceased were engaged in a mutual combat, commenced with their hands, and afterwards continued with rocks, both parties reaching for rocks at the same time. From this combat the accused made no effort to retire, but pursued the deceased, and threw the rock which killed him while he was moving away from him. The accused had not only not made out a prima facie case of self-defense, as was thought necessary in Harrison's Case, 79 Va. 374, as a condition precedent to the right to introduce evidence of the dangerous character of the deceased, but the evidence did not tend to show that the defendant did the killing in self-defense. This being so, under all the authorities the evidence was clearly inadmissible. Whart. Cr. Ev. § 84; 2 Bish. Cr. Proc. §§ 625, 626, 629.

The next error assigned is the giving of instruction No. 9 asked for by the commonwealth. That instruction is as follows:

"That on a trial for murder the law of self-defense is the law of necessity, and the necessity relied on to justify the killing must not arise out of the prisoner's own misconduct; and if the jury shall believe from the evidence that the prisoner, Charles Jackson, assaulted the deceased, and thereby brought about the necessity of killing the deceased, should they believe there was any such necessity, then the prisoner cannot justify the killing of the deceased by a plea of necessity, unless he was without fault in bringing that necessity upon himself."

The objection urged to this instruction is that it "virtually told the jury they must find the accused guilty of murder if he began the affray merely to inflict a battery, and without any felonious intent, and that he could not reduce his crime to any lower grade than murder by the plea of self-defense and by proof sustaining such a plea." We do not so understand the instruction. Its object was to tell the jury that the accused could not justify the killing of the deceased upon the ground of self-defense, and therefore be acquitted, if they believed that he had assaulted the deceased, and by such misconduct brought about the necessity for the killing, if there was such necessity, in order to save his own life. That instruction did not instruct the jury, nor was it intended to instruct them, upon the degree of the prisoner's guilt, whether it was murder or manslaughter, but it was merely intended to tell them that upon the facts hypothetically stated in the instruction the prisoner was not entitled to an acquittal.

This is clearly the law. It was so held in Vaiden's Case, 12 Grat. 717, 729, 730. Judge Lee, who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, said: "With regard to the necessity that will justify the slaying of another in self-defense, it should seem that the party should not have wrongfully occasioned the necessity; for a man shall not in any case justify the killing of another by a pretense of necessity, unless he were without fault in bringing that necessity upon himself."

This decision has been followed and the language of Judge Lee quoted approvingly by this court in subsequent cases (Lewis' Case, 78 Va. 732; Honesty's Case, 81 Va. 298, 299; Clark's Case, 90 Va. 369, 18 S. E. 440), and is fully sustained by the later as well as the older text writers (1 Minor, Cr. Law, 43; 1 Bish. New Cr. Law, § 865; 1 Whart. Cr. Law [9th Ed.] § 485; Kerr, Hom. § 179; 1 Hale, P. C. 482).

In Hash's Case, 88 Va. 172, 13 S. E. 398, a somewhat different doctrine was laid down.

but it has been much questioned by the profession, and not only not been followed since, but in Clark's Case, 90 Va. 369, 18 S. E. 440, Judge Lewis, in delivering the unanimous opinion of the court, composed of the same judges who decided Hash's Case, quotes with approval the language of the court in Valden's Case, and refers to Lewis' Case and Honesty's Case, supra, in support of it, without referring to Hash's Case. So far as Hash's Case is in conflict with the doctrine laid down in Valden's Case and our decision in the case before us, we feel constrained to overrule it.

The giving of instruction No. 8 asked for by the commonwealth is assigned as error.

This assignment of error was practically abandoned in the oral argument of the case, and properly so, as the instruction complained of was a correct statement of law, and applicable to the case. 1 Minor, Cr. Law, 46, and cases cited; 2 Bish. Cr. Law, § 697.

The giving of instruction No. 10 for the commonwealth is assigned as error. It is as follows:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the prisoner, Charles Jackson, assailed the deceased, and a combat ensued, and in such combat the prisoner killed the deceased, and if they shall further believe that the first assault was made by the prisoner upon the deceased with a preconceived design to kill or to inflict great bodily harm, then the malice of the first assault, notwithstanding the violence with which it was returned, communicates itself to the last act of the prisoner, and the killing is murder."

The objection urged to this instruction is that there was no evidence upon which to base it. In this view we cannot concur. There was evidence tending to show that the accused had grossly insulted the deceased, and made an assault upon him; that during the affray the accused kicked the deceased in the stomach or privates, and doubled him up, whereupon the deceased broke loose from the accused and ran; that the defendant pursued him, although he was trying to escape; that while the deceased was running, and the accused was following, the latter threw two rocks with all the power he could, one of which struck the deceased in the back and the other on the head, causing his death. From this and other evidence in the cause the jury might have believed that the accused insulted and assaulted the deceased for the purpose of doing what he did do, for a man is presumed to have intended to do what he did, unless the contrary appears.

The court refused to give instructions numbered 4, 5, and 6 offered by the accused, and this is assigned as error.

These instructions are all based upon the theory that the accused when he killed the deceased was resisting an attack made upon him by the deceased, and killed him in self-defense. The most favorable construction that can be put upon the prisoner's own evidence, as before stated, does not show that the deceased made an attack upon him, but, at most, the affray commenced as a mere fight or mutual combat, first with the hands, and afterwards with rocks, and that at no time did the accused attempt to quit the combat.

In such cases the right of either party to justify or excuse himself on the ground of self-defense, if he killed the other, is stated by Mr. Bishop as follows: "If a mere fight or an assault, not murderously meant, is followed up till the conflict is for blood, neither party can avail himself of the perfect defense by killing the other until he has endeavored to extricate himself by 'retreating to the wall,' as the old phrase is. * * *

"Cases of mutual combat are those in which this duty of retreating to the wall oftenest appears. Two men being in the wrong, neither can right himself except by retreating to the wall. So that, when one unexpectedly finds himself so hotly pursued by the other that he can save himself only by taking the other's life, if he does it he is guilty of felonious homicide, unless he first withdraws from the place." 1 Bish. New Cr. Law, §§ 869–871; 1 Whart. Cr. Law (9th Ed.) § 486a; 1 Minor, Cr. Law, 42, 43.

In Clark's Case, 90 Va. 360, 368, 18 S. E. 440, it was held that it was a principle of the criminal law that where death ensues on a sudden provocation or sudden quarrel, without malice prepense, the killing is manslaughter, and, in order to reduce the offense to killing in self-defense, the accused must prove two things, viz.: (1) That before the mortal blow was given he declined further combat, and retreated as far as he could with safety; and (2) that he killed the deceased through the necessity of preserving his own life, or that there was reasonable ground to believe that the killing was necessary to preserve his own life, or save himself from great bodily harm. Tested by these principles, it is clear that the instructions refused ought not to have been given. The accused not only did not decline further combat and retreat, but pursued and killed his adversary.

The remaining assignment of error is to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the verdict of the jury because it was contrary to the law and the evidence.

Sufficient reference has already been made to the evidence to show that the verdict of the jury was not contrary to the evidence, and, as we have seen, the court committed no error of law in the trial of the case.

The judgment complained of must be affirmed.

MAX MEADOWS LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO. v. McGAVOCK et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 28, 1900.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER — TRUST DEED — JUDGMENT CREDITORS—LIENS—SATISFACTION—PRIORITY.

1. Certain heirs sold land to C., retaining a lien for the purchase price; and J. C. and J. R., two of the heirs, executed to M. a trust deed conveying, in the alternative, the property conveyed to C., in case the sale should not be specifically enforced, and otherwise their interest in the purchase money due from C. The sale was specifically enforced, and the lien against the property foreclosed, and at the sale the original vendors became purchasers. The land was partitioned among them, and the portions assigned to J. C. and J. R. were sold to satisfy the trust in favor of M. and certain judgment-lien creditors, in the order of their priority, and for payment of their share of the purchase money. Plaintiff, a judgment-lien creditor, contends that M. is not entitled to be satisfied out of the proceeds of this sale, but is precluded from demanding any share of such proceeds by her conduct in allowing the court to confirm the sale to the heirs, and treat the purchase price as if paid by them, without objection. Held that, while in some of the decrees of the court the purchase price was treated as paid, yet, since in all of them it is declared that the land is liable for the liens theretofore reported, in order of their priority, M. is not precluded from claiming satisfaction out of these funds, but is entitled to be so satisfied, since under the trust deed the interest of J. C. and J. R. in the land was expressly conveyed in trust for her security.

2. The holder of the oldest unpaid judgment lien is entitled to be paid first out of the property of the debtor, where his lien is a general one.

Appeal from circuit court, Wythe county.

Action by the Max Meadows Land & Improvement Company against McGavock and others. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Kegley, for appellant. J. H. Fulton, for appellees.

BUCHANAN, J. It appears that prior to May 3, 1893, the heirs of Randall McGavock sold to C. M. Clark and associates a tract of about 262 acres of land and conveyed it by their direction to one Denniston, securing the unpaid purchase money by a lien on the land. On May 3, 1893, J. C. and J. R. McGavock, two of the heirs of Randall McGavock, executed a deed of trust to W. E. Fulton, trustee, to secure the payment of a bond for $8,000 executed by them to Margaret McGavock, and to save harmless James H. McGavock, their surety on the bond. Among the property embraced in the trust was the interest of the grantors in the purchase money due from Clark and associates. The language of the deed by which that interest was conveyed or assigned in trust is as follows:

"And the parties of the first part do further grant, transfer, and assign to the party of the second part all their right and interest in and to the unpaid purchase money of a portion of said land sold to said C. M. Clark and his associates, and, to have payment of which, suit is now pending in the circuit court of Wythe county, to which reference is here made; and, if said contract is not specifically enforced by the court, then the parties of the first part do hereby convey their interest in said land to the party of the second part."

The sale made to Clark and associates was specifically enforced in the suit referred to, which is one of the seven causes heard together, in which the decree complained of was entered. In that suit the 262-acre tract of land was sold for the unpaid purchase money, and the heirs of Randall McGavock, the vendors of Clark and associates, became the purchasers at the price of $5,000. They did not pay the cash costs, but executed their bonds for the deferred payments. The commissioner reported the sale, and the court was of opinion that the sale, "notwithstanding the failure of the purchasers to pay the cash payment, should be confirmed, as it appears it will be necessary hereafter again to sell this land to satisfy the liens reported in these causes, when a decree for costs and cash payment alluded to can be entered if the same is not sooner paid," and in the same decree ordered that the lien reserved in the deed to Denniston be credited with the amount for which the land sold, less the costs of suit and sale.

Afterwards the court directed that the land be partitioned between the heirs of Randall McGavock, and that the shares of J. R. McGavock, J. C. McGavock, H. E. McGavock, and Mrs. Lucy Kent be laid off contiguous to each other, which was done. By its decree confirming that partition, the court, being of opinion that it was necessary to sell the interest of the four last named parties in the land to satisfy the trust and judgment-lien creditors of said parties in the order of the priority theretofore reported, ordered its commissioner, unless the said parties within 30 days paid their share of the cash costs of the former sale, their share of the money advanced by James H. McGavock to prevent a forfeiture of the 262-acre tract of land for the nonpayment of taxes thereon, and the unpaid liens reported against them, to sell the lands allotted them in the partition of the 262-acre tract. J. C., J. R., and H. E. McGavock did not pay the debts named, and Commissioner Fulton offered their interest or shares in the land for sale, and James H. McGavock became the purchaser at the price of $4,000. The sale was reported to and confirmed by the court.

By decree of February term, 1899, the court directed its commissioner to collect the two unpaid bonds executed by James H. McGavock to the commissioner for the deferred purchase price of the land sold him, and to apply the interest of J. C. McGavock and J. R. McGavock in the fund so collected to the payment—First, of any balance due on the judgment of W. B. Graham, reported in class 2 in Commissioner Kegley's report; and, secondly, to the debt of Miss Margaret McGavock, reported in class 3.

This action of the court is assigned as error by the Max Meadows Land & Improvement Company, the appellant here,—a judgment-lien creditor of J. C. and J. R. McGavock. The objection made to the distribution by the court is that the sale of the 262-acre tract of land to Clark and associates having been specifically executed, the deed of trust executed to J. C. and J. R. McGavock to secure Miss Margaret McGavock created no lien on the land for the payment of her debt, but her lien was upon their interest in the purchase-money bonds given for the land, and that she had the right, when that land was sold, to have applied to the payment of her debt the interest of J. C. and J. R. McGavock in the proceeds of that sale, but that, instead of having this done, she allowed the court to confirm the sale to them, and treat the purchase money, except the costs of the suit and sale, as paid by them, and that inasmuch as those proceedings were had in causes to which Miss Margaret McGavock and James H. McGavock were parties, and without any objection on their part, they were precluded by those decrees treating the purchase money due from the McGavock heirs as paid, and had lost their right to have the interest of J. C. and J. R. McGavock therein applied to the payment of the debt due Miss Margaret McGavock.

It is true that in some of the decrees of the court the purchase price which the heirs of Randall McGavock agreed to give for the land seems to be treated as paid, except as to the costs of the suit and sale; but, while this is done, the same decrees declare that the 262-acre tract of land is liable for the liens theretofore reported, in the order of their priority, and its decree for distribution ordered the interest of J. C. and J. R. McGavock in the proceeds of the sale of their shares of the 262-acre tract of land to be paid upon the liens against them according to the priority as fixed by the reports of liens. What ought to have been done, since there seems to have been no surety on the bonds given by the heirs of Randall McGavock for the purchase money of the 262-acre tract of land, was to have ordered the sale of the interest of J. C. and J. R. McGavock in the land for the purchase money due from them, as nothing could have been recovered from them on their bonds by actions at law within any reasonable time, if at all, as appears from the record, and so much of the proceeds of that sale as was equal to the purchase money due from them appropriated to the payment of the debt of Miss Margaret McGavock. The court erred in its mode of procedure. But the appellant, so far as the record shows, has not been prejudiced by the error. It had no right to subject J. C. and J. R. McGavock's interest in the 262-acre tract of land to the payment of its lien until the purchase money due from them, and which was a prior lien upon it, had been paid. The court, by its decree for distribution, has applied the interest of J. C. and J. R. McGavock in the proceeds of the sale of the land to the payment of Miss Margaret McGavock's debt, which was payable out of the purchase money which J. C. and J. R. McGavock owed for it. This being so, the court, by its irregular proceedings, has only done what it ought to and would have done if its proceedings had been regular; and, as no injustice has been done the appellant by such irregularity, the decree complained of will not be reversed on that account. Beery v. Homan's Committee, 8 Grat. 48-53, 54; Wilson v. Spencer, 11 Leigh, 271, 280.

The action of the court in directing the unpaid balance on W. B. Graham's judgment to be paid before the appellant's debt is also assigned as error.

Graham's was the oldest unpaid judgment lien, and was general; extending to all the funds in the hands of the court upon which the appellant had a lien. Graham had the right to be paid first, and the court properly so decreed.

It follows from what has been said that the decree complained of must be affirmed.

KELLY et al. v. HAMBLEN et al.

RES JUDICATA—CREDITORS' SUIT—SATISFACTION—ANSWER—EXCEPTIONS.

1. Plaintiff, as assignee of a judgment, sued to subject certain lands to the judgment. Defendants interposed a plea of res judicata, based on a decision, in an action by another plaintiff, holding certain other lands not subject to the lien. Held, that since one of the defendants in the present suit was not a party to the former, and since the liability of the land sought to be subjected in the present suit was not considered in the former, the plea was not available.

2. The vitality of a judgment is not exhausted by one action thereon, but the judgment creditor is entitled to pursue successive actions until satisfaction is obtained.

3. Where the defendant in a suit to subject his land to the satisfaction of certain judgment liens answers, showing that there is other property of the principal debtor, or his alienees subsequent to defendant, still liable to the demands sought to be enforced against him, it is error to sustain an exception to such answer, since, if true, it constitutes a good defense.

Appeal from circuit court, Wise county.

Action by C. L. Hamblen and others against William J. Kelly and others to subject certain property to the satisfaction of a judgment lien. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

R. T. Irvine, for appellants. Bullitt & Kelly, for appellees.

KEITH, P. In the year 1893 Logan & Brewer recovered a judgment in Lee county against J. J. Kelly, Sr., for the sum of $5,000, with interest from January 1, 1891. At the same time Kirkpatrick recovered a judgment against the same defendant for $5,000, with interest from the same date. About the same time the Asheville Shoe Company, a judgment creditor, brought suit in the circuit court of Lee county against Kelly and Coldiron and others, alienees of Kelly, for the purpose of subjecting certain lands in Lee county, which were then in possession of said alienees; claiming that the lands really belonged to Kelly, and that he had conveyed them to his co-defendants with the intent to defraud, hinder, and delay his creditors. Plaintiff sought, also, to subject any other land owned by Kelly to the satisfaction of its judgment. The cause was referred to a commissioner, with directions to ascertain and report the liens against Kelly, and their priorities, and what lands, if any, were subject thereto. The judgment creditors were made parties, and their several judgments were duly reported by the commissioner, who also reported that the lands claimed by Coldiron and others were subject to liens of the said judgments; and a decree was entered holding the lands in Lee county to be liable, and directing that they should be sold. Coldiron and others appealed from this decree, and it was reversed, and the bill dismissed. Thereafter, in 1898, Logan & Brewer and Kirkpatrick instituted a chancery suit in the circuit court of Wise county against J. J. Kelly, Sr., and J. J. Kelly, Jr., the object of which was to enforce the judgment obtained by them against two tracts of land lying in Wise county, claimed by J. J. Kelly, Jr. One of these tracts contained 535 acres, worth about $20,000, and the other about 800 acres, worth about $16,000. J. J. Kelly, Jr., and J. J. Kelly, Sr., answered, stating that these several tracts belonged to J. J. Kelly, Jr., and were not liable to the judgments of the plaintiffs. Proofs were taken, but before a final hearing a compromise between the parties was made, by which J. J. Kelly, Jr., agreed to pay 33⅓ per cent. of the judgments of Logan & Brewer and Kirkpatrick; and thereupon, at the next term of the circuit court, this suit was, in pursuance of this compromise, dismissed.

At August rules, 1898, C. S. Hamblen, who in the meantime had become an assignee of the Logan & Brewer judgments, brought suit in Lee county against William J. Kelly and J. J. Kelly, Sr.; making all other judgment creditors of J. J. Kelly, Sr., parties. The object of the suit was to enforce the lien of the judgments against a certain tract of land, containing 700 acres, more or less, the surface of and timber on which were owned and claimed by William J. Kelly; complainants in the bill averring that J. J. Kelly, Sr., had parted with the title to the said land to William J. Kelly after the liens of the judgments had attached thereto. To this bill J. J. Kelly filed a plea in which he sets forth the proceedings in the case of the Asheville Shoe Company against himself and others, and relies thereon as res judicata.

William J. Kelly filed an answer, in which he likewise relies upon said proceedings, and also upon the suit of Logan & Brewer and others against J. J. Kelly, Jr., and J. J. Kelly, Sr., as res judicata, and also as a bar to any further proceedings against his lands, because, as he alleges, the lands of J. J. Kelly, Jr., were liable to the said judgments, and were worth a great deal more than the total amount thereof, to wit, at least $36,000, and that notwithstanding this fact the parties had compromised and dismissed the proceedings against those lands.

Plaintiffs demurred to the plea of res judicata filed by J. J. Kelly, Sr., and filed exceptions to the answer of William J. Kelly on the ground that the same did not constitute any defense. At the April term, 1899, the circuit court of Wise county entered a decree sustaining the demurrers to the plea and the exceptions to the answer, and thereupon J. J. Kelly declined to further plead or answer, and William J. Kelly declined to amend his answer; and the court entered a decree holding that none of the judgments against J. J. Kelly, Sr., constituted liens upon the 700-acre tract, except the judgments of Logan & Brewer and Kirkpatrick, but maintained the liens of those judgments, and directed that unless they should be paid within a certain time the surface of the 700-acre tract and the timber thereof should be sold.

The facts with respect to the 700-acre tract appear to be as follows: In 1882 it belonged to J. J. Kelly, Sr., who in that year sold and conveyed to one Kemmerer the coal and minerals in it. In the year 1884 J. J. Kelly conveyed the surface and timber upon this tract to his son David Kelly, but this deed was never put to record. Subsequently, by an arrangement among the parties, David Kelly was given an interest in certain lands in Lee county; and in consideration thereof he assigned and conveyed to William J. Kelly all his right, title, and interest in the 700-acre tract, who, finding that there was no deed on the record from J. J. Kelly, Sr., to David Kelly, procured from J. J. Kelly, Sr., a deed direct to himself, dated October 5, 1890, which was not recorded in Wise county until March 13, 1894, after the judgments of Logan & Brewer and Kirkpatrick had been docketed in that county, but before the judgments of any of the other creditors had been so docketed.

From the decree of the April term, 1899, the appeal now before us was taken; and the petitioners, J. J. Kelly, Sr., and William J. Kelly admit that the judgments of Logan & Brewer, assigned to Hamblen as aforesaid, and the judgment of Kirkpatrick, constitute liens on the surface and timber of the 700-acre tract, unless the rights of Hamblen and Kirkpatrick have been lost by reason of the proceedings in Lee county in the suits brought by the Asheville Company, or by reason of the proceedings in Wise county in the suit of Logan & Brewer against J. J. Kelly, Jr., and others, but the petitioners insist that the proceedings in each of those causes do constitute bars to the right of recovery in this suit.

They assign as error, in the decree complained of, first, that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plea of res judicata filed by J. J. Kelly, Sr.

We shall not inquire or decide whether a demurrer applies to an answer or plea in a chancery case. It would seem that it can only be interposed to a bill. However this may be, the appellant made no objection to it in the circuit court, and has not assigned it as error in this court; and we therefore neither approve nor condemn the practice, but reserve it for future consideration.

From an inspection of the record of Asheville Shoe Co. v. Coldiron et al., which, as we have seen, resulted in a reversal of the decree of the circuit court of Lee county, and a dismissal of the bill filed by the judgment creditors of J. J. Kelly, Sr., it appears, first, that William J. Kelly, one of the petitioners in the case before us, was not a party to that proceeding. It further appears, from the opinion of the court (see Coldiron v. Shoe Co., 93 Va. 364, 25 S. E. 238), that the liability of the 700-acre tract in Wise county to the lien of the judgments against J. J. Kelly, Sr., was never considered by the court. Creditors appear to have made strenuous efforts to discover land out of which their judgments might be satisfied. The records were examined, interrogatories were filed, and no effort seems to have been spared to accomplish that result; and, after a careful investigation of the record, we cannot discover that the liability of the 700-acre tract to the lien now asserted against it was in that case heard and determined, nor do we think that the principle invoked by counsel for petitioners applies to a case such as this. It is true, as he contends, that the doctrine of res judicata embraces, not only what was in point of fact adjudicated, but the judgment or decree is conclusive as to all questions in issue, whether formally litigated or not. "It is not necessary to the conclusiveness of the former judgment or decree that the issue should have been taken upon the precise point which it is proposed to controvert in the collateral action. It is sufficient if that point was essential to the former judgment. Every point which has been specifically decided, and by necessary implication, every issue which must have been decided in order to support the judgment or decree, is concluded." Diehl v. Marchant, 87 Va. 447, 12 S. E. 808; Wells, Res Adj. p. 187; Diamond State Iron Co. v. Alex. K. Rarig Co., 93 Va. 595, 25 S. E. 894.

It is not necessary, however, to enlarge upon the familiar doctrine of res judicata, or to multiply authorities upon the subject. We are of opinion that William J. Kelly, being in possession of lands confessedly liable to the lien of the judgments asserted in this cause, cannot escape that liability by vouching the record of a suit in which no effort was made to subject the land in question to those judgments, and in which they could not have been enforced, as he was not a party to the proceeding. As we have said, diligent effort was made in that litigation to ascertain a subject upon which the lien of the judgments therein reported could be enforced. None such was discovered, and the bill was dismissed; and we know of no authority and of no principle which forbids a judgment creditor, under such circumstances, to seek satisfaction out of property which he afterwards ascertains to be liable to his lien. We will not say that the judgment debtors in that case successfully concealed from their creditors the property out of which their demand might have been satisfied, but we do say that the failure of an effort, made in good faith, to subject property in that suit, which was held not to be liable, cannot be interposed as a bar to the enforcement of a lien upon other property confessedly liable but for the unavailing effort.

Another error assigned rests upon the idea that the suits theretofore instituted by the judgment creditors to enforce their liens exhausted the vitality of those judgments, and that they are no longer subsisting causes of action. The precise principle invoked is that a judgment is an indivisible cause of action, and that when once an action is instituted upon it, and prosecuted to a final judgment or decree, no other suit or action can be brought upon it. It is true that a judgment is an indivisible cause of action, in the sense that it may not be divided or split up into several causes of action. Subject to the discretion of courts in the imposition of costs, as many successive actions may be brought upon a judgment as may be needful in the opinion of the plaintiff; but there can, of course, be but one satisfaction. If it be true that but one bill to enforce a judgment can be maintained; if it be true that, by reason of the indivisibility of a judgment as a cause of action, a decree upon a bill filed to enforce it may be pleaded as an adjudication of all rights growing out of it,—a creditor who has proceeded against his judgment debtor, and made an unavailing attempt to obtain satisfaction, would be precluded from asserting his lien, though his debtor might thereafter acquire property sufficient to satisfy his demand. This, we know, is not and cannot be true; but, if the principle contended for exists, it must operate in all cases. To establish an exception is to deny and refute its existence.

We are of opinion that a suit brought to enforce the lien of a judgment, and prosecuted in good faith, though ineffectual, is not a bar to a subsequent suit by the same plaintiff against the same debtor to enforce satisfaction of the same judgment. In all such cases it will be the duty of the court to see that the creditor does not exercise his right capriciously or oppressively, and make such orders and decrees with reference to the imposition of costs as will protect litigants against unnecessary and vexatious suits.

The remaining error assigned is that the court erred in sustaining the exception of Hamblen and Kirkpatrick to the answer of William J. Kelly.

From that answer it appears that Logan & Brewer and Kirkpatrick had liens upon two tracts of land owned by J. J. Kelly, Jr., the title to which remained in J. J. Kelly, Sr., until 1897, which were worth more than the sum of the judgments sought to be enforced in this suit, and that Logan & Brewer, assignors of Hamblen and Kirkpatrick, entered into a compromise with J. J. Kelly, Jr., who agreed to pay and did pay them one-third of their demands, whereupon a consent decree was entered, reciting the compromise and dismissing the bill. This, we think, was error. If the facts stated in the answer be true, the lands of J. J. Kelly, Jr., title to which remained in J. J. Kelly, Sr., until 1897, should have been subjected to the lien of the judgments, to the exoneration of the lands of William J. Kelly, title to which J. J. Kelly, Sr., parted with as far back as 1894. See Jones v. Myrick's Ex'rs, 8 Grat. 179; Loan Co. v. Fellers, 96 Va. 337, 31 S. E. 505.

The answer also avers that J. J. Kelly, Sr., was the owner of a tract of land in Wise county, containing 396 acres, upon which the judgments in suit constituted liens, which should be subjected to the exoneration of the lands in the hands of his alienees. When a plaintiff excepts to an answer for insufficiency, he plants himself upon the proposition that, if the averments of the answer are sustained by proof, they constitute no defense to the plaintiff's demand. It seems manifest to us that if the defendant can show that other property of the principal debtor, or property of an alienee from the principal debtor subsequent to himself, is liable to the demands sought to be enforced against him, he should be permitted to do so.

We are of opinion that the circuit court erred in sustaining exceptions to the answer of William J. Kelly, and for this cause its decree is reversed.

Reversed.

Defendant's attorneys asked that the action be dismissed because the magistrate, under the constitution, has no jurisdiction, plaintiff having proved that defendant was a resident of Marion, N. C. Motion overruled, because I am of the opinion that magistrate had jurisdiction of nonresidents in attachment cases, and especially so in this case, as the defendant was served with the summons, etc., in this county and state. * * *" The defendant appealed, and the circuit court sustained the appeal on the ground that the magistrate did not have jurisdiction, by reason of the fact that the defendant was a nonresident of this state. The plaintiff has appealed to this court from said rule.

Section 71, subd. 4, of the Code confers upon magistrates jurisdiction in "an action commenced by attachment of property as now provided by statute, if the debt or damages claimed do not exceed one hundred dollars." One of the grounds provided by statute for issuing an attachment is that the defendant is not a resident of this state. The jurisdiction of magistrates to issue writs of attachment against the property of a nonresident was not affected by the constitution of 1895. The magistrate, therefore, had jurisdiction to render a judgment in rem, even if he did not have jurisdiction to render a judgment in personam. The record, however, shows that the defendant appeared on the day of trial, and contested the case upon its merits by denying each and every allegation of the complaint. This gave the magistrate jurisdiction to render a judgment in personam. Ex parte Perry Stove Co., 43 S. C. 176, 20 S. E. 980; Smith v. Walke, 43 S. C. 381, 21 S. E. 249; Rosamond v. Earle, 46 S. Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; James Aldrich, Judge.

Action by T. D. Burckhalter against J. B. Jones. Judgment of a magistrate for plaintiff was set aside by the circuit court, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

G. W. Croft & Son, for appellant. Henderson Bros., for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This action was commenced before a magistrate in Aiken county on the 16th of August, 1898. The defendant is not a resident of this state, but resides in Augusta, Ga. The magistrate granted an order that service of the summons and complaint be made upon the defendant by publication.

The following statement of facts appears in the record: "Thereupon the plaintiff filed with the magistrate an affidavit to obtain an attachment. Said affidavit was in due form and according to law. Upon said affidavit the magistrate, on August the 17th, 1898, issued a warrant of attachment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant. The sheriff, acting under said warrant of attachment, levied upon the personal property of the defendant found in this state and county, and on the 24th day of August, 1898, he served copies of the summons and complaint in the city of Augusta, Ga., that being the place of his residence." It is admitted that the copy of the summons served on the defendant had the name of the magistrate signed to it by the attorney for the plaintiff, but that neither upon the original nor upon the copy summons does the handwriting of the magistrate appear, but that both are entirely in the handwriting of the plaintiff's attorney. The defendant made default. The plaintiff appeared before the magistrate in person, and proved his cause, whereupon Magistrate Weeks entered the following judgment by default: "Case called. Defendant not appearing, and plaintiff proving his case, judgment given against him in favor of the plaintiff for $10.61 and $6.60 costs. This 23d day of September, 1898. L. R. Weeks, M. A. C. At this stage the defendant filed his petition for certiorari, as follows: "* * * The petition of John B. Jones respectfully showeth: That as set forth in the annexed affidavit of the petitioner and of E. P. Henderson, the judgment was rendered against your petitioner on the 24th day of August, 1898, at the suit of T. D. Burckhalter in the court of L. R. Weeks, Esq., magistrate for Aiken county, by default. The petitioner did not know of the rendering of said judgment until after the expiration of the five days allowed him by law to appeal from such judgment or to ask a new trial in said action before said magistrate. That the summons upon which said action is based was not legally issued, and that said magistrate did not have jurisdiction of the person of petitioner as such defendant on the day the said judgment was rendered. That said judgment is void in law, and defendant's and petitioner's only remedy in the premises is to be had by a writ of certiorari, so that, when all the proceedings of the said magistrate's court upon which said judgment is based is certified to your honor, you may act thereon as of right and according to law ought to be done.'" The circuit judge granted the petition, and, upon hearing the return, set aside the judgment without assigning the grounds for so doing. The plaintiff appealed upon exceptions, the first of which is as follows: "(1) That it is submitted that the magistrate had jurisdiction to issue an attachment against the property of a nonresident defendant; and that his honor, the circuit judge, erred in not so deciding."

Sections 10, 11, art. 17, of the constitution contain the following provisions:

Section 10: "All laws now in force in this state and not repugnant to the constitution shall remain and be enforced until altered or repealed by the general assembly or shall expire by their own limitations."

Section 11: "That no inconvenience may arise from the change in the constitution of this state and in order to carry this constitution into complete operation, it is hereby declared: First. That all laws in force in this state at the time of the adoption of this constitution, not inconsistent therewith and constitutional when enacted, shall remain in full force until altered or repealed by the general assembly or expire by their own limitations. * * * Second. All writs, actions, causes of action, proceedings, prosecutions, and rights of individuals, of bodies corporate, and of the state, when not inconsistent with this constitution, shall continue as valid. * * *"

At the time the constitution of 1895 was adopted, trial justices (now magistrates) did not have jurisdiction in a civil action cognizable by them, except in cases brought in the county where the defendant resided. Section 23, art. 5, of the constitution, providing that "every civil action cognizable by magistrates shall be brought before a magistrate in the county where the defendant resides," did not change the law then of force, but only made it permanent by incorporating it in the organic law of the land. While a judgment in personam could not, prior to the constitution of 1895, be rendered against the defendant unless the action was brought in the county where he resided, nevertheless his property, when he was a nonresident, was subject to attachment. Bird v. Sullivan (S. C.) 36 S. E. 494. The provisions of law as to judgments in personam and in rem were not inconsistent. Therefore, the right to attach property of a nonresident was not changed by the new constitution, and the magistrate had jurisdiction of the case.

The second exception is as follows: "(2) It is respectfully submitted that the omission of the magistrate to sign his name to the original summons was only an irregularity, which could have been cured by an amendment of the judgment, and his honor, the circuit judge, erred in holding that he had no power to do so." The omission to sign the summons was a mere clerical error apparent upon the face thereof. The order of publication was signed by the magistrate. The words, "Magistrate's Summons for Debt," and "By L. R. Weeks, Esq., to J. B. Jones," appear upon the face of the summons. A copy of the summons was served upon the defendant personally. Under these circumstances the defect was not jurisdictional. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

STATE v. CHILES.

JUSTIFIABLE SHOOTING—CHARGE—ILLUSTRATION—SELF-DEFENSE.

1. One who goes in search of another, believing him guilty of criminal intimacy with his wife, has no right to shoot him, though finding him holding his wife in his guilty embrace.

2. There is no error in giving as an illustration in the charge, on a trial for assault and battery with intent to kill, a case, from the reports of the state, where one was found guilty of murder, who, in shooting a pistol on a highway to frighten a horse, shot a person beside the road.

3. Failure to charge as to self-defense is not error, in the absence of a request therefor.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Abbeville county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Judge Chiles was convicted of aggravated assault and battery, and appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. N. Graydon, for appellant. Solicitor Ansel, for the State.

POPE, J. The defendant, Judge Chiles, was tried in September, 1899, for an assault and battery, with intent to kill, committed upon his wife, Adeline Chiles. He was convicted by the jury of an assault and battery of a high and aggravated nature, but recommended to the mercy of the court. After sentence he appealed to this court. The grounds of appeal are as follows: "(1) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If he went there hunting for Maurice Boyd, even though he found him in sexual embrace with his wife, he would not have had the right to shoot him,'—said charge not being in conformity to the facts of the case; the defendant having testified that he went to the house for the purpose of seeing his sick child, and there being no evidence showing that he went there looking for Maurice Boyd; and said charge being a comment upon the facts of the case, the judge, by said charge, having intimated to the jury that he thought the defendant went to the house, hunting for Boyd, when said charge should have left all the facts for the jury to determine. (2) Because his honor erred in charging the jury as follows, viz.: 'There is a case in the books in this state where a party was riding along the highway, down in Darlington or Marion, from a public speaking; and two parties were riding along, and one of them shot his pistol off to scare his horse, and a little negro was sitting on the fence, and was killed by the shot. The party who fired the shot was tried for murder, and found guilty, and he was hung, because he had no right to shoot his pistol on the public highway to scare his horse. He and the other man were quarreling, and he shot off his pistol to scare the horse,'—said charge not being responsive to the facts of the case on trial, being calculated to inflame the minds of the jury against the defendant, and being equivalent to telling the jury that, if the party in that case was guilty, how much more so in this one! (3) Because his honor erred in failing to charge the jury on the law of self-defense; the defendant having testified that he had not shot at the said Maurice Boyd until Boyd had fired his pistol at the defendant."

We cannot sustain the first exception, for the simple reason that the defendant admitted under oath that on the night he shot his wife he went to the house of his wife's sister to see his little girl, who was there sick, and also said, "And I went there * * * and I intended to shoot him [Maurice] if I caught him there." The judge, in his charge, was declaring the law, so that the jury might see how far, in its mercy, a husband could go, in safety, in dealing out punishment to that man who destroyed his family peace. The judge thus declared that the law held a husband guilty of manslaughter who killed the man while holding his wife in his guilty embrace, but that the law would not hold a husband guiltless who went in search of the man (Maurice) to kill him, believing he was guilty of criminal intimacy with his wife. The judge was correct in his statement of the law, and this exception is overruled.

So, too, we find that the second exception must be overruled. Certainly no better illustration of the law can be given than when it is taken from a case decided in our own state courts,—both circuit and supreme courts. The judge intended to give the jury an object lesson of criminal conduct flowing from an illegal act whose ultimate result was not intended.

The third exception must be overruled. No request was made by the defendant for the judge to declare the principles of law governing self-defense. The recent case of State v. Smith, 57 S. C. 489, 34 S. E. 657, 35 S. E. 727, concurred in by a majority of this court, is authority for the doctrine that, if a party wishes a specific charge as to the law, he must ask for it. While I thought such doctrine was error in the case cited, because the law required, in such a case, that specific directions should be given by the circuit judge in his charge to the jury, without any request therefor, yet in cases like the present it may be that the failure of the circuit judge to declare the law is not reversible error. This court has so held in the Smith Case. I bow to the inevitable, and declare it now sound law. The exception is overruled. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—RE-ENTRY—TRESPASS.

A landlord who forcibly re-entered after the expiration of a tenancy, and, without notice to the tenant, caused him and his household goods to be put into the street, is not liable therefor as a trespasser on real estate ab initio.

McIver, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; D. A. Townsend, Judge.

Action by Mary Rush and others against the Aiken Manufacturing Company and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The following are defendants' exceptions:

"(1) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in charging the jury that, even if they found that the tenancy of the plaintiffs had ended, and they had left the premises and gone away, and left it locked, yet, if they had the key of the premises, the defendant, as owner and landlord, would have no right to enter the premises by using force to do so, or could not enter at all, in that it is submitted that the law of South Carolina plainly is that a landlord, after the termination of a tenancy, cannot be made liable as a trespasser on the real estate because of the use of force in making the entry, or because he makes entry.

"(2) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in charging upon the facts, and in invading the province of the jury, in the illustrations that he made to the jury, such as when he supposed that the plaintiff Mrs. Rush had the key when she left, and that the house was locked and fastened; for one of the main contentions in the case was that the back door was unlocked and the house unfastened.

"(3) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in charging upon the facts, and in invading the province of the jury, in conveying to them his opinion as to the defendant acting hastily and improperly, when he charged the jury: 'The law can't be enforced by electricity; the law can't be enforced by motive power; * * * he can't act by electricity.'

"(4) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in charging, in substance, that if a tenancy has terminated, and a tenant has left the premises, the landlord must wait a reasonable time before entering, and that, if there is any right asserted against the landlord, he must not enter, but must apply to the law to adjudicate the same; in other words, 'if there is any right asserted, he must stop; if there is any right asserted, the law says, "Stop; I must adjudicate that right," '—whereas, it is submitted that the law is that the landlord has the right to enter, even if he has to use force in doing so.

"(5) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in charging the jury that it is the law that where a tenancy is vacated, and the tenant gone, and the landlord has entered upon his own premises, and has not seized the personal effects of tenant found upon the premises for rent or any charge against such personal property, that still the relationship of bailor and bailee arises as to such personal property, and that such landlord assumed liabilities as bailee of such personal property; whereas, it is respectfully submitted that under such circumstances no relation of bailor and bailee arises between such tenant and landlord as to such personal property found upon the landlord's premises.

"(6) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in refusing to charge the defendant's first request, as follows: 'It is alleged in the complaint that at the time in question the plaintiffs were in the lawful possession of the tenant house in question; and that the defendant, by force, unlawfully entered the same, and removed therefrom certain goods. The jury is charged that the law in South Carolina is that, if a "tenancy" has terminated (and that is a question in this case for the jury to ascertain from the evidence), the landlord cannot be made liable in damages as a trespasser for entry upon his land or in his houses, because of the use of force in making such entry, or because of removing goods therefrom. He may be held liable criminally for committing a breach of the peace, but he cannot be held liable civilly for entering upon his own premises and taking possession, if the "tenancy" of his tenant had ceased; and the jury is charged, if they find that the agent of the Aiken Manufacturing Company entered into the house in question, and removed the goods, and that at that time the "tenancy" of the tenant had terminated, then the Aiken Manufacturing Company had the right to enter, and they are not liable for removing the goods,'—in that, it is submitted, said request to charge contained proper propositions of law, and should have been charged.

"(7) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in charging the plaintiffs' first request to charge, and what he added thereto, as follows: 'The plaintiffs ask me to charge this: "That if the jury find that the plaintiff Mary Rush went into possession of the house of the defendant company as tenant lawfully,—that is, by and with the consent of the defendant company or its authorized agents,—and without process or notice to the plaintiff the defendant company, by the authorized agents or servants, went to said house, and forcibly or otherwise entered it, and removed the household goods and chattels of the plaintiff therefrom into the street, then the defendant company violated the law and the rights of the plaintiff, and is liable to the plaintiff in damages, if nothing else is shown, for such unlawful acts." I charge you that,—have charged you that. There must be reasonable notice; what is reasonable notice,—I mean reasonable inquiry; something to ascertain whether a right is asserted or not. And, if there is a right asserted, then the law must determine. Process of law must be taken out,'—in that it is submitted that said request to charge is contrary to what is the law, and especially is what his honor added thereto contrary to the law, for process of law need not be taken out if the tenancy has terminated."

Hendersons, for appellants. John R. Cloy and M. B. Woodward, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. The first paragraph of the complaint herein alleges the corporate existence of the defendant; its ownership, control, and operation of a large cotton factory in the town of Bath; also its ownership of other real estate in said town, consisting of a large number of tenement houses, which are rented to the operatives who work in said cotton mill. The second paragraph alleges that Mary Rush was the owner of the personal property hereinafter mentioned, and that she and her husband were in lawful possession of one of the tenement houses, occupying the same as a dwelling. The other allegations of the complaint necessary to understand the questions raised by the exceptions are as follows: "(3) That on the 30th day of November, A. D. 1898, while the said plaintiff was in the lawful possession of the said house as aforesaid, and occupied the same as a dwelling, and where the said household goods and furniture were kept, and while plaintiff was temporarily absent from home, the said defendant, the Aiken Manufacturing Company, willfully, wrongfully, unlawfully, maliciously, and in a high-handed manner, caused plaintiff's said dwelling house to be broken open by its co-defendant and agent, William Birmingham, and unlawfully and recklessly seized the said household goods of the plaintiff Mary Rush, and then and there, without authority or any notice whatever to either of the plaintiffs, wantonly, recklessly, wrongfully, maliciously, and in a high-handed manner, caused the said household goods and furniture to be put out and into the public street of the said town of Bath, and, in the face of the gaze, ridicule, and gibes of the public, placed them down in a wet and muddy place, and there left them unprotected. (4) That by reason of the facts above set forth the plaintiff was left without a home, and was greatly delayed in the effort to get her said household goods removed to a safe place; that the said goods were by the acts of the defendants badly injured, by being saturated with kerosene oil, broken, and thrown in the mud. (5) That the acts of the defendants were high-handed, unlawful, and malicious, and greatly outraged plaintiff's feelings and laudable pride, and exposed her to the gibes, taunts, and ridicule of the public; for all of which acts and grievances aforesaid plaintiff Mary Rush has been damaged in her property, injured in her person and feelings, to her damages in the sum of three thousand dollars."

His honor, the presiding judge, in his charge to the jury used the following language: "You will understand this complaint contains two causes of action,—one for breaking her house, and the other for damaging her property; and really there is another, for damage to her feelings; those two are not separated." The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $500. The defendants appealed upon exceptions, which will be set out in the report of the case.

The practical question raised by the first, fourth, sixth, and seventh exceptions is whether there was error on the part of the circuit judge in charging the jury that, even if the tenancy had terminated, the defendants did not have the right to use violence in making a re-entry until a reasonable time had expired, or due diligence had been used to ascertain if the plaintiffs asserted a right to the premises after the expiration of the tenancy, and, if they asserted such a right, that the defendants could only eject them by process of law. In the case of Willoughby v. Railroad Co., 32 S. C. 410, 11 S. E. 339, Mr. Chief Justice McIver uses this language: "The question now presented is analogous to the question which has frequently arisen, both in this country and in England, and this analogy has been recognized in many of the cases; and that is, how far a landlord who regains by force the possession of the demised premises after the possessory right of the tenant therein has determined can be held subject therefor to any other liabilities than those which the statutes of forcible entry and detainer have expressly annexed to his act. This question has been very fully considered in 4 Am. Law Rev. 420, and the authorities down to that time (April, 1870) elaborately reviewed. It is there shown that the idea that one who has authority to enter, and abuses that authority, either by unnecessary force in making the entry, or by some illegal act done after the entry has been effected, thereby becomes a trespasser ab initio, so as to make even his entry a trespass, is based largely upon two English cases, Hillary v. Gay, 6 Car. & P. 284, and Newton v. Harland, 1 Man. & G. 644, the former of which was a nisi prius decision, and the latter has been distinctly repudiated; and the rule in England now is that, though the landlord may be liable to an indictment for using force in making the entry, or to a civil action for damages for committing any trespass upon the person of the tenant, either in making the entry or after he has entered, provided a proper case to that end is made, yet he cannot be made liable as a trespasser ab initio on the real estate because of the use of force in making the entry, or because of the trespass upon the person of the tenant." He reviews the cases in this state, and shows that his conclusion is not only sustained by them, but by the overwhelming weight of authorities elsewhere. The article in 4 Am. Law Rev., to which the court referred, throws much light upon the question under consideration. There are expressions in the cases of Johnson v. Hannahan, 1 Strob. 313, and Sharp v. Kinsman, 18 S. C. 108, which are not in accord with the views herein announced, but we are satisfied that the true doctrine is stated in Willoughby v. Railroad Co. See, also, Smith v. Association (Mich.) 73 N. W. 395, 39 L. R. A. 410.

We will next consider the fifth exception. As every act of the defendant in connection with the personal property was alleged to be unlawful, and it did not retain the possession thereof, we fail to see how the question of bailor and bailee has any application to this case.

The conclusion which we have reached in considering the foregoing exceptions renders speculative the other questions in the case. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

McIVER, C. J. (dissenting). As I understand it, the rule in this state is that, where the tenancy has terminated, the landlord may enter upon and retake possession of the premises, and he commits no trespass upon the real estate in so doing, even if force is used in making such entry, and therefore, in such a case, he is not liable to a civil action for trespass. If, however, the landlord, in making such entry, commits a trespass upon the person of the outgoing tenant, or upon his personal property, he may be liable to a civil action for such trespass. But the simple removal of the tenant's personal property from the premises which had been rented does not constitute a trespass, unless it is effected by the use of unnecessary force, whereby such property is destroyed or injured.

STATE v. WEAVER et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW — JURY — CHALLENGES — PAYMENT OF POLL TAX—BURDEN OF PROOF —APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. The burden of proof is on one who challenges a juror on the ground of legal disqualification to show that such disqualification exists.

2. The statement of a juror on his preliminary examination that he could not state positively that his poll tax had been paid, but that he had arranged for his father to pay it for him, and had never asked him for the receipt, together with the testimony of the county treasurer that the poll tax of such juror had not been paid according to his books, but that his books were not absolutely correct, is not sufficient to support a challenge to the juror for cause on account of the nonpayment of his poll tax.

3. A judgment will not be reversed because a ruling of the trial court was based upon grounds that are erroneous, if the ruling was proper upon other grounds.

4. After defendants had exhausted their peremptory challenges, and the panel of jurors was exhausted, defendants consented to the recall of a number of the jurors they had objected to upon no other grounds than "their intention to exhaust the panel," but reserved the right to object to any of such jurors for cause. The cause was tried to a jury to none of whom any objection was made. Held, that defendants could not complain of their challenges for cause being overruled, since they did not exhaust their peremptory challenges.

5. Defendants offered the registration book in evidence on the preliminary examination of the jury, but the court refused to receive it at that time, saying that it might be offered "later on." Held, that defendants could not complain, where the offer was not renewed.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Edgefield county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Ed Weaver, Abner Harris, and Allen Jones were convicted of housebreaking and larceny, and appeal, and present the following exceptions: "Defendants, for the purpose of their appeal, hereby make and serve the following exceptions to the rulings of the presiding judge: (1) Excepts because the presiding judge erred in ruling 'that any man under sixty-five and over twenty-one who has a registration certificate is a qualified and competent juror, and it does not make any difference whether he has paid his poll tax or not.' (2) That his honor erred in ruling that 'if he has got his registration certificate that is prima facie and satisfactory evidence to me that he is entitled to it; even if you could show that he procured it prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1895, I would still hold that he was a qualified elector and a competent juror.' (3) That his honor, the presiding judge, erred in ruling: 'I will give you a chance to get a direct ruling from the supreme court. I rule any man that is twenty-one and under sixty-five, of good moral character, and selected by the board of commissioners to serve as a juror, is a qualified elector, and qualified in such sense he can be a juryman, whether he has paid his poll tax and has a registration certificate or not, or whether his name is on the tax books at all.' (4) That his honor erred in refusing to allow defendants' counsel to introduce evidence (that is, the registration book, to show that the registration certificate of juror was issued prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1895) to show the disqualification of the juror at the time that the juror was sworn on his voir dire." Affirmed.

M. P. Wells and S. M. Smith, Jr., for appellants. J. Wm. Thurmond, for the State.

McIVER, C. J. These defendants were indicted for and convicted of "housebreaking and larceny," and from the judgment entered they appeal to this court, upon the several exceptions set out in the record, which should be incorporated by the reporter in his report of the case.

The first, second, and third exceptions impute error to the circuit judge in certain rulings made by him as to the qualification of certain jurors presented to the prisoners while the jury was being impaneled, while the fourth exception imputes error in ruling out certain testimony which we shall hereinafter see was taken under a misconception of the ruling really made by the circuit judge.

We would first remark that it seems to us that all of these exceptions, except the fourth, which will be presently considered, raise speculative, rather than practical, questions. It does not appear that a single one of the jurors who sat upon the trial was objected to either peremptorily or for cause. On the contrary, it does appear that the defendants were tried by a jury of 12 good and lawful men, to whom no objection was interposed by the defendants or either of them.

The rulings excepted to were made by the circuit judge in reference to challenges for cause to certain of the jurors when presented, based upon the allegation that such jurors had not paid their poll taxes, and were therefore disqualified from serving as jurors. When, however, this cause of challenge was investigated, as well by the examination of the persons presented as jurors on the voir dire as by the testimony of the county treasurer, it was made to appear satisfactorily that all of them except one R. G. Parks had paid their poll taxes, and even as to Parks it was left somewhat doubtful whether he had or had not paid his poll tax; for while the county treasurer, speaking from his books, did say that Parks had not paid his poll tax, yet that officer admitted that his books were not absolutely correct, and mentioned instances in which his books showed that the taxes of certain persons named had not been paid, yet he had become satisfied from other sources that such taxes had in fact been paid, in one instance a receipt for the taxes having been produced when it appeared from the books that such taxes had not been paid. Now, when it is remembered that a board of jury commissioners—public officers—are charged with the duty of placing upon the jury list the names of such persons as are "not absolutely exempt as they may think well qualified to serve as jurors, being persons of good moral character, of sound judgment, and free from all legal exceptions," the presumption is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that these public officers have done their duty; and hence, when a juror whose name is on the jury list is challenged for cause, upon the ground that he is not legally qualified to serve as a juror, the burden of proof is upon him who charges that such juror is disqualified to show such disqualification. It does not seem to us that it has been satisfactorily shown that the juror Parks had not paid his poll tax. On the contrary, on his examination upon his voir dire, when he was asked if he had paid his poll tax, he replied, very candidly, "I could not state positively," but went on to say that he had arranged with his father to pay it for him, and, as he had never asked him for the receipt, he, of course, could not testify of his own knowledge whether the tax was actually paid or not. But it is manifest that he intended to pay it, and, no doubt, supposed it had been paid; and, as we have said, the testimony of the county treasurer did not satisfactorily show that the tax had not been paid. We do not think there was any error in overruling the challenge for cause to the juror Parks, and requiring him to be presented; for, even though the circuit judge may have been in error in the reason he assigned for overruling the challenge for cause, still, if the ruling was right, there is no reversible error; for, as has been frequently held, this court does not concern itself with the reasons given for rendering a judgment or making a ruling, but confines itself to the inquiry whether such judgment or ruling is right, and will affirm the same, even though the reasons given for such judgment or ruling may not be such as command the approval of this court. The appellants complain that they were thereby compelled to exhaust one of their peremptory challenges, but in view of the well-settled doctrine that the right of peremptory challenge is not a right to select the jury, but only a right to reject a certain number of jurors (State v. Wise, 7 Rich. Law, 412; Same v. Gill, 14 S. C. 411; Same v. Prater, 26 S. C. 202, 2 S. E. 108), and in view of the further fact that, so far as appears from the record before us, there was not a single person on the jury which tried the case to whom any objection was interposed, we do not see that the appellants have any legal ground of complaint; for it appears from the record before us that after the appellants had exhausted their peremptory challenges, and the clerk had reported that the panel of jurors was exhausted, the court directed the clerk to issue a venire for 12 jurors, whereupon one of the counsel for appellants made the following statement: "In order not to detain the court, we consent to recall a number of the jurors we have objected to, and to whom we objected upon no other grounds except our intention to exhaust the panel. Of course, our objections for cause we don't include in this proposition. We consent to this without, of course, waiving any of our rights. These men will be technically considered as new men drawn as a new panel,"—to which the court responded as follows: "That will do, then, with the understanding that it is done without prejudice to the rights of the defendants." This voluntary action on the part of the appellants practically amounted to a withdrawal of their peremptory challenges to such of the jurors as had been previously challenged, not because of any objection to them, but solely for the purpose of exhausting the panel, doubtless meaning their peremptory challenges; and therefore it cannot be properly said that the defendants had, in fact, exhausted their peremptory challenges. If so, then, under the case of State v. McQuaige, 5 S. C. 429, Same v. Price, 10 Rich. Law, 356, and Same v. Dodson, 16 S. C. 460, appellants could not avail themselves of any error in overruling their challenges for cause.

It only remains to consider the fourth exception, which complains of error in refusing to allow defendants' counsel to introduce in evidence the registration book. This exception, as we have intimated above, was taken under a misconception of the ruling of the circuit judge; for he did not refuse to allow the book to be offered in evidence. Defendants' counsel proposed to offer the book in evidence during the progress of the examination of the jurors upon their voir dire, and his ruling was that the book could not be introduced then, but the judge expressly stated that the book might be offered in evidence "later on," but the book was never afterwards offered in evidence. The fact, as stated by counsel, that they were deterred from afterwards offering it in evidence by reason of certain views expressed by the circuit judge, cannot affect the question. If they desired a specific ruling as to the admissibility of the book as evidence, they should have offered it at the time indicated by the judge, and then had a distinct ruling as to its admissibility; but this they did not do. However, under the views hereinbefore announced, the question whether this exception is well founded becomes immaterial, and renders further discussion useless. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit is affirmed.

STATE v. BAKER.

CRIMINAL LAW — CONFESSIONS — EVIDENCE — WAIVER OF ARGUMENT TO JURY—INSTRUCTIONS TO JURY—ILLEGAL SENTENCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. A confession made by a defendant, charged with grand larceny, upon his preliminary examination, voluntarily, and which is supported by a subsequent confession made by defendant in a letter, wherein he sought to relieve one of his alleged companions from the same charge, is competent evidence, though the confession may have been made without warning to defendant that it might be used against him.

2. Although the argument to the jury was waived, it was not error to permit the solicitor for the state to read to the jury, after the case was closed, certain papers that had been offered in evidence, and which contained confessions made by defendant.

3. An instruction that a confession made "freely and fairly, without the flattery of hope or the fear of force or violence," is evidence against the person uttering it, if found worthy of belief, is not erroneous.

4. A court has not the power to impose the sentence of perpetual banishment from the state upon a defendant convicted of grand larceny.

5. The reversal of a criminal cause because of the imposition of an illegal sentence will not entitle defendant to a new trial.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Newberry county; O.W. Buchanan, Judge.

De Villius B. Baker was indicted for the crime of grand larceny, and from a judgment of conviction he appeals. Reversed.

C. L. Blease, for appellant. T. S. Lease, for the State.

POPE, J. The defendant was tried and convicted of the crime of grand larceny in February, 1900, and after sentence appealed to this court. His grounds of appeal are four in number: "(1) Because the presiding judge erred in allowing the paper marked as an exhibit, and purporting to be a confession made by the defendant, Baker, at the preliminary trial held in this case, introduced and used as evidence in this case. (2) Because the presiding judge erred in allowing the solicitor to read the letter and said statement, or so-called confession, to the jury after the state had closed its case, and defendant's attorney had stated that the defense would offer no testimony, and that he did not desire to make any argument, and the solicitor stated, 'Neither do I, except to read the papers that have been introduced;' the papers not having been read when introduced, and the reading of them not having been asked for by the court or the jury. (3) Because the presiding judge erred in charging the jury: 'Well, the rule is this: Where it is done freely and fairly, without the flattery of hope or the fear of force or violence, it is admitted as evidence, as the truth, if you find it worthy of belief, against the person who utters it.' (4) Because the sentence imposed upon the defendant, Baker, is contrary to the statute law and constitution of this state."

In disposing of the question raised as to the admission of a confession of guilt by the defendant when reduced to writing, we may remark that the written confession in this case was made without solicitation, importunity, promise, or threat being used to induce the same. Confessions are admitted if made voluntarily. The jury is not required by law to believe a confession. The jury may accept a part and reject the balance. All the safeguards thrown around confessions by the law are to insure truth. Once is it ascertained that the confession is true, no great attention is paid to technical rules. For instance, it was at one time held that a person charged with crime must be admonished that, if he made any statement against himself, it would prejudice his case; but in State v. Workman, 15 S. C. 544, this court held that "no previous warning was necessary." In that case, quoting from 1 Greenl. Ev. § 299, it was said: "Neither is it necessary to the admissibility of any confession, to whomsoever it may have been made, that it should appear that the prisoner was warned that what he said would be used against him. On the contrary, if the confession was voluntary, it is sufficient, though it should appear he was not warned." The confession in question in the case at bar was fortified by a second confession in writing, against which no objection was urged. This second confession or admission was made in a letter written by the defendant, whereby, while inculpating himself, he sought to relieve from the charge of grand larceny one of his alleged companions in crime. This exception is overruled.

We overrule the second exception. Both the confession made by the defendant at his preliminary trial before J. W. Werts, Esq., as a magistrate, and also the letter written by the defendant, as it appears upon the record for appeal, were introduced as testimony. It was perfectly competent for the solicitor to read them to the jury.

The third exception relates to an alleged error of the circuit judge in expressing to the jury what was necessary to be shown in order to render a confession admissible in testimony. The judge said, in substance, that it must appear not to have been induced by promises nor extorted by force, and even then it must be believed by the jury. We see no reversible error here. The exception is overruled.

When we come to the fourth exception, we are bound to sustain it. After the prisoner was convicted of grand larceny, the circuit judge imposed the following sentence upon him: "The sentence of the court is that you, De Villius Baker, be confined in the state penitentiary, at hard labor, for the term of seven years. After you have served five years, you will be released, with the understanding that you leave the state, and never set foot in it again. If you do return, after notice on you by the state and a cause shown, you will be called back to serve out the full term (additional two years), so as to make seven years; otherwise, you will be discharged after service of five years." We do not recognize the circuit judge as possessing any right to impose such a sentence as is involved in the perpetual banishment of the defendant from the state set out in the sentence. But this infirmity does not extend beyond the mere sentence itself. There is no invalidity in the trial. This court held in the case of State v. Trezevant, 20 S. C. 364, when speaking of a defective or illegal sentence: "We do not see why it should affect the whole proceeding, and therefore render a new trial necessary. The error occurred after trial and conviction, and applied to the subsequent proceeding, to wit, the sentence only, and in reason the remedy should extend only so far as the error extended. The weight of authorities sustains this view. 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. § 1293; McCue v. Com., 78 Pa. St. 191, 21 Am. Rep. 7; State v. Johnson, 67 N. C. 59." The case of State v. Trezevant, supra, was reaffirmed in Same v. Jefcoat, 20 S. C. 383. We feel bound, therefore, to overrule all the other exceptions except the fourth, which last we sustain. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court, as to pronouncing sentence, be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the circuit court for resentence.

BLECKLEY et al. v. SHIRLEY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 27, 1900.)

HOMESTEAD — EXECUTION — REPORT OF APPRAISERS — EXCEPTIONS — TRIAL DE NOVO — EXEMPTION OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

1. Under Acts 1896, p. 191, providing that, if exceptions be filed to the return of commissioners appointed to appraise the homestead of a judgment debtor within 30 days after the filing of said report, the same shall be tried de novo upon testimony taken in open court, it is error to refuse a trial de novo to a judgment defendant, where exceptions to the report of the commissioners have been duly filed.

2. Where exceptions to the report of commissioners, appointed under Acts 1896, p. 191, to appraise the homestead of a judgment debtor, have been filed and placed on the calendar 14 days before the commencement of the term, no further notice is necessary to entitle the excepting party to a trial de novo.

3. An exception to the report of commissioners, appointed to appraise the homestead of a judgment debtor, that they failed to perform their duty as required by statute in laying off the homestead, should set out the facts on which the exception is based.

4. Under Acts 1896, p. 191, making it the duty of a sheriff, before selling the real estate of the head of a family, to cause the debtor's homestead to be set off and appraised, and for that purpose three appraisers shall be appointed, one by the sheriff, another by the creditor, and a third by the debtor, where the debtor refuses to make an appointment a valid return may be made by the two appraisers appointed by the sheriff and creditor.

5. An exception to the report of commissioners appointed to appraise the homestead of a judgment debtor, that the commissioners should have called a surveyor, and exhausted all legal means for giving the debtor his homestead, before recommending a sale, will not be considered on appeal, in the absence of facts in the record in support of the exception.

6. Under Acts 1896, No. 77, § 3, making the personal property of the head of a family exempt to the extent of $500, commissioners appointed to appraise the homestead of a judgment debtor, in making their report, should set apart the personal property of the debtor that is exempt from execution.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Anderson county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Bleckley & Fretwell and others against W. H. Shirley for the appraisement of a debtor's homestead and to enforce an execution. From a judgment refusing defendant a trial de novo on exceptions to the report of the commissioners appointed to appraise the homestead, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. E. Breazeale and J. N. Brown, for appellant. Bonham & Watkins and Tribble & Prince, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. The record contains the following statement of facts: The contest in this case grows out of the laying off a homestead for the defendant (appellant, W. H. Shirley) in real estate; and whether he was entitled to have his personal property set apart as exempted under the laws; and if two appraisers, under appointment of the sheriff of three, defendant having refused to name an appraiser, could make a valid return; and especially if appellant's homestead could be divided so as to retain his home and sell the excess, whereas the two appraisers returned that the same could not be laid off without injury to the remainder, and therefore placed a valuation of $1,750, to which exceptions were filed and at the hearing; and the court refused appellant an order of reference or the right of trial de novo in open court on said exceptions, for want of affidavit and notice, when the appellant had his witnesses in court ready for trial, and the case had been placed upon the calendar more than 14 days previous to the sitting of the court; whereupon the appellant gave notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after the date of said order of the court. The appellant's exceptions allege error as follows: "(1) Because his honor erred in refusing to hear and pass upon defendant's exceptions to the return of the commissioners by trial de novo in open court upon the testimony of the witnesses produced by the defendant (appellant). (2) Because his honor erred in holding want of notice of trial to plaintiffs by affidavit or notice, when it is submitted that in placing the case on the calendar fourteen days before the sitting of the court was sufficient notice of trial. (3) Because docketing the exceptions by appellant was sufficient notice of trial without affidavits or other notice of trial. (4) Because the return of commissioners shows that they did not perform their duty as required by the statute in laying off the homestead in kind and setting apart personalty exempt. (5) Because two appraisers appointed by the sheriff cannot legally act so as to deprive the appellant of his homestead in kind. (6) Because, said tract of land containing 116 acres, the commissioners should have called a surveyor, and exhausted all legal means for giving appellant his homestead in kind, before recommending a sale. (7) Because, the sheriff having levied on personal property, it was the duty of the commissioners to set apart appellant's personalty exempt from levy and sale under execution."

We will consider the exceptions in their regular order:

First exception: It seems that Act 1896, p. 191, was overlooked when the case was tried in the circuit court. That act provides: "If exceptions to said return be filed by either creditor or debtor within thirty days after the filing thereof the same shall be tried de novo upon testimony taken in open court." This exception is sustained.

Second and third exceptions: The case of Ex parte Ellis, 20 S. C. 344, cited with approval in Ex parte Ransey, 54 S. C. 517, 32 S. E. 522, decides that no further notice is required after filing exceptions to the return of the commissioners. These exceptions are sustained.

Fourth exception: There are no facts set out in the record tending to show that the commissioners did not perform their duty as required by the statute in laying off the homestead in kind. The question as to the personal property will be hereinafter considered in connection with the seventh exception.

Fifth exception: The case of Bank v. Evans (S. C.) 6 S. E. 321, discusses this question at length, and shows that the exception cannot be sustained.

Sixth exception: The record does not contain any facts enabling us to consider this exception.

Seventh exception: The law allows an exemption in personal as well as real property, and the commissioners in making their return should have taken into consideration the claim of homestead in the personalty. This exception is sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to the court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the views herein announced.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. SARRATT et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. June 30, 1900.)

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—LIABILITY OF PUBLIC OFFICER—WHO MAY MAINTAIN—APPEAL—JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—JURISDICTION.

1. An action of claim and delivery may be maintained against a public officer who has taken into his possession property under a warrant to enforce a lien for rent, where the party from whom the property was taken was rightfully in possession, and the property was not subject to the lien.

2. Where no notice has been given by a party that the supreme court would be asked to sustain the judgment on a ground other than that on which the circuit judge rested his judgment, such ground cannot be considered.

3. Code, § 255a, provides that if the person in whose possession the property shall be attached shall appear at the return of the writ and file his answer thereto, and deny possession or control of any property belonging to defendant, or claim the property as creditor in possession or in his own right or in that of another, or if any part of such property be claimed by another, then, if plaintiff be satisfied therewith, the proceedings may be dismissed at his costs; but, if he shall contest such return, an issue shall be made, and the party that shall prevail shall recover the costs, etc. Rev. St. 1893, § 2519, requires that the affidavits and statements to be used to obtain a warrant to enforce an agricultural lien shall conform as nearly as may be to the practice regulating the issuing of warrants of attachment under the Code procedure. Held, that Code, § 255a, applies only to proceedings by attachment, and not to proceedings for the enforcement of an agricultural lien, or a landlord's lien for rent, except in so far as relates to the affidavits and statements.

4. Under Rev. St. 1893, § 2522, authorizing a person whose crop has been seized under a lien warrant, on entering into bond in accordance with the law now in force in regard to action for claim and delivery of personal property, to recover immediate possession of the crop so seized, a third person in whose hands personal property is seized, which it is claimed is subject to a lien for rent, may, on executing the required bond, recover the same in an action of claim and delivery.

5. Under Act 1884 (18 St. at Large, p. 751) § 1, providing that a trial justice (now a magistrate) shall have jurisdiction to issue a warrant to enforce a lien for advances made for agricultural purposes, where the amount does not exceed $100, and section 2 (the provisions of which are substantially incorporated in Rev. St. 1893, § 2512), providing that every landlord leasing land for agricultural purposes shall have the right to enforce his liens for rent in the same manner, on the same conditions, and subject to the same restrictions as provided for persons making advances for agricultural purposes, a magistrate is authorized to issue a warrant to enforce a lien for rent, where the amount claimed does not exceed $100.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Cherokee county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by the Southern Railway Company against I. G. Sarratt and Robert F. Gibson. There was a judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Duncan & Sanders, for appellant. J. C. Jefferies, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. This was an action of claim and delivery for the purpose of recovering the possession of two bales of cotton, or, in lieu thereof, their value, alleged to have been taken from the possession of the plaintiff by the defendant Gibson. There was testimony tending to show that the cotton in question was grown upon the lands of Mrs. M. E. Huskey, which she had rented to one Wyatt, who seems to have transferred his lease to W. C. Lipscomb, who sublet the place to one Walker. The cotton seems to have been delivered (by whom does not appear) to Mrs. Huskey in payment of the rent due her, and was afterwards bought by one J. D. Jones on the 26th of October, 1898, who on that day sent it to the depot of the plaintiff company for shipment to Clifton, and on the morning of the next day, the 27th of October, received a bill of lading for the same from the plaintiff. On the afternoon of the 27th of October the cotton was seized by the defendant Gibson under a warrant issued by the defendant Sarratt, who was a magistrate, at the instance of the said W. C. Lipscomb, directed to the said Gibson as a special constable, requiring him to seize and sell the crop of one Walker, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the rent alleged to be due said Lipscomb by the said Walker. Thereupon the present action was commenced by the plaintiff. The case came on for trial before his honor, Judge Buchanan, and a jury. At the close of the testimony for the defense, counsel for defendants demurred to the evidence, which the court held to be practically a motion for the nonsuit, which not being sustained, defendants then demurred to the complaint on the ground that the facts stated therein are not sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that an action of "claim and delivery is not a proper proceeding to be brought for the recovery of possession of property which has been seized by an officer under a warrant to enforce a lien, whether it be a rent lien or for supplies"; but as the complaint did not show on its face that the defendants were officers, or that the cotton was seized under a warrant to enforce a lien for rent, the demurrer could not be sustained. The plaintiff then proceeded to examine Mrs. Huskey in reply, for the purpose of showing when and from whom she received the cotton in question for the rent due her, when, upon objection to some of the questions propounded to this witness, a colloquy between the court and counsel resulted in a ruling by the circuit judge expressed in the following language: "It is utterly immaterial who this cotton belongs to or didn't belong. If that was the same cotton that was grabbed by the trial justice, it is utterly immaterial who the cotton belonged to. My idea is this: If this jury comes up here with a verdict for the plaintiff, I would have to set it aside for this reason: Here is a magistrate, and here is a constable. They don't claim any interest at all; they don't say they have any interest at all; but they justify the proceeding, which is regular on its face, or which purports to be regular,—a warrant. Nobody sets up any claim for them at all. It turns out they have taken two bales of cotton rightfully or wrongfully in possession of the railway company under a lien warrant. The railway brings an action for claim and delivery. There was a summons attached, showing an action had been commenced against somebody. [If by this his honor means that there was a summons attached to the affidavit and lien warrant he is manifestly mistaken, for no such summons appears in the record before us, and we are unable to see any place for it, as a summons is never attached, so far as we are informed, to the papers issued to enforce a lien either for rent or for agricultural supplies.] Well, now, that is taken under the proceedings. Now, suppose it was absolutely void; are magistrates to be kicked and cuffed about that sort of way, and should they be made to guaranty the title of any property they may grab or seize under warrant? I don't think so. Now, my idea is that there ought to be a verdict directed by the court." Accordingly, the circuit judge directed a verdict in favor of the defendants, which was accordingly rendered, and, judgment having been entered thereon, the plaintiff appeals upon the several exceptions set out in the record, which need not be stated in detail here.

In the first place, it seems to us clear that the circuit judge erred in directing a verdict in this case, for the testimony certainly raised material issues of fact which it was necessary for the jury to pass upon. Indeed, this seems to have been the view of the circuit judge, as indicated by what he said in refusing to sustain the motion for a nonsuit. We need not, however, pursue this inquiry further, as the circuit judge seems finally to have based his ruling that this was a proper case to direct a verdict upon the grounds that an action of this kind, no matter what the facts may be, could not be maintained against a public officer who has seized and taken into his possession property under a warrant to enforce a lien for rent, even though the party from whom the property is taken was rightfully in possession of such property, and even though the proceedings to enforce the lien were absolutely void. We cannot subscribe to any such novel, and, as it seems to us, dangerous, doctrine. The circuit judge gives no definite reason for such a ruling, but he seems to think that because the officer has and claims no personal interest in the matter, and is simply executing the process of the law, he should not be liable to an action, as he could not be required to guaranty the title of any property which he may seize under the legal process. It never was doubted, so far as we are informed, that if a sheriff, one of the highest executive officers of the state, should, under a perfectly valid execution against A., seize the property of B., he would be liable, as a trespasser, to an action at the instance of B. Indeed, our reports prior to the war between the states are full of cases in which actions of this kind were maintained. If, therefore, it should be made to appear, upon investigation, that the cotton seized and taken from the possession of the plaintiff did not belong to Walker, or constituted no part of the crop raised by him on the rented premises, or for any other reason was not subject to the lien in favor of Lipscomb for rent, then the lien warrant would afford no justification whatever for such seizure, for the warrant only directed the seizure of "the crop of Rob Walker covered by the rent lien of W. C. Lipscomb."

It is contended, however, by counsel for respondents, that the ruling of the circuit judge should be sustained upon another ground, which, so far as appears, does not seem to have been taken in the circuit court, and therefore is not properly before us, inasmuch as no notice, as required by the proper practice, seems to have been given that respondents would ask this court to sustain the judgment upon a ground other than that upon which the circuit judge rested his judgment. But as no objection has been raised by counsel for appellant we will waive any objection on the part of the court, and consider the question presented by this additional ground. The contention on the part of the counsel for respondents is that this action cannot be maintained because, by statute, another remedy, exclusive in its nature, has been provided for a case like this. Waiving any new inquiry whether such remedy, even if applicable in a case like this, is exclusive, for the reason that we do not think it applicable, we shall proceed to show that it is not applicable to this case. The statutory provisions referred to are found in section 255a of the Code, which reads as follows: "If the person in whose possession such property shall be attached shall appear at the return of the writ and file his answer thereto, and deny the possession or control of any property belonging to the defendant, or claim the money, lands, goods and chattels, debts and books of account as creditor in possession, or in his own right or in the right of some third person, or if any part of the said property be claimed by any other person than such defendant, then, if the plaintiff be satisfied therewith, the party in possession shall be dismissed and the plaintiff pay the costs of the action. But if the plaintiff shall contest the said return or the claim of said third person an issue shall be made under the direction of the judge to try the question, and the party that shall prevail in said issue shall recover the costs of such proceedings of the opposite party, and judgment shall be given accordingly." And it is contended that by virtue of the provisions of section 2519 of the Revised Statutes of 1893, requiring that the affidavits and statements to be used to obtain a warrant to enforce an agricultural lien "shall conform as nearly as may be to the practice regulating the issuing of warrants of attachment under the Code of Procedure," the only mode of proceeding which a third person, in whose possession personal property is seized under a warrant to enforce an agricultural lien or a lien for rent of land, can adopt to assert his right to the property so seized, is that provided for in section 255a of the Code, and therefore that an action of claim and delivery for such property cannot be maintained. In the first place, that section is found in the chapter of the Code intended to provide for and regulate proceedings by attachment, which was a distinct and well-recognized remedy prior to the adoption of the Code, and prior to any statute providing for agricultural liens and the means of enforcing the same, or for liens for rent of land, except by distress warrant. In the next place, the phraseology used in section 255a of the Code manifestly shows that the provisions of that section apply only to proceedings by attachment, and not to proceedings for the enforcement of an agricultural lien or a landlord's lien for rent, except in so far as relates to the affidavits and statement upon which the application for a warrant to enforce such liens are based. This has been expressly held in Sharp v. Palmer, 31 S. C. 444, 10 S. E. 98, where, at pages 452, 453, 31 S. C., and page 101, 10 S. E., it is said by the court: "It will be observed that the act of 1885 (which is the act from which section 2519 of the Revised Statutes is taken) does not, as seems to be supposed by counsel for appellant, require that the practice in enforcing a lien shall conform to the practice under the attachment law; but the requirement is 'that the affidavit and statements to be used to obtain such warrants of seizure shall conform as nearly as may be to the practice regulating the issuing of warrants of attachment.' The only conformity required is in the affidavit and statements; not in the subsequent proceedings." Indeed, the two proceedings are so wholly different in their nature and effects that it would be practically impossible to make the one conform to the other, except in the nature and character of the affidavit, which is the initial act in each proceeding; and that is all that the act from which section 2519 of the Revised Statutes is taken undertakes to require. This view is recognized in Baum v. Bell, 28 S. C., at page 209, 5 S. E., at page 486, and in Monday v. Elmore, 27 S. C. 126, 3 S. E. 65. We do not think, therefore, that the contention on the part of counsel for respondents can be sustained. Besides, what seems to us to be conclusive of this matter, by section 2522 of the Revised Statutes of 1893 even a person whose crops have been seized under a lien warrant is expressly authorized, "upon entering into bond in accordance with the provisions of law now of force, in regard to action for claim and delivery of personal property, to recover immediate possession of the crop or crops so seized;" and, if so, surely a third person in whose hands personal property is found and seized, which it is claimed is subject to the lien, may also, upon executing the required bond, as seems to have been done by the plaintiff in this case, likewise bring an action to recover the immediate possession of the same.

The appellant, by the twelfth exception, which is insisted on in the argument here, has raised another question, which, though not necessary to the decision of the present appeal, may become important upon the new trial, which we feel bound to order, and therefore may as well be decided now. That exception is that a magistrate has no jurisdiction to issue a warrant to enforce a lien for rent. When the agricultural lien law was originally passed, a magistrate had no jurisdiction to issue a warrant for the enforcement of an agricultural lien; but by the act of 1884 (18 St. at Large, p. 751) it was provided in the first section that a trial justice (now a magistrate) shall have jurisdiction to issue a warrant to enforce a lien for advances made for agricultural purposes, in cases where the amount of such advances do not exceed the sum of $100; and in the second section of that act it is provided as follows: "That every landlord, leasing land for agricultural purposes, shall have the right to enforce his liens for rent in the same manner, upon the same conditions, and subject to the restrictions as are herein provided for persons making advances for agricultural purposes." Now, while it is true that the provisions of section 2 of the act of 1884, just quoted, are not incorporated in section 2518 of the Revised Statutes of 1898, which substantially embodies the provisions of sections 1 and 3 of the act of 1884, yet the provisions of section 2 of that act are substantially incorporated in section 2512 of the Revised Statutes; and hence we think that a magistrate is authorized to issue a warrant for the enforcement of a lien for rent as well as for advances for agricultural purposes, provided the amount for rent claimed shall not exceed the sum of $100.

Whether the defendant Sarratt, the magistrate who issued the warrant for the seizure of the property in question, can be held liable in this action, depends upon circumstances not now before us, and that question will not now be decided. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

McCARTER et al. v. CALDWELL et al.

PARTITION—COSTS—PARAMOUNT TITLE—PREVAILING PARTY—EQUITY—DISCRETION.

Though paramount title was an issue in partition proceedings, yet, where no separate judgment could have been entered on determination thereof, and all the rights of defendants who prevailed on such issue were not determined until final judgment because of the plaintiff's right to partition, and such issue was submitted for trial to the court, on the equity side of which final judgment was necessarily taken, it was within the discretion of the court to adjudge the costs against such defendants.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of York county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Fannie McCarter and others against J. M. Caldwell and others. From a judgment for costs in favor of the plaintiffs, J. M. Caldwell and another defendant appeal. Affirmed.

W. B. McCaw, for appellants. Hart & Hart, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. This is an action for partition of a tract of land, arising out of the following facts set forth in the decree of his honor, Judge Gage, to wit: "There were four brothers and a sister, to wit, Andrew, John, Mary, Samuel, and Nelson McCarter, and they died in the order named,—the first in 1868 and the last in about 1882. Andrew alone died testate. The plaintiffs are widow and children and devisees of Andrew. The defendants Sallie and Jackson are children of Mary. John and Samuel died childless. Nelson had children, but it is admitted any interest which they may have had was bought by Mrs. Lacey Caldwell in 1897, at a judicial sale for the partition of Nelson's lands, at which the clerk undertook to sell 'a parcel of land situated on the waters of Clark's Ford, * * * containing, by estimation, twenty-one acres, more or less.' It is admitted that Andrew owned an undivided one-half interest in the eighty-four acres, and that the plaintiffs now own the same. The other undivided half is the thing in dispute. The plaintiffs contend it was in Samuel, and, at his death, descended, one-third to children of Andrew, the one-third to children of Mary, the one-third to Lacey Caldwell, as purchaser of the interest of the children of Nelson. Stated differently, the plaintiffs claim: They together own an undivided four-sixths of the whole eighty-four acres; Mrs. Caldwell owns an undivided one-sixth of the whole eighty-four acres; Jackson and Sallie own an undivided one-sixth of the whole eighty-four acres. The defendants Jackson and Sallie do not answer, nor did they testify, so I am not informed about their position. The Caldwell defendants answer that Nelson owned twenty-one acres on Clark's Ford, acquired by adverse possession, and not as heir at law of Samuel or anybody else, and that Mrs. Caldwell purchased that land at judicial sale hereinbefore referred to; that Mr. Caldwell is seised by purchase of all and every interest in the land which Samuel ever owned. They contend for the one-half in dispute. The cause was submitted, and witnesses examined in open court, without a reference. * * * Plaintiffs ask for partition. Defendants Caldwell ask for a writ of possession for one-half of the whole eighty-four acres. There has never been a partition of the whole tract. The parties have so treated their interest at times, but the title has never been severed. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the plaintiffs are seised of an undivided one-half of the whole, which they are to hold under the limitations of the will of Andrew McCarter; that the defendants J. M. Caldwell and Lacey Caldwell are seised of the other undivided half therein; that it be referred to the clerk to take testimony upon the question whether a partition in kind betwixt the parties is practicable, or whether the interest of the parties will best be subserved by a sale of the whole, and a division of the proceeds. Upon the coming in of the report the plaintiffs will be entitled to a writ of partition or an order of sale; but, if the parties file with the clerk a waiver of the reference, then let the writ in partition issue forthwith."

The following admission is set out in the record: "On the issue of paramount title raised by the amended answers of J. M. and Lacey Caldwell, a jury trial was waived, and the entire cause, in all its phases, was submitted to Judge Gage for trial." The decree of Judge Gage is silent as to the payment of costs. The case was afterwards heard by his honor, Judge Gary, on the question left open by the decree of his honor, Judge Gage. Judge Gary, in his decree, says: "Upon the question of confirming the report of the commissioners in partition (the parties having waived the reference), the only issue upon which the parties differed was as to who should pay the cost of the action; the plaintiffs contending that the defendants should pay the costs, and the defendants contending just the reverse,—that the plaintiffs were liable for the costs." He adjudged that the defendants were liable for the costs of the action.

The exceptions assign error as follows: "First. For that his honor, Judge Ernest Gary, erred, as matter of law, in reaching the conclusion that the plaintiffs were the prevailing parties in the suit, the plaintiffs having been entirely cast in their claim to an undivided one-third interest in the moiety of the land described in their complaint, formerly owned by Samuel McCarter, which moiety Judge Gage held was the only thing in dispute. Second. Judge Gage, in his decree, having adjudged that the defendants J. M. and Lacey Caldwell are seised in fee of the undivided one-half of the tract of land formerly owned by Samuel McCarter, which he further adjudged was the only thing in dispute, his honor, Judge Gary, misconceived Judge Gage's decree, and erred, as matter of law, in not finding (1) that the defendants J. M. and Lacey Caldwell were the prevailing parties in the suit; (2) that the said defendants were at least prevailing parties on the issue of paramount title to the only thing in dispute in the cause. Third. For that his honor erred in not adjudging that the said defendants were entitled to the costs of the action, as prevailing parties in the suit. Fourth. For that his honor erred in not at least adjudging that the said defendants were entitled to all costs up to the date of the recording of Judge Gage's decree, as the prevailing parties on the issue of paramount title to the only thing in dispute. Fifth. For that his honor erred in making any order as to costs in advance of a motion to tax costs, and taxation of same being made by the clerk of the court of common pleas of York county."

The only practical question raised by the exceptions is whether there was error on the part of the circuit judge in adjudging that the defendants should pay the costs. That was the only contested question presented for his determination. When the court, in the exercise of its chancery jurisdiction, renders a judgment, it has the discretionary power to adjudge by whom the costs shall be paid. When, however, it renders judgment in an action at law, the costs follow, by operation of law, the result of the action, and go to the prevailing party. It becomes important, therefore, to determine whether the judgment is rendered by Judge Gage while exercising jurisdiction in a chancery case or in an action at law. Prior to the adoption of the Code, if a suit in equity had been brought for partition, and an issue was raised as to title, the court of equity had the right either to order an action to be instituted in the court of law, or to frame an issue as to title to be decided by that court, and returned to the court of equity. Knox v. Campbell, 52 S. C. 461, 30 S. E. 485; Railroad Co. v. Toomer, 9 Rich. Eq. 276. Under the former practice, if the defendant waived the right to have the issue as to title tried in the law court, the chancellor could determine, by a decree in equity, all the rights of the parties in interest. As hereinbefore stated, a jury trial was waived, and the entire cause, in all its phases, was submitted to Judge Gage for trial. The issue as to title was merely incidental to the action for partition, and a separate judgment could not have been entered on the determination of that issue. The final judgment had, of necessity, to be taken on the equity side of the court. When Judge Gage decided that appellants were the owners of one-half of the land, this did not determine all the rights of the parties, because the one-half interest of the appellants was undivided, and the plaintiffs were entitled to partition of all the lands according to the rights of the respective parties; thus showing the necessity for retaining the appellants as parties to the action until the final judgment in the case. As Judge Gage's decree did not determine who should pay the costs, there was no error on the part of Judge Gary in adjudging this question. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SKIPPER v. CLIFTON MFG. CO.

MASTER AND SERVANT—SERVANT'S NEGLIGENCE—MASTER'S LIABILITY.

An action will lie for injuries caused by defendant's employé, who, while in charge of its engine, wantonly and maliciously blew the whistle, resulting in plaintiff's mule running away and plaintiff being violently thrown to the ground, since the servant was acting within the scope of his authority, and negligently.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by Nancy Skipper against the Clifton Manufacturing Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, sustaining a demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Nash & Lease, for appellant. Simpson & Bomar, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The appeal herein is from an order sustaining a demurrer. The record contains the following description of the complaint, to wit: "The portion of the complaint necessary for the consideration of the question raised is as follows: The first three sections of the complaint allege the incorporation of the defendant, and that it was operating the railroad in question. They in no way involve the question raised. 'Sec. 4. That on said 22d day of August, 1898, the plaintiff was riding along the public highway, in close proximity to the said railroad of the defendant, in company with two friends, being drawn by a mule hitched to a buggy; that, while driving along the highway at said time and place, the plaintiff met the engine of the defendant, commonly called a "dummy," running along the said road, in charge of and managed by the agents and employes of the defendant. Sec. 5. That, after the said mule had almost passed the said engine or dummy, the engineer or agent of the defendant, while in the exercise of his duties in running said engine or dummy, maliciously, unnecessarily, willfully, negligently, mischievously, and wantonly, with utter disregard to the rights of this plaintiff, sounded the whistle of said dummy or engine, making a great and frightful noise, in close proximity to said mule. Sec. 6. That because of such malicious, unnecessary, willful, negligent, mischievous, and wanton conduct of the agent and employe of the defendant, the said mule was greatly frightened, became unmanageable, and caused to run; that the buggy was overturned, and plaintiff thrown violently to the ground; that she was severely shocked thereby, receiving severe blows on her head and side, because of which she has ever since been in a weak and injured physical condition. Sec. 7. That from said injuries, so inflicted, the plaintiff has suffered great physical and mental pain and anguish, has been compelled to expend money for medical and other attention, and is injured in her body for life, being in such condition that she is unable to perform her accustomed duties, to her damage three thousand dollars.'" (Italics ours.)

The issue before the court is thus stated in the argument of the respondent's attorneys: "Defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the acts of which the plaintiff complained were the acts of a servant of the defendant company, and not of the company itself, and that from such facts no liability could arise, as against the defendant." In the case of Rucker v. Smoke, 37 S. C. 377, 16 S. E. 40, the court uses the following language: "When one person invests another with authority to act as his agent for a specified purpose, all the acts done by the agent in pursuance or within the scope of his agency are, and should be, regarded as really the acts of the principal. If, therefore, the agent, in doing the act which he is deputed to do, does it in such a manner as would render him liable for exemplary damages, his principal is likewise liable, for the act is really done by him." Mr. Justice Pope, in Cobb v. Railroad Co., 37 S. C. 194, 15 S. E. 878, says: "If, while in defendant's employ, and in the exercise of the duties of the position for which he is employed, he maliciously, willfully, wantonly, etc., performed those duties, either with an intention to injure the plaintiff, or with reckless disregard of the safety of the plaintiff's property, the employer is liable." Those allegations of the complaint which we have italicized show clearly that it comes within the principle stated in the foregoing cases, and that his honor, the presiding judge, erred in sustaining the demurrer. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

TIEDMAN et al. v. MAYER et al.

MAGISTRATE'S COURT—JURISDICTION—APPEAL—BOND—AFFIRMANCE—QUESTIONS CONCLUDED.

Plaintiffs obtained judgment against defendants in a magistrate's court, and defendants appealed to the court of common pleas. The judgment in the magistrate's court was affirmed, and, not having been paid, plaintiffs sued on the bond. Held, that an answer alleging that the several judgments obtained in the magistrate's court were taken by default without sufficient notice, and attacking the jurisdiction of that court, states no defense, since the judgment of the court of common pleas, not having been appealed from, is conclusive of these questions.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Barnwell county; Townsend, Judge.

Action on an appeal bond by George W. Tiedman and Irvin B. Tiedman, co-partners as George W. Tiedman & Bro., against J. C.

Mayer and J. L. Lightsey, co-partners as Mayer & Lightsey, and J. W. Deer. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

I. L. Tobin, for appellants. R. C. Hardwick and John R. Bellinger, for respondents.

POPE, J. The plaintiffs sued the defendants in the court of common pleas for Barnwell county to recover from such defendants the sum of $324.46, with interest thereon from the 24th day of November in the year 1898, and costs. The complaint set out four causes of action,—one for $67.79, and $7 as costs, with interest thereon from the 24th November, 1898; one for $84.79, and $7 as costs, with interest thereon from the 24th November, 1898; one for $99.35, and $7 as costs, with interest thereon from the 24th November, 1898; and one for $44.35, and $7 as costs, with interest thereon from the 24th November, 1898. In order the readier to apprehend the issues here to be considered, it will be better that one cause of action in its entirety be reproduced, as all the other causes of action are identical with the first cause of action except in the amount: "(1) That, at the time hereinafter mentioned, they, the said George W. Tiedman and Irvin B. Tiedman, were, and still are, partners in trade, under the firm name of George W. Tiedman & Bro., and that at the same time the defendants J. C. Mayer and J. L. Lightsey were partners under the name of Mayer & Lightsey. (2) That on the 2d day of April, 1898, the plaintiffs, as partners as aforesaid, recovered a judgment in the court of Magistrate A. P. Woodward, at Blackville, in the county and state aforesaid, against the defendants J. C. Mayer and J. L. Lightsey, co-partners as Mayer & Lightsey, for sixty-seven and $^{79}/_{100}$ dollars, and five dollars costs. (3) That on the 5th day of April, 1898, the said defendants J. C. Mayer and J. L. Lightsey, having appealed from said judgment to the circuit court of said county, and the defendant J. W. Deer, as their surety, entered into their joint undertaking, by which, after reciting the said judgment so recovered as aforesaid, and the intention to appeal therefrom, they undertook that the said appellants would pay all costs and damages which might be awarded against appellants on said appeal, not exceeding five hundred dollars; and also, if the said judgment so appealed from, or any part thereof, should be affirmed, or the appeal be dismissed, the said appellants would pay the amount directed to be paid by the said judgment, or such part of the amount if it be affirmed only in part, and all damages and costs which should be awarded against said appellants on the said appeal; and the enforcement of said judgment was thereupon stayed as the consideration for such undertaking. (4) That afterwards, to wit, at the November, 1898, term of the circuit court of common pleas for said county, the said appeal was dismissed, and the judgment of the magistrate's court was affirmed, with costs; and that thereupon a judgment of the said court of common pleas was entered against the appellants in favor of plaintiffs for the said sum of sixty-seven and $^{79}/_{100}$ dollars, with interest thereon from the 24th day of November, 1898, and seven dollars costs, and execution issued to enforce the same, which has been returned nulla bona; and that no part of said judgment has been paid, and the plaintiffs are still the owners and holders thereof." To the complaint the defendants interposed the following joint answer: "The defendants above named, answering the complaint herein, allege that the several judgments mentioned in the complaint were taken by default against the defendants Mayer & Lightsey upon insufficient notice; that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to enter said judgments against said defendants; that said judgments, and the undertaking on appeal upon which this action is brought, are null and void." After argument, the presiding judge directed a verdict for the plaintiffs on the ground that there was no defense set up in the answer; it admitted the facts set out in the complaint. The defendants now appeal as follows: "That the circuit judge committed error in directing a verdict against the defendants upon the pleadings in this case, and refusing to allow defendants to show, as alleged in their answer, that the magistrate who rendered the judgment in this case was without jurisdiction, and that the bond upon which this action was brought is null and void."

It should be recalled that the defendant J. W. Deer, by the stipulations of the bond he signed with his co-defendants, Mayer & Lightsey, bound himself to pay whatever sum, under $500, which the circuit court (the court of common pleas for Barnwell county) should adjudge his co-defendants Mayer & Lightsey due in the appeals from the magistrate's judgment against said Mayer & Lightsey. This action—giving the appeal bond by all the defendants—bound them to litigate their liability under said magistrate's judgments in the court of common pleas, to which forum said judgments were transferred for settlement by their joint act. So, when the appeals came on to be heard in the court of common pleas for Barnwell county, inasmuch as that court is a court of general jurisdiction, and as such was clothed by law with the full power to hear and determine any and all appeals from a judgment or judgments rendered in the magistrate's court, the judgment of such court of common pleas must be presumed to conclude all questions of law and fact connected with such judgments of the magistrate's court. No appeal was taken from the judgment of such court of common pleas. All these facts and matters of law are set out in plaintiffs' complaint herein. They are not denied by the defendants. The answer sets up that the judgments rendered in the magistrate's court which they appealed from were taken by default without sufficient notice. Clearly, this attempted issue was included in those decided by the court of common pleas when it heard the appeals. Then the answer says the magistrate was without jurisdiction "to enter said judgments." When the defendants entered no appeal from the judgments of the court of common pleas dismissing their appeals from the magistrate's judgments, all questions which arose, or might have arisen, in the court of common pleas, were settled conclusively against them. Hence, when all these matters in the case at bar came up before the circuit judge, and he held that the answer of defendants set up no issuable defense, he committed no error. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

KELLY v. LEHIGH MIN. & MFG. CO.

EQUITY — JURISDICTION — VENDOR AND PURCHASER—RIGHTS OF PARTIES—TITLE PAPERS — RECOVERY — PLEADING — ANSWER — SUFFICIENCY.

1. Code, c. 138, which makes more effective the common-law remedy of detinue, does not affect the jurisdiction of courts of equity to decree specific delivery of title papers wrongfully detained from persons entitled to their custody and possession.

2. Where registry laws are in force requiring conveyances of land to be recorded, a vendee of lands is not, as a matter of law, entitled to his vendor's muniments of title as at common law.

3. Where plaintiff in a suit in equity based its rights to recover title papers affecting lands conveyed to it by defendant on the ground that whoever is entitled to land has the right to all title papers, and that defendant agreed to deliver all title papers he had, an answer which put in issue the agreement was sufficient.

Appeal from circuit court, Wise county.

Bill by the Lehigh Mining & Manufacturing Company against one Kelly. From a decree for complainant, defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Mathews and O. M. Vickars, for appellant. R. A. Ayers and Bullitt & Kelly, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. A court of equity has jurisdiction to decree the specific delivery of title papers to heirs at law, devisees, and other persons properly entitled to the custody and possession of the title deeds of their respective estates, where they are wrongfully detained or withheld from them. This is an old and well-settled head of equity jurisdiction. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 703; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 185; Snoddy v. Finch, 9 Rich. Eq. 355, 70 Am. Dec. 216.

Chapter 138 of the Code, which makes more effective the common-law remedy of detinue, does not affect that jurisdiction, for, where courts of equity have once acquired jurisdiction, a subsequent statute which gives to or enlarges the jurisdiction of the common-law courts over the same subject does not deprive the equity courts of their jurisdiction, although the statute may furnish a complete and adequate remedy at law unless the statute conferring such jurisdiction uses prohibitory or restrictive words. Filler v. Tyler, 91 Va. 458, 22 S. E. 235.

The appellee, the complainant in the court below, based its right to recover the title bonds, agreements, deeds, and tax receipts pertaining to the lands conveyed to it by the appellant upon two grounds: First, that it is an established principle of law that whoever is entitled to the land has the right to all the title papers affecting it; and, secondly, that the appellant expressly agreed, in entering into the contract for the sale of the land, that he would turn over to the appellee all the title papers which he had, under and by virtue of which he claimed title to the land.

It was conceded that it is an established principle of the common law in England that the party entitled to land had also a right to all title deeds affecting it, and that they passed with the land by the conveyance without being named in it. Harrington v. Price, 3 Barn. & Adol. 170, 23 E. C. L. 83, 84; 2 Sugd. Vend. c. 11, § 4; Williams, Real Prop. 434. But it is denied that any such rule exists in this country.

In England there was no general system of registering conveyances of real estate. Possession of the title deeds was an evidence of ownership, and they, or abstracts of them, were shown to the intended purchaser for his examination in negotiations for a sale. When the sale was made they were delivered to the grantee almost as a matter of course in all conveyances of the fee. No transfer of land could be safely made without them, and no one was supposed to have a right to their possession unless he had some claim upon or interest in the land. Whenever a supposed owner offered his estate for sale or mortgage, it was necessary for him to produce his title papers, and their absence from his possession, when demanded, cast a suspicion upon his title, and put the other party upon inquiry. 8 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1264, note 1; 2 Minor, Inst. (4th Ed.) 353, 354. But in this state there is a general system of registering title papers to land, and persons desiring to purchase or secure loans by deeds of trust or mortgages look to the records to ascertain the condition of the supposed owner's title, and seldom, if at all, look to the original title papers or make inquiry as to the owner's possession of them.

In this state the records furnish evidence of his title, as a general rule, and copies therefrom, equally with the originals, are admissible in evidence. Code, § 3334.

Under our registry laws and statute of conveyances the deposit of title deeds creates no lien as against a subsequent bona fide purchaser or incumbrancer, as it did in England. McClanachan v. Siter, 2 Grat. 314; 2 Minor, Inst. (4th Ed.) 353, 354.

The reasons for the common-law rule no longer exist here. In this state, and generally in the United States it is believed, it is the general practice for the grantor to retain his own title papers instead of delivering them to his grantee. 1 Cruise, Dig. tit. 2, c. 1, § 39 (Greenleaf's note); 1 Greenl. Ev. § 571, note 3; 3 Washb. Real Prop. p. 375, § 65; Eaton v. Campbell, 7 Pick. 10, 12; White v. Hutchings, 40 Ala. 258, 88 Am. Dec. 766.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the common-law rule in question is not in force in this state, and that the grantee is not, as a matter of law, entitled to demand of his grantor the original muniments of title, as he was in England. Where the reason for a rule of law has ceased, the law itself ought to and does cease. Broom, Leg. Max. (7th Ed.) 159.

Upon the calling of the cause at the December term of the court (the first term after the case had been matured at rules), the appellant appeared and filed his answer, in which he denied the existence of the agreement set up in the bill. His answer was excepted to upon the ground that it stated no defense to the case made by the bill. At the same time the appellant moved the court to continue the case upon the ground that the appellee had not closed its depositions until Monday, the 28th day of November, 1898, and that he was not notified of that fact until the 29th of that month; that at that time he was engaged, as chairman of the board of supervisors of Wise county, in the business of said board, and was so engaged until Friday, the 2d of December following, and that he did not have time to prepare his defense by taking his depositions, which he was advised were material to his defense. The court overruled his motion to continue, and sustained the exception to his answer, and, the appellant not desiring to file any other or further answer, the court was of opinion that the appellee was entitled to the relief sought by the bill, and so decreed. The action of the court in overruling the motion to continue the cause, and in sustaining the exception to the answer, is also assigned as error.

From what has been said in discussing the demurrer to the bill, it is clear that the court erred in sustaining the exception to the answer. It put in issue the agreement set up in the bill, and the exception to it ought to, and doubtless would, have been overruled, if the court had not been of the opinion that the appellee was entitled to the possession of the papers sued for as a matter of law, in accordance with the English rule. In no other way can the court's action in sustaining the exception be understood. Having this view, the court, of course, overruled the motion to continue, for there was no issue of fact upon which to take proof, and a continuance of the case could have been no benefit to the appellant.

The appellee insists that as the action of the court in refusing to continue the case was not plainly erroneous, and the decree complained of granted only such relief to the appellee as he was entitled to upon the record as it then stood, treating the exception to the answer as overruled and the answer properly in the case, the decree complained of ought not to be reversed.

It is well settled that every motion for a continuance is addressed to the sound judicial discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case, and that an appellate court will not reverse it upon the ground that a continuance was improperly granted or denied unless its action is plainly erroneous. Hite's Case, 96 Va. 489, 493, 31 S. E. 895, and authorities cited. If the circuit court had held that the answer was sufficient, and then overruled the motion to continue, it would have exercised that judicial discretion contemplated in such cases, and we are not prepared to say that its action ought to be reversed, although, under the circumstances of the case, the better practice would have been to have continued the case in order that the appellant might have taken proof to meet the appellee's depositions, taken and closed so recently before the term of court as not to give the appellant time to take his proof before the term commenced.

Without, therefore, intending to infringe in any manner upon the rule which governs this court in considering the action of a trial court upon a motion to continue, where it was necessary, in the view the court took of the case, to consider and decide the sufficiency of the grounds upon which the motion was based, we are of opinion that the decree appealed from should be reversed in so far as it sustained the exception to the appellant's answer, and the cause be remanded to the circuit court for further proceedings to be had therein, not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

RIELY, J., absent.

NATIONAL MUT. BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N v. BLAIR.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. July 5, 1900.)

TRUST DEED—PRIORITY—RELEASE—ACTION TO SET ASIDE—LACHES.

1. In a suit to set aside a release of a trust deed securing purchase-money notes on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, where plaintiff's assignor of the note had knowledge of the alleged fraud, and permitted defendant to sell the property under its deed of trust acquired subsequent to the release, and to purchase and hold the property four years, plaintiff is estopped, by reason of the laches of her assignor, to impeach the validity of the release.

2. Where a purchaser of land took a trust deed, when he sold it, to secure the payment of purchase-money notes which he had assumed, and his grantor afterwards released the trust deed held by him, and acknowledged satisfaction of the notes secured by the deeds, it operates as a release of the trust deed held by his vendee.

3. The fact that a trust deed securing purchase money may not have been properly acknowledged and recorded will not affect the priority as between it and another trust deed, where the owner of the latter deed had actual knowledge of the existence of the former.

Appeal from circuit court of city of Roanoke; J. A. Dupuy, Judge.

Suit by Gertrude Blair against the National Mutual Building & Loan Association to set aside a release of a trust deed. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Cocke & Glasgow, for appellant. A. A. Phlegar and Scott & Staples, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. Without expressing an opinion upon the question raised by the demurrer, but conceding, for the purposes of this case, that the appellee has a right to be heard, we are of opinion that, upon the merits of the case presented by this record, she cannot prevail.

By deed of August 20, 1890, J. M. Watts sold and conveyed to Mary O. Willmeth a lot in the city of Roanoke, and took from the grantee a deed of trust securing to himself the payment of two interest-bearing purchase-money notes, each for $2,333.33. On the margin of this deed of trust the following release is recorded:

"I hereby release the lien of the deed of trust on the property herein conveyed, the amount secured therein having been satisfied. Given under my hand, this 20th June, 1891. J. M. Watts. Attest: W. F. Bryant, Deputy Clerk."

On October 23, 1890, Mary O. Willmeth sold and conveyed this lot to Junius B. Fishburne, who assumed the payment of the two notes secured thereon to J. M. Watts.

On March 25, 1891, Junius B. Fishburne sold and conveyed part of the same lot to Mary M. Simmons, who assumed, as part of her purchase money, the payment of the two notes secured thereon to J. M. Watts. Contemporaneously with this deed, the grantee executed a deed of trust to secure the grantor, as appears from the following clause of the deed:

"In trust to secure Junius B. Fishburne the payment of the sum of $7,666.66, and interest, unpaid purchase money on above property, said sum being evidenced by one note of Mary M. Simmons, bearing even date herewith, and payable, with interest, to said Fishburne, 30 days from date, in the sum of $3,000.00; and also two notes drawn by Mary O. Willmeth, dated August 20, 1890, and payable one and two years from date to James M. Watts, each in the sum of $2,333.33, with interest, the payment of which two notes the said Mary M. Simmons has assumed."

On the margin of this deed of trust the following release is recorded: "The note herein described, for the sum of $3,000.00, payable to me thirty days after its date, has been fully paid, and I hereby acknowledge the receipt of same. Given under my hand this 28th day of May, 1891. Junius B. Fishburne. Attest: W. F. Bryant, D. C."

On the 16th day of May, 1891, Mary M. Simmons conveyed this lot to George J. Peet in trust to secure the appellant association a loan made by it of $5,000.

On June 16, 1891, May M. Simmons gave a deed of trust on this same lot to secure James M. Watts one of the notes for $2,333.33, executed to him by Mary O. Willmeth, August 20, 1890, the other of said notes having been paid off and discharged; the deed of trust stating on its face that the note secured had been "made by Mary O. Willmeth, and assumed by May M. Simmons."

On July 20, 1893, Rush U. Derr, who had been substituted as trustee in the deed securing the appellant, sold the lot in question, and conveyed the same to appellant.

After this sale and conveyance, nothing appears touching these transactions until the 19th day of August, 1897, when the bill in this cause was filed, claiming that the second note executed by Mary O. Willmeth to J. M. Watts was due and unpaid, and that the same was assigned by Watts on the 10th day of December, 1896, without recourse, to C. C. Ellis, who had on the 21st day of December, 1896, assigned the same without recourse to the complainant, Gertrude Blair, who is the appellee here.

The substantial allegations of the bill are: First, that the release of J. M. Watts, dated June 20, 1891, indorsed on the margin of the deed of trust, dated August 20, 1890, from Mary O. Willmeth to secure J. M. Watts the two notes of $2,333.33 each, had been secured by fraudulent representations made to Watts by Rush U. Derr, agent and attorney for the appellant building association.

Second, that the Fishburne deed of trust, dated March 25, 1891, also secured the note asserted by appellee, and that the lien of that deed had not been released as to said note, and was still a valid security therefor; and,

Third, that the deed of trust given to secure the appellant association was acknowledged by the grantor before Rush U. Derr, who was alleged to be the attorney for the association, and was therefore void as to the debt set up by the appellee.

The prayer of the bill is that the release made by Watts, June 20, 1891, on the margin of the deed of trust of August 20, 1890, be set aside and annulled as having been obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations and concealment on the part of the appellant association, through its agent and attorney, Rush U. Derr; that the note asserted by appellee be declared to be a valid subsisting lien upon the property in question, superior to the appellant association or any other person; and that said property may be sold to satisfy the same.

J. M. Watts, the original beneficiary of the claim here asserted, is the only witness to prove the alleged fraud. The case as presented by his testimony is that he held the deed of trust of August 20, 1890, upon the property; that Rush U. Derr, the attorney for appellant, came to his house several times to urge and persuade him to release his lien; that he finally yielded, and made the release, and took a new deed of trust to secure the bond here set up; that Derr told him that the transaction did not alter his position, and that he would still have the first lien. From the record, Watts appears to be an intelligent business man, and it is difficult to understand what was, in his view, to be accomplished by the apparently useless performance of releasing one first lien to immediately put upon record another of the same dignity; and this, when he knew that appellant was lending money on the property, and had, as he says, always understood that a building and loan association would not lend money unless they had a clear title. This opinion, however, need not be prolonged to consider whether or not Watts was induced by false representations to execute the release; for, if he was, his subsequent conduct would preclude a recovery.

It is well settled that, where a party desires to repudiate a transaction upon the ground of mistake or fraud, he must, upon the discovery of the fraud, or upon the discovery of facts and circumstances from which such knowledge would be imputed to him, assert his remedial rights with diligence and without delay. To delay instituting judicial proceedings, although for a less period than that prescribed by the statute of limitations, may be, and generally will be, regarded as an acquiescence, and this may be, and generally will be, a bar to any equitable remedy. Great punctuality and promptness of action by the deceived party, upon his discovery of the fraud, is required. Unnecessary delay after such knowledge will defeat the equitable relief. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 817, 897, 917.

"Acquiescence or delay for a length of time after a man is in a situation to enforce a right, and with a full knowledge of the facts, is, in equity, cogent evidence of a waiver and abandonment of the right. * * * But as soon as a man with full knowledge, or at least with sufficient notice or means of knowledge, of his rights, and of all the material circumstances of the case, freely and advisedly does anything which amounts to the recognition of a transaction, or acts in a manner inconsistent with its repudiation, or lies by for a considerable time, and knowingly and deliberately permits another to deal with the property, or incur expense, under the belief that the transaction has been recognized, or fully and advisedly abstains for a considerable lapse of time from impeaching it, there is acquiescence, and the transaction, although originally impeachable, becomes unimpeachable in equity. Nor will the mere notice or assertion of a claim, unaccompanied by any act to give it effect, keep alive a right which would be otherwise barred." Kerr, Fraud & M. pp. 299, 301, 311.

In accordance with many previous decisions by this court, it is said in the recent case of Hurt v. Miller, 95 Va. 32, 27 S. E. 831: "A party who intends to repudiate a contract on the ground of fraud should do so as soon as he discovers the fraud; for if, after the discovery of the fraud, he treats the contract as a subsisting contract, or if, in the interval while he is deliberating, an innocent third party has acquired an interest in the property, or if, in consequence of his delay, the position even of the wrongdoer is affected, he will be deemed to have waived his right of repudiation. And, whenever a party to a contract has a right to elect whether he will avoid it, his election may be manifested by acts as well as words, and, when once made, is final, and cannot be retracted."

In the case at bar it appears that in June, 1892, about one year after the release in question was made, J. M. Watts knew that appellant had the first lien, and that he held a second lien. He knew that Mrs. Simmons had bought the property, and given appellant a deed of trust upon it. He kept himself informed as to the manner in which the dues to the association were being paid. He knew that default had been made in the payment of the dues, and that the association had advertised the property under its deed of trust to be sold in June, 1893. He practically admits that he requested a postponement of the sale, and knew that it would take place on the 20th of July, 1893. He contemplated buying the property to save himself, but finally abandoned the idea, because, with a second mortgage, he thought he would lose. He permitted the association to become the purchaser of the property, and to receive a deed therefor, and to hold title for more than four years, without a suggestion, so far as the record shows, of the claim now set up. Nor is J. M. Watts now seeking to enforce said claim. On the contrary, he sold the bond in question, amounting, with interest, to more than $3,- 000, without recourse, to C. C. Ellis, for the paltry sum of $27, who sold it in a few days thereafter to the appellee. It is inconceivable that Watts would have parted with a bond for that amount, for such a consideration, if he had believed that there was any valid ground for making the claim now asserted by his assignee. His whole course in the matter shows an acquiescence in the superior right of appellee, and a purpose not to assail or attempt to impeach that right.

It further appears that the situation and circumstances of the parties to the alleged fraudulent release have materially changed during the long period of inaction and acquiescence by Watts. May M. Simmons and Rush U. Derr, the only two persons who could meet and explain the charge of fraud now made, are dead. The property has depreciated to less than one-third of its former value, and Mrs. Simmons, the debtor of appellee, died insolvent. The rule is general that where there has been a change of circumstances or relations which would render either an execution or rescission of a contract a hardship to the defendant, and this change grows out of an unexcused delay on the part of the plaintiff, the change and delay together will constitute a sufficient ground for denying equitable relief. Darling v. Cumming's Ex'r, 92 Va. 521, 23 S. E. 880; Hurt v. Miller, 95 Va. 32, 27 S. E. 831.

The appellee can occupy no better position than her assignor. Inasmuch, therefore, as J. M. Watts is estopped by reason of his laches and acquiescence to impeach the validity of the release of June 20, 1891, made by him, his assignee is also denied the right to call that transaction in question.

The contention that J. M. Watts is entitled to the benefit of the Fishburne deed of trust dated March 25, 1891, is not tenable. The clause relied on for this position has been already quoted. It is clear that the parties to that deed were not securing Watts. He already had a deed of trust upon the same property. In his purchase, Fishburne had assumed the Watts debt, and the reference to it in the trust deed of March, 1891, was merely to recognize the assumption of the same debt by Mrs. Simmons, and to protect Fishburne in the event that he should be called upon to discharge the Watts lien before Mrs. Simmons had fulfilled her obligation to pay the same. In releasing the lien of his own deed of trust, Watts stated of record that the amount secured thereby was satisfied. The debt was at that time owned by Watts, and was in his possession, and when he marked it "Satisfied" it was also discharged as to Fishburne, and the deed of trust taken for his protection was satisfied as to such debt as effectually as if the indorsement of satisfaction had been made thereon.

It is further contended that the deed of trust in favor of the appellant association was acknowledged before Rush U. Derr, the attorney for the association, and was therefore not properly recorded; that, not being properly recorded, the deed of trust securing appellee, though subsequent in time and subsequent in recordation, had become by operation of law a first lien upon the premises. It is not necessary to express an opinion as to the validity of this acknowledgment. One object of recordation is to give notice. Under the statute, only purchasers without notice can take advantage of a failure to record. In this case, it abundantly appears that Watts had notice of the deed of trust in favor of the appellant, and hence, if the acknowledgment were invalid, it could not affect the right of priority between the parties to this suit.

For these reasons, the decree appealed from must be reversed and annulled, and this court will enter such decree as the lower court should have entered, dismissing appellee's bill, with costs.

NEWBERRY v. BANK OF PRINCETON.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—KNOWLEDGE OF GRANTEE OF FRAUDULENT INTENT OF GRANTOR—EVIDENCE.

A grantee knew that the grantor was indorser of a note, but did not know that the makers were insolvent. An action on the note was pending at the time of the purchase, but there was no evidence that the grantee knew of it. One-half the purchase price was made payable to the grantor's wife, but the grantee knew that money belonging to her had been used in paying incumbrances on the land, and that she claimed a half interest therein. The deed to the grantee recited the payment of the consideration in full where only half had been paid. The grantee acted without advice, was somewhat illiterate, and did not notice the discrepancy in the deed. Held not sufficient to charge the grantee with notice that the conveyance was made by the grantor with intent to defraud his creditors.

Appeal from hustings court of Radford.

Suit by the Bank of Princeton against Henry Newberry to set aside conveyance of land. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Henson & Mason, for appellant. S. W. Williams and J. H. Fulton, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. One of the objects of this suit was to set aside a conveyance of land made by James H. Mustard and wife to Henry Newberry, the appellant, upon the ground that it was executed to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the male grantor. Upon the hearing of the cause, the court was of opinion that the deed was executed by the grantor, James H. Mustard, with the fraudulent intent charged, and that the grantee, Newberry, "had knowledge of the existence of such facts as would have put him on inquiry as to such fraudulent intent, and therefore warrants the court in holding him responsible for the fraudulent intent with which the deed was executed," and so decreed.

From that decree this appeal was taken.

The finding of the court as to the fraudulent purpose of the grantor in making the conveyance is conclusively shown by the record, and is not controverted here.

The trial court further found, as is evident from its decree, and in that view we concur, that the record does not show that the grantee had actual knowledge of the grantor's unlawful intent. Although the grantee did not have such knowledge, he may have made his purchase under such circumstances as will prevent him from being deemed a bona fide purchaser. If he had knowledge of facts and circumstances which were naturally and justly calculated to excite suspicion in the mind of a person of ordinary care and prudence, and which would naturally prompt him to pause and inquire before consummating the transaction, and such inquiry would have necessarily led to a discovery of the fact with notice of which he is sought to be charged, he will be considered to be affected with such notice, whether he made inquiry or not. But, while the fact of notice may be inferred from circumstances as well as proved by direct evidence, yet the proof must be such as to affect the conscience of the purchaser, and must be so strong and clear as to fix upon him the imputation of mala fides. Ferguson v. Daughtrey, 94 Va. 308, 312, 26 S. E. 822; Fischer v. Lee, 98 Va. —, 35 S. E. 441, and cases cited.

It appears that some time prior to November 5, 1886, the date of the conveyance in question, James H. Mustard became the first indorser on a negotiable note for Compton and Shannon for about $2,700, which was not paid at maturity, and suit was brought upon it against the makers and indorsers to the November term of the circuit court for Bland county. Compton and Shannon were heavily indebted at that time, and, although the owners of a large amount of valuable property, it was not sufficient to pay their debts when subjected. Mustard, the grantor, was the owner of the farm conveyed, and, being apprehensive of the solvency of Compton and Shannon, was endeavoring to prevent his farm from being subjected to the payment of the appellee's debt, either by conveying it to some one who would hold it for his benefit, or by selling it, and putting the purchase price in his pocket or beyond the reach of the appellee. Having failed in his efforts to find any one who was willing to hold the property for his benefit, he determined, it seems, to find some one who would purchase the land, and pay all or a large part of the consideration down. Prior to his becoming involved in the affairs of Compton and Shannon, as far as the record shows, and during the preceding two or three years, he had been endeavoring to sell his land to the grantee and others. A short time before the conveyance in question was made he renewed his offer to sell it to the grantee, who became the purchaser at the price of $4,000, —all that it was worth. He paid one-half of the consideration down, and executed his two bonds, for $1,000 each, payable, respectively, on or before November 6, 1887, and November 6, 1888, to the wife of the grantor, and a conveyance was made to him which acknowledged the receipt of the whole purchase price.

A number of facts and circumstances are relied on to show that the grantee, if he had made such inquiry as it was his duty to make, would have discovered the fraudulent intent of the grantor in making the conveyance to him.

In considering what effect those facts and circumstances ought to have had upon the action of the grantee, it must be borne in mind that his grantor, aside from his indorsement for Compton and Shannon, was perfectly solvent, and that the record does not show that the grantee had notice of their failing condition, or that they were unable to pay their debts. On the contrary, he testified that he thought they were solvent, and could pay all their indebtedness, and there is no sufficient ground for doubting the truthfulness of his statement. It is true that there are some discrepancies in his evidence as to some of the details attending his purchase, yet they are not such as to seriously affect his testimony. When he was examined as a witness he was 70 years of age, and was testifying as to a transaction which took place 12 years before. His testimony shows that he was an illiterate man, yet it bears upon its face the impress of truth, and not only his own but witnesses for the appellee also prove that his reputation for truth and veracity was unquestioned.

Among the material facts and circumstances relied on to show that the grantee would have discovered the fraudulent purpose of the grantor if he had made such inquiry as it was his duty to make, was the pendency of the appellee's action at law upon the $2,700 note. This action was pending, and judgment was rendered on the note within a few days after the grantee purchased the land, but the record does not show that he knew of its pendency, and he testified that he had no such knowledge.

Another circumstance was making his bonds for the deferred purchase price payable to the grantor's wife. It appears from the record that a large portion of the money used some years before in removing incumbrances upon the land conveyed came from the wife's father during his lifetime, and from his estate after his death; that it was charged to her in the distribution of her father's estate; that she claimed, by reason of such payments, a half interest in the land; and that the grantee knew of this claim, and executed his bonds for the deferred purchase money to the wife instead of to the husband by their direction. While the wife had no interest in the proceeds of the sale of the land on account of the money received from her father and his estate used in removing incumbrances upon the land, which she could enforce against the husband or his creditors, still there was nothing so unreasonable in her demand that half of the proceeds of sale should be paid to her as to render the grantee guilty of culpable negligence in not making further inquiry.

Another circumstance is the recital in the deed that the whole purchase price had been paid, when only half of it had been. The grantee testifies that in making the purchase he had no counsel; that the deed was drawn by the attorney of the grantor, who, he thought, knew how to draw it; that the grantee had never drawn a deed; and that, so far as he recollects, he did not know that it was so drawn until the day he testified, when his attention was called to it. He was a man of means, fully able to purchase the land, had given his bonds for the deferred purchase price, and knew that they would be paid. Under such circumstances, even if he had noticed the recital in the deed, drawn by a lawyer whom he thought knew his business, it is not likely that it would have made much impression upon him. Certainly not such an impression as would fix upon him the imputation of bad faith if he did not inquire why the recital was made, under the facts of this case.

Without discussing in detail the other suspicious circumstances connected with the grantee's purchase, it is sufficient to say that when all the circumstances relied on to show that the grantee was guilty of bad faith in making his purchase without making further inquiry are considered in the light of all the facts disclosed by the record, and especially of the facts that the grantee paid and bound himself to pay a full price for the property, and did not know that the makers of the note upon which his grantor was indorser were insolvent, but thought them fully able to pay their debts, the imputation of bad faith has not been fixed upon the grantee with that degree of strength and clearness which is required in making out a case of fraud.

We are therefore of opinion that the court erred in holding that the grantee was affected by the fraudulent intent of the grantor, and decreeing against him on that ground; but as it appears from the record that, before the grantee had paid the purchase-money bonds made payable to the grantor's wife, he had notice of the appellee's claim, and in a garnishee proceeding sued out by the appellee answered that he still owed said bonds, and was willing to pay them to whomsoever the court might order, and it further appearing that no judgment was rendered against him in that case, and that all the parties in interest were before the court, it ought to have entered a decree against the grantee in favor of appellee for the amount of those bonds, with interest thereon from the time they became due and payable, and thus put an end to the controversy.

This court will reverse the decree complained of so far as it held that the appellant was affected by the fraud of the grantor, and decree against him on that ground for the amount of the appellee's judgment, and will enter such decree as the trial court ought to have entered, with costs to the appellant as the party substantially prevailing.

CASH v. HUMPHREYS.

APPEAL—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY.

Where a judgment creditor seeks to subject lands in the hands of a third party to the payment of his judgment, the pecuniary demand asserted is the matter in controversy, and not the title of land; and, where the defendant is appellant, the test of the jurisdiction of the appellate court is the sum decreed against him.

Appeal from circuit court, Bedford county.

Bill by one Cash against one Humphreys to subject certain land to the payment of a judgment. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

Caskie & Coleman and Campbell & Tucker, for appellant. G. W. Crumpecker and William Eubank, for appellee.

BUCHANAN, J. This is a suit by a judgment creditor to subject certain land in the bill and proceedings mentioned to the payment of his judgment, which, with its interest and costs at law, is less than $500.

The decree appealed from held that the land was liable in the hands of the appellant, the present owner of the land, although he is not the judgment debtor.

The appellant's contention is that the matter in controversy is not the amount or validity of the judgment, but the right to subject the land to its payment, and therefore the real controversy is as to the ownership or the title to the property. Whatever may be the merits of this contention as an original proposition, it is unnecessary to consider, as this court has held, by repeated decisions, that the pecuniary demand asserted is, in such a case, the matter in controversy, and not the "title or boundary of land," and where the defendant is appellant, as in this case, the test of jurisdiction is the sum decreed against him or declared to be a lien upon the land. Fink v. Denny, 75 Va. 663; Hawkins v. Gresham, 85 Va. 34, 6 S. E. 472; Cook v. Bondurant, 85 Va. 47, 6 S. E. 618; Smith v. Rosenheim, 79 Va. 540; Patteson v. McKinney, 88 Va. 748, 14 S. E. 379.

It follows from what has been said that the appeal must be dismissed, as improvidently awarded.

WILLARD v. WILLARD.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. July 5, 1900.)

DIVORCE—ABANDONMENT—SETTING ASIDE DIVORCE — PETITION FOR REHEARING — CORRECTION OF INJUSTICE—CROSS BILL—RIGHT TO AMEND—CONTINUANCE—LACHES.

1. Where it was shown that, less than three years before entry of a decree divorcing a husband from the bonds of matrimony on the ground of abandonment, such husband had lived and cohabited with his wife for a period of several months, it was not error to set aside such decree.

2. Under Code, § 3233, authorizing any party to a case who was not served with process, and did not appear therein before judgment, to petition for rehearing, and have any injustice in the proceedings corrected, a wife against whom a decree of divorce from the bonds of matrimony had been entered without appearance or service of process was entitled to petition for rehearing, and to plead or answer.

3. Where a divorce was granted a husband on grounds of cruelty and abandonment, without appearance by or service of process on the wife, who 11 months thereafter (as soon as she knew of its existence) petitioned for a rehearing, and filed a cross bill alleging desertion and adultery (it being then shown that no effort was made by the husband to sustain the charge of cruelty, and that he in fact abandoned his wife in a foreign state without support), such wife was not precluded from the right when the cause came on for hearing, 7 months thereafter, to file an amended cross bill, alleging further adultery, and to have a continuance to enable her to take proof thereof, on the ground of lack of diligence in bringing forward the matters alleged therein, and proof to sustain them.

Appeal from corporation court of Roanoke city.

Bill by one Willard against his wife for divorce. There was a decree for plaintiff, and defendant, on petition for review, filed a cross bill. Decree was entered dismissing defendant's cross bill, denying leave to file an amended cross bill, setting aside the divorce decree, and dismissing the cause, and defendant appeals; plaintiff assigning cross error in setting aside the divorce decree. Reversed in part.

Smith & King, for appellant. William Gordon Robertson and G. W. Crumpecker, for appellee.

CARDWELL, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the corporation court of the city of Roanoke, and the case is as follows:

Appellant and appellee intermarried in the state of New York on June 6, 1888, and lived together as man and wife at various places in different states until March 16, 1896. For several years previous to February, 1895, they resided in the city of Roanoke, Va. In February, 1895, appellant went on a visit to New York, to see her sick father, who died before her arrival. She remained in the North with her people until the following September, when appellee joined her, and they lived together as man and wife in Hartford, Conn., from October 1, 1895, until March 16, 1896. On the last-named date appellee left appellant in Hartford, and returned to Roanoke, Va., where he owned a residence and some other property; saying to appellant that he expected to be absent about six weeks. He did not return to Hartford, Conn., but in May, 1898, filed his bill against appellant in the hustings court of the city of Roanoke for a divorce from her on the grounds of cruelty and abandonment. On June 9, 1898, he proceeded to take the depositions of witnesses in Roanoke, and on June 24, 1898, the cause was heard on his bill and the said depositions; and the court entered a decree divorcing him from appellant, a vinculo matrimonii, and dismissing the case from the docket. May 8, 1899, appellant filed her petition in the hustings court of Roanoke, alleging that she had never been served with process to answer the bill filed against her by appellee, and had not had any notice whatever of the pendency of his suit prior to the decree therein of June 24, 1898, nor until a very short while before filing her petition, and asked that the decree of June 24, 1898, be set aside; that she be permitted to file her answer to the bill filed by appellee; and that her answer be treated as a cross bill. She was permitted to file her answer, to be treated as her cross bill; the decree then entered reciting that it appeared from the record in the case that she was not served with process, and did not appear in the case, prior to the decree of June 24, 1898. The cross bill charges appellee with adultery in the city of Middletown, Conn., between July 1 and December 3, 1897, and with desertion and abandonment of appellant on the 16th day of May, 1896, and prays for a divorce from him, alimony, etc. Appellee answered the cross bill, and exhibited therewith a certificate of the clerk of the supreme court of Middlesex county, Conn., setting forth that appellant had instituted a suit against appellee for a divorce in said county and state in December, 1898. Depositions were taken on behalf of appellant, and also the depositions of appellee on his own behalf; the depositions for appellant clearly showing that she and appellee lived together as man and wife in Hartford, Conn., from October 1, 1895, to March 16, 1896, when he left her and came back to Roanoke, Va., and had not since then contributed to her support and maintenance. The cause coming on to be heard on the 6th of December, 1899, on the pleadings, the depositions of witnesses, and the exception of appellant to the deposition of appellee taken on his own behalf, appellant asked leave to file her amended cross bill, charging appellee with adultery in the city of Roanoke, Va., during the months of March and April, 1898, and moved the court to continue the cause for the purpose of permitting her to take proof to sustain this charge; but the court overruled her motion for a continuance, refused to permit her to file her amended cross bill, and heard the case upon the record as it stood, entering the decree appealed from.

which, in so far as it is now material, is as follows:

"* * * The court being of opinion that the defendant has no right to set up by cross bill in this suit any facts entitling her to a divorce from the plaintiff, because the court is satisfied from the evidence that prior to the time she entered an appearance in this suit, but subsequent to the institution of this suit, she had instituted a suit for divorce from the plaintiff in a court where she resides, in the city of Middletown, Conn., which is yet pending, and that hence this court is without jurisdiction to entertain her cross bill."

The decree then denies appellant's motion to permit her to file her amended cross bill, dismisses her original cross bill, and, reciting that the evidence showed that appellant and appellee last resided together as man and wife in the city of Hartford, Conn., as late as March 16, 1896, and that the decree of divorce granted the plaintiff (appellee) from the defendant (appellant) on June 24, 1898, was improperly granted, as three years had not elapsed at that time since the alleged abandonment, set aside said decree and dismissed the cause.

Appellee assigns as cross error so much of the decree as sets aside the decree of June 24, 1898, awarding appellee a divorce from appellant. There is no error in this ruling of the court below. As we have seen (and the decree so recites), the evidence in the cause shows the fact that appellant and appellee had lived together as man and wife as late as March 16, 1896, and three years had not since elapsed when the decree of June 24, 1898, was rendered. Moreover, a decree entered in the cause prior to the decree appealed from rightly held that it appeared from the record in the cause that appellant was not served with process to answer the bill filed by appellee, and did not appear in the cause, prior to the decree of June 24, 1898. She was, therefore, clearly entitled to file her petition to have the case reheard, and to plead or answer, in order to have any injustice done her in the proceedings corrected. Section 3233 of the Code.

Counsel for appellee frankly concede in the argument here, that the reason given in the decree for denying appellant's right to file her amended cross bill is erroneous, but contend that she should have been denied this right, because of the lack of diligence in bringing forward the matters alleged in the amended cross bill, and the proof to sustain them.

The authorities cited in support of this contention are not applicable, as the court in those cases was passing upon the question whether or not the pleader should have been allowed to file a petition for a rehearing or a bill of review on the ground of newly-discovered evidence touching the matters already decided, and not on the right to file a cross bill or an amended cross bill setting up newly-discovered facts pertinent to the issues undetermined in the cause, and to take proof in substantiation of these facts.

Mr. Bishop, in his work on Marriage and Divorce (volume 2, § 673), says: "In proper circumstances, where justice requires, the courts, in divorce causes, are liberal in allowing continuances and suspensions of the hearing to supply defects in the evidence or pleadings. The public is not interested to interpose technical obstructions. Of all causes, there are none wherein, more than these, the exact and real truth should, on every account, be made to appear."

The doctrine stated by this learned author, and supported by ample authority cited, is peculiarly applicable to the case at bar.

No effort is made by appellee to sustain the charge of cruelty made in his bill, and, instead of the evidence in the record sustaining his charge of abandonment by appellant in February, 1895, it clearly shows, as we have seen, that he in fact abandoned her in March, 1896, after living with her as his wife for months next preceding,—leaving her in a foreign state, without sufficient means of support,—and remained away from her continuously until the institution of this suit by him, and since. Under these circumstances, and in view of the further fact that appellant made her appearance in the case as soon as she ascertained that it was in existence, it cannot be reasonably said that there was such a lack of diligence on her part in bringing forward the matters alleged in her amended cross bill as to justify a denial of her right to file it, and to take proof to sustain its allegations.

We are of opinion that the decree appealed from is erroneous in so far as it denied appellant the right to file her amended cross bill in the cause and to take proof of its allegations, dismissed her original cross bill, and removed the case from the docket, and to this extent it will be reversed and annulled, but in all other respects affirmed; and the cause is remanded, to be further proceeded in according to the views expressed in this opinion.

NEWBERRY et al. v. FRENCH.

LANDS — CONTRACT TO CONVEY — SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—DEFECTIVE TITLE—LACHES —DEPRECIATION IN VALUE.

1. Where complainant contracted to convey to defendant certain land by "good and sufficient deed," and it appears that he had no title to the property, but only an equitable right, against which there were a large number of judgment liens, specific performance of the contract will not be granted, since defendant cannot be compelled to accept such a title.

2. Where complainant contracted to convey land to defendant, and delayed performance for 30 months, during which time the value of the property depreciated about one-half, he cannot have specific performance of the contract, since defendant will not be compelled to take the land in its depreciated condition.

Appeal from hustings court of Radford.

Bill by William A. French against one Newberry and others for specific performance of a contract to purchase real estate, and for a decree for the balance of the purchase price due under the contract. From a decree for complainant, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. H. Fulton and Chapman & Gillespie, for appellants. S. W. Williams and May & May, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. This suit was instituted in March, 1893, on the part of the complainant, suing for the benefit of his assignees, asking for the specific performance of so much of a certain contract in writing for the sale of land as he was interested in, and to have a decree against the appellants for the balance of purchase money due under said contract.

The contract sought to be enforced was made August 27, 1890, and involved the sale of two adjoining tracts of wild unimproved mountain land, one containing 4,648½ acres, and the other 847½ acres. The purchase price of the smaller tract, which is here involved, was $7,710.28, one-fourth to be paid in cash upon the delivery of a good and sufficient deed, and the balance in three equal payments, at 12, 24, and 36 months, with interest from date at 6 per cent., the vendor's lien being retained to secure the deferred payments. The larger tract mentioned in the contract is not involved in this controversy, and need not be again referred to.

The purchasers, who are the appellants here, filed an answer and cross bill, demurring to complainant's bill, resisting the enforcement of the contract, and asking for its rescission, and a decree over for the cash payment which they had paid, and that such decree be made a charge upon the land in question, upon the grounds (1) that no such deed as the contract required had ever been executed or tendered by the vendor; (2) that the laches of the vendor in tendering a good and sufficient deed had been attended by such a change of circumstances, and depreciation in the value of the property, as to render the enforcement of the contract inequitable and a great hardship; (3) that the title of the vendor was so defective, doubtful, and uncertain that the purchasers ought not to be required to accept it; (4) that the incumbrances upon the land are far in excess of the price agreed to be paid therefor, and the vendor has since the sale become insolvent, so that his warranty would afford no protection.

It appears that, within a day or two after the contract in question was made, the vendor, D. A. French, and his wife, executed a deed, purporting to convey this land to the purchasers, and placed the same in the hands of his agent, William A. French. The appellants deposited the cash payment to the credit of the vendor in the Bank of Tazewell, and at their request William A. French deposited the deed there also. It further appears that, for the convenience of the purchasers, who were widely separated, some of them living in distant parts of the state, the deferred purchase-money bonds were executed and left with the Bank of Tazewell, with the understanding that they were not to be delivered to the vendor until the attorneys had passed upon the sufficiency of the title and the deed. It further appears that the land sold was unimproved wild mountain land, valuable chiefly for its timber and mineral deposits, and that no actual possession thereof was taken by the purchasers, though they did do some prospecting upon it for iron ore, both before and after the purchase.

It also satisfactorily appears that the deed left with the bank was not accepted, at any time, as a compliance with the contract, but was deposited with the bank subject to inspection by the attorneys, and an investigation by them of the title. It further appears that the original contract was retained by W. A. French, and never recorded; that after considerable delay in getting the contract, which was necessary before the deed could be examined, the attorneys examined the deed, and at once informed their clients that it was not drawn in accordance with the contract; that it conveyed the land in gross, whereas the contract called for the conveyance of a specific number of acres, the acreage controlling the price. W. A. French was informed that the deed would not be accepted in that form, and the cashier of the bank was told that the deed was not satisfactory, and that he must not deliver the bonds.

Nothing further appears to have been done in the premises until February, 1893, nearly 30 months after the date of the contract, when D. A. French and wife executed and tendered another deed to the attorneys of appellants, which they declined to accept, because it did not conform to the contract, and for the further reason that no abstract was furnished with the deed showing a good title to the land conveyed. Thereupon this suit was instituted, complainants filing with their bill an abstract of title.

There were a number of proceedings not necessary to be here recited, until January, 1895, when an order was entered in the cause referring the same to a commissioner for a report upon the character and condition of the title to the land in question. After due notice to the parties, the commissioner filed his report, covering about 46 pages of the printed record, returning therewith a great mass of depositions and documentary evidence, which had been produced upon the hearing before him. After pointing out a number of defects in the title, well calculated to cause a purchaser doubt and uncertainty, the commissioner concludes his elaborate report by finding that on the 28th of August, 1890, D. A. French had only an equitable title to the land in question, with judgments amounting to $4,708.54 resting thereon, and that, therefore, the purchasers should not be required to accept the deed tendered August 28, 1890.

He further finds that at the date of his report the title to the land was in a worse condition than in 1890, saying: "There are now over $50,000 existing liens upon this land, and it is in evidence that D. A. French is insolvent." The commissioner then arrives at the following conclusion: "The links that your commissioner has failed to find of record in the chain of title, together with the unsatisfactory doubtful evidence of possession, but especially in view of the enormous amount of judgment liens, leaves no doubt in your commissioner's mind but that the title is such that the defendants should not be required to accept it."

It is well settled that a purchaser of land, at a private sale, will not be required to pay his purchase money, and take in exchange therefor a defective, or even doubtful, title; and especially is this true where, as in the case at bar, he has contracted for a good and sufficient deed, which undertaking is not confined to the form of the deed, but includes a good title. Garnett v. Macon, 6 Call, 309, 367, Fed. Cas. No. 5,245; Jackson v. Ligon, 3 Leigh, 174; Christian v. Cabell, 22 Grat. 82; Hendricks v. Gillespie, 25 Grat. 181; Clark v. Hutzler, 96 Va. 73, 30 S. E. 469; Matney v. Ratliff, 96 Va. 231, 31 S. E. 512.

In Garnett v. Macon, supra, Chief Justice Marshall says: "Both on principle and authority, I think it is very clear that a specific performance will not be decreed on the application of the vendor, unless his ability to make such a title as he agreed to make be unquestionable."

In Jackson v. Ligon, supra, Judge Carr says: "It is a principle laid down in many cases in equity that an unwilling purchaser shall not be compelled to take a title with a cloud upon it, and that principle is assuredly strengthened here, where the party has contracted for a good and lawful right."

In Hendricks v. Gillespie, supra, Judge Anderson says: "A court of equity is anxious to protect a purchaser, and give to him reasonable security for his title, not compelling him to take a title not knowing whether it was good or bad; * * * for it would be an extraordinary proceeding for a court of equity to compel a purchaser to take an estate which it cannot warrant to him. It has therefore become a settled and invariable rule that a purchaser shall not be compelled to accept a doubtful title. Nor will he be forced to take an equitable title."

We need not quote further from the numerous authorities announcing and maintaining this doctrine. It is too well settled and understood to call for more than a brief statement of the proposition.

After a careful consideration of the evidence underlying the commissioner's report, no doubt remains of the correctness of his conclusions. It is shown by the record that at the time of the sale the vendor did not have the legal title to the land in question, and that a large number of unsatisfied judgments were then docketed against him. It further appears that notwithstanding the deed tendered in August, 1890, was for good reasons rejected, and notwithstanding the first and second purchase-money bonds had in the meantime become due and payable, the vendor made no effort to furnish the purchasers with a good and sufficient deed, and made no demand for the purchase money due, until March, 1893, when this suit was brought, in which they file for the first time an abstract which shows on its face that the vendor could not then make a good and sufficient deed. It further appears that at the time of this suit there were, in addition to other serious doubts as to the title, more than $50,000 of liens outstanding against the vendor, and he insolvent; the liens amounting to more than six times the entire purchase money agreed to be paid. It is clear that no purchaser could be required to take such a title as the vendor was able to make when this suit was brought.

After the commissioner's report was filed, the appellees, with a view to perfecting the title, filed an amended bill, making, as defendants thereto, a great number of new parties, both known and unknown. In this new suit various proceedings were had. The propriety of such proceedings in a suit for specific performance may well be doubted, but we are not called upon to express any opinion upon that question, or to determine whether or not the title was thereby perfected; for it is an established fact in the case that at the time the suit was brought the land in question had depreciated in value 50 per cent.

The rule may be laid down as general, applying to either the vendor or vendee, that where there has been a change of circumstances or relations, which renders the execution of the contract a hardship to the defendant, and this change grows out of, or is accompanied by, an unexcused delay on the part of the plaintiff, the change and delay together will constitute a sufficient ground for denying a specific performance, when sought by one thus in default. Darling v. Cumming's Ex'r, 92 Va. 521, 23 S. E. 880; Garnett v. Macon, supra; Christian v. Cabell, supra; Hendricks v. Gillespie, supra.

In Garnett v. Macon, Chief Justice Marshall says: "As, before such decree was attainable, the value of the article has greatly changed, that circumstance creates a strong objection to specific performance;" and, adverting to the change of circumstances in that case, the learned jurist says: "The same property which, if sold in time, would probably have enabled him to pay for Mantapike, would not, on any reasonable estimate, now enable him to do so."

In Christian v. Cabell, Judge Staples says that it is the result of all the cases "that any loss occurring to the property, before the vendor was in a condition to convey a clear, unincumbered title, must fall on him, and not on the purchaser."

In Hendricks v. Gillespie, Judge Anderson says: "But if the vendor has been long in default, and in the meantime a change of circumstances has taken place, unfavorable to the party resisting the demand, a court of equity will not compel specific performance;" and, in speaking of the change of circumstances in that case, says: "That there has been a general decline in the value of lands is a fact of public notoriety."

In the case at bar it is established by the evidence that there had been, at the time suit was brought, a great decline in the value of the class of property here involved, and that the particular land in question, as already stated, was not worth more than 50 cents on the dollar of the price appellees had agreed to pay. Under such circumstances, a court of equity could not decree specific performance, and therefore the proceedings on the amended bill, even if permissible, were without avail.

It is further contended by appellees that, after the contract of sale was completed, W. A. French was no longer the agent of his brother, the vendor, and that it was thereafter the duty of appellants to notify the vendor in person of their objections to the title, it being insisted that he was not informed of such objections. The contract shows on its face that William A. French was the agent of the vendor. It is further shown that the vendor delivered his deed of August, 1890, to William A. French; that the vendor never at any time appeared or had any connection with the transaction in person; and that W. A. French was treated and regarded by all concerned as his agent. But can the vendor be heard to deny knowledge of the condition of his own title, and to complain of appellants for not informing him of their objections thereto? He knew that he had made a contract in which he had agreed to deliver his vendees a good and sufficient deed before anything was paid by them. He is chargeable with knowledge that the deed tendered by him in August, 1890, was not in accordance with the contract, and that he did not furnish an abstract of title. He is chargeable with knowledge of the fact that he had no legal title to the land until about the time this suit was brought, nearly 30 months after he had made the sale. He is chargeable with knowledge of the fact that the land was bound by numerous judgment liens against himself, and that he was insolvent. All these things were quite sufficient to suggest the importance, if he expected to carry out his part of the contract, of getting his title in such condition as to be free from reasonable objection.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the appellees are not entitled to a specific performance of the contract in their bill mentioned, and that the decree appealed from is erroneous. And we are further of opinion that the appellants are entitled to have the said contract rescinded, and to have a decree against the appellee D. A. French for the amount paid by them in cash under said contract; but inasmuch as said contract was never recorded, and liens have since been acquired, said decree will not be made a charge upon the land in question.

The decree, therefore, will be reversed, and such decree will be entered here as the lower court should have made, carrying out the views herein expressed.

The decree is as follows:

The court is of opinion, for reasons stated in writing and filed with the record, that the appellees are not entitled to a specific performance of the contract in their bill mentioned, and that the decree appealed from, dated September 11, 1899, is erroneous.

The court is further of opinion that the appellants are entitled to have the said contract rescinded, and to have a decree against the appellee D. A. French for $1,927.57, the amount of the cash payment made by them under said contract to D. A. French, with interest thereon from October 10, 1890, the date of its payment.

It is therefore ordered and decreed that said decree be reversed and annulled, and that appellees do pay to the appellants their costs by them expended about the prosecution of their appeal aforesaid here. And this court, proceeding to render such decree as should have been rendered by the hustings court of the city of Radford, doth order and decree that the contract in the bill and proceedings mentioned, dated August 27, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, rescinded; and it is further ordered and decreed that the appellee D. A. French do pay to the appellants Harman Newberry, J. G. Watts, Henry Bowen, Joseph S. Gillespie, and A. P. Gillespie $1,927.57, with interest thereon from October 10, 1890, and that the appellees do pay to the appellants their costs by them about their defense of this suit in said hustings court expended; and, nothing further appearing to be done in this cause, it is ordered that the same be stricken from the docket.

All which is ordered to be certified to the hustings court for the city of Radford.

SMITH'S EX'R v. POWELL.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. July 5, 1900.)

ESTOPPEL — NOTES — ACCEPTANCE — APPEAL —ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—MOTION IN TRIAL COURT—NECESSITY—SUBSEQUENT DECREE—APPEAL—ERRORS IN ORIGINAL DECREE.

1. Plaintiff obtained a decree against several defendants, and a note was tendered to his attorney in satisfaction of it, which he received on the representation of defendants that plaintiff had agreed to its acceptance, but plaintiff had never made such agreement, and repudiated the act of the attorney as soon as it came to his knowledge, and before the time to appeal had expired. Held, that plaintiff was not estopped from enforcing payment of the decree on the ground that defendants, by the attorney's acceptance, were prevented from taking an appeal.

2. Under Code, § 3451, providing that a judgment by default may be vacated by the trial court on motion; and section 3452, declaring that no appeal shall be allowed by the appellate court or judge for any matter for which the judgment may be reversed on motion in the trial court,—where defendants, who were held as joint obligors in a decree taken by default, made no motion in the trial court to vacate it, error in holding them so liable will not be considered on appeal.

3. Where, several years after a decree in favor of plaintiff, the respective attorneys consented to the appointment of a commission by the trial court to determine whether a note given in satisfaction of such decree had been accepted or not, and an appeal was taken from a decree that it had been accepted, errors in the rendition of the original decree will not be considered on such appeal.

Appeal from hustings court of Roanoke.

Scott & Staples, for appellant. Thomas W. Miller, for appellee.

KEITH, P. Smith's executor filed his bill in the hustings court of the city of Roanoke in June, 1890, stating that one Edmund Didier, the owner of three lots of land in said city, had entered into an agreement to sell the same to L. L. Powell, trustee for a number of beneficiaries, who were named, who were to take unequal interests in the said lot, ranging from 1/8 to 8/80 of the whole, as shown by the deed from Didier. The purchase price was $6,000, of which sum $2,833.33 was paid in cash, and for $2,566.66 Powell, trustee, executed his two negotiable notes, each for the sum of $1,283.33, payable at one and two years from date, and as to the residue he assumed two other negotiable notes drawn by Didier, payable to the order of Webb and others. A vendor's lien was reserved to secure the two notes of $1,283.33, and before the maturity thereof the first of these notes to fall due was, for value received, transferred to the plaintiff's intestate. This note not having been paid at maturity, Smith's executor filed his bill praying that the lots upon which it constituted a lien might be sold for its satisfaction, and that, if the fund thus produced proved insufficient to pay off the said note in full, the beneficiaries in the deed from Didier who are named parties defendant in the bill may be required to make good any deficiency. Powell, trustee, and all those interested in the trust, were made parties defendant, and as to all of them the bill was taken for confessed. In January, 1892, this cause was referred to a commissioner to report an account of the liens upon the property. The commissioner reported, and, there being no exception filed, his report was confirmed, and a decree of sale was entered. A sale was made and confirmed, which proved inadequate to satisfy the liens, and the court thereupon disposed of the purchase money to satisfy charges superior to the lien of Smith's executor, and applied the residue to his debt, which left due to him as of the 1st of April, 1893, the sum of $867.23, and to Edmund Didier the sum of $1,833.33, with interest from June 24, 1890, until paid, and for these sums a decree was entered against the defendants jointly. This decree disposed of the whole subject. It sold the land; it distributed the proceeds; it ascertained the balance due; it gave a decree against those who were, in the opinion of the court, liable for the sums ascertained to be due.

The only controversy in the suit thus far had been as to the measure of liability upon the defendants, their contention being that a personal decree should have gone against them only for their ratable proportion of the sum to be raised, to be ascertained by reference to their interests under the deed to them from Didier.

Upon the part of the plaintiff, it was claimed that they were jointly and severally liable for the whole amount, and this view was sustained by the court. There was some talk about an appeal from this decree, and thereupon Didier, who was anxious to get the money coming to him, undertook to bring about a settlement, as a result of which a Mr. Preston, who had purchased some of the interests in the suit, approached Mr. Scott, who was counsel of record for Smith's executor, and told him that he would pay upon the decree in the case to Smith's executor $608.15. This proposition was communicated by Mr. Scott to Didier in a note of April 24, 1893, the day upon which the decree under consideration was entered. On the following day, April 25, 1893, Didier and Preston went to Scott with a note drawn by Preston, payable to Booth's executor at the First National Bank of Roanoke, for $608. This note was indorsed by M. T. C. Jordan. Scott declined to receive this note because, as he said, he had no authority from Booth to take anything in payment of the judgment but money, but Mr. Preston stated that he had seen Booth, who was willing to accept the note in question. Mr. Scott replied that "if this is true I have nothing further to say," and upon this express assurance that Booth had agreed to take the note in part payment of the decree the receipt was given by Scott which is filed in the record. A very short time thereafter it was discovered that Mr. Preston was mistaken in representing Booth as willing to accept his note as a payment upon the decree, and the parties interested were notified of the fact.

That Scott's action in agreeing to accept the note was predicated upon the statement that it met with the approval of his client is proved by himself and Didier, while Preston's account of the interview is far less clear and definite. He says that he does not recollect what conversation he had with Mr. Scott upon the subject. In this condition of the proof, we must accept the positive statements of Didier and Scott. There is no evidence whatever that Booth knew of the transaction on or before the 24th of April. On the contrary, he himself says in his deposition that he was wholly ignorant of it at the time, and repudiated it as soon as it came to his knowledge, and that the note was never at any time in his possession.

There is a check in the record drawn by L. C. Buckner to the order of R. E. Scott for $121.64. Buckner, who was one of the defendants against whom the decree had gone of which we have spoken, had always earnestly insisted that he should only be bound for his ratable proportion, which he would pay after crediting the decree by the Preston note. The Preston note, however, was not paid. On the 4th of June, 1894, an order was entered in the case of Smith's executor against Powell, trustee, directing a commissioner to report "whether or not the amount remaining due to the complainants, after applying the proceeds of sale of the land in the bill mentioned, has been paid to the complainants or to the parties named in the decree, or what parties have been paid, and by whom, and upon what agreement, if any, the sum was so paid."

The decree of April, 1893, having been a final decree, no other decree could regularly have been entered in the cause. Battaile v. Hospital, 76 Va. 63. No such objection to the proceeding, however, is made, because, as was stated at the bar, it was done by agreement among counsel. In execution of this decree, the commissioner took the evidence from which we have gathered the facts hereinbefore stated, and he reports that the note of $608 was received by Mr. Scott as a payment "under a mistake and misapprehension of the facts as they existed, and that, therefore, it should not be regarded as a payment. The commissioner is further of opinion that, had there been no mistake or misapprehension in regard to the facts, said attorney had no right to receive anything other than money in payment of said decree, unless expressly authorized so to do by the complainants in this cause, and that no such authority is shown by the evidence produced before him. The commissioner is further of the opinion that no act or words of said complainants after the execution of the said note amount to a ratification of the act of the said attorney in receiving said note." He then credits the decree with $48.17, which he considers as having been proved to be a proper credit, and reports that, subject to this credit, the amount of the decree of April 24, 1893, was still due and unpaid.

To this report exceptions were filed, and, the cause coming on to be heard before the hustings court, a decree was entered, from which this appeal is taken, in which it is declared "that the note of M. P. Preston was so dealt with by complainants, after they had full knowledge of all the facts relating to its delivery, as to preclude them from refusing to allow it as a credit upon the decree entered on the 24th of April, 1893, and that defendants made payments to complainants upon the understanding that such payments exonerated them from any further liability, and that L. C. Buckner gave his check for $121.64 upon a like understanding. It is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that, upon the payment of the amount of said check," it should operate as a full satisfaction of the former decree.

That Scott had no authority as attorney to receive anything other than money in satisfaction of his client's demands is not controverted, and, that being the case, we do not perceive how Scott's conduct, assuming that the evidence established all for which defendants contend, could operate by way of estoppel to the prejudice of his client. It is plain from the evidence that he gave Scott no previous authority to act otherwise than as his attorney at law. It is equally plain from the evidence that he never, by word or deed, consented to or ratified the acceptance of Preston's note as a part satisfaction of the decree in his favor. But there can be no estoppel here in any view, or against any one. It is of the essence of estoppel that the act relied upon as such should have been injurious, and to the prejudice of him who relies upon it as estoppel. The defendants have not been injured by anything said or done by the plaintiff or his testator. The note which was received was not due for a year, and within that period every one interested was informed of the truth of the matter; that it had been taken under a misapprehension of facts; and that Booth, and Scott, his attorney, had declared that the Preston note would not be accepted, while they would be glad if he would pay the money which it was intended to represent. The Buckner check injured nobody. It was not collected, and, if it had been, it represented only the amount for which Buckner was in any event liable.

But it is said that the defendants were prevented from taking an appeal. Both, we reiterate, did nothing that estops him. He was not in any way responsible for the failure to appeal, and, after appellees were informed of his position, there was yet ample time to move in the hustings court to have the decree corrected, and, failing in this, to apply to the court of appeals for such relief as they might have shown themselves entitled to.

We are of opinion that the hustings court erred in crediting the decree of April 23, 1893, by the amount of the Preston note.

Appellees seek, under rule 9, to assign as error the ruling of the court against them in that decree, by which they were held liable as partners or obligors. The decree, as we have seen, was taken against them by default; and, by virtue of section 3452 of the Code, this court had no jurisdiction to entertain a petition for appeal until relief had been sought, under section 3451, by a motion to the court in which the decree was rendered. That motion was never made. The time within which it could be made has expired, and the decree has long since become final and irreversible.

It is to be observed that the proceeding upon which the controversy is now in this court does not involve any question at issue in the litigation which resulted in the final decree of April, 1893. It is wholly with respect to what has occurred since the rendition of that decree, so that no relief could, in any aspect of the case, be afforded under the rule which appellees invoke. This consideration is also a sufficient answer to the objection presented by counsel in his oral argument to the bill, which is copied into the record. There is no dispute before us which involves the pleadings in the original case, and whether the bill, as accepted by the court as a copy of the original bill, be a true copy or not, is a matter of no moment.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the decree complained of should be reversed.

BROWNING'S EX'R v. BROWNING.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. July 5, 1900.)

APPEAL AND ERROR—UNSATISFACTORY RECORD—COMMISSIONER'S REPORT—DECREE—SUBSTANTIAL JUSTICE.

Where a record on appeal is unsatisfactory, and the evidence not clearly stated, a decree which was based on the report of a commissioner who had the witnesses before him and knew the particular items to which their evidence was directed, and which appears to do substantial justice, will be affirmed, though the conclusions reached are not absolutely accurate.

On rehearing. Affirmed.

For former opinion, see 36 S. E. 108.

HARRISON, J. This case is before us upon a petition to rehear a decree of this court rendered at a former term.

The controversy grows out of a brief and unhappy marriage existing between appellant's testatrix and the appellee, which ended with this suit by the wife, praying for a divorce a mensa et thoro, and for protection in the possession and enjoyment of her separate estate, consisting of real and personal property owned by her at the time of her marriage. The defendant answered the bill, and the cause was referred to a commissioner for a report upon the matters of dispute between the parties.

It seems that at the time of the marriage Mrs. Browning was the owner of valuable real estate, choses in action, and a small amount of personal property. Her real estate was all under lease, and she owned no live stock, except a pair of carriage horses, a riding horse, and a pony; nor did she own any corn, wheat, or hay. It further appears that immediately after the marriage Mrs. Browning went to the home of her husband, where she remained with his family, consisting of himself and a number of children, for several months, when, as claimed by appellee, she induced him to move with his family to her home, upon the promise that he should have the use of her lands after the lease thereon had expired, and that the profits arising therefrom, both as to crops and stock, should belong to him. Appellee further claims that, acting upon this promise, he broke up his own home and moved with his family to the home of his wife. It appears that appellee took with him to his wife's home a large amount of live stock, to which he subsequently added, by purchase, a still larger number. It further appears that appellee put out and cultivated large crops upon his wife's lands during the year, and that he hauled more than 1,200 bushels of corn from his own place to the home of his wife to feed to the stock there, and took a large number of cattle from his wife's land to his own home, and fed and wintered them upon his own grain and roughness. This stock, the cost of feeding the same, the crops, and many other items not necessary to enumerate, constitute the subject of the present controversy. By a decree entered in July, 1891, Mrs. Browning was allowed to retain possession of all the disputed property, to save the expense of a receiver, upon entering into bond, with good security, in the penalty of $20,000, conditioned to pay her husband all damages resulting from an injunction restraining him from all control over said property. Mrs. Browning died pending the litigation, and the property in question passed into the hands of her executor, and has since been sold by him.

The commissioner to whom the cause was referred says, "there is a good deal of proof tending to show that M. J. Browning had turned over to her husband, A. P. Browning, her farms, to make out of them all he could for himself individually and his family, and this idea is borne out in the evidence." Notwithstanding this view of the evidence, the commissioner declines to allow appellee anything on account of the profits arising from his wife's lands, and disallows many other items, reducing appellee's claim, amounting to more than $4,000, to an indebtedness in his favor against the estate of Mrs. Browning of $1,794.94. The circuit court modified this report, and entered a decree in favor of appellee for $1,861.33.

The record in this case is very unsatisfactory, and in many particulars difficult to comprehend. The evidence of the witnesses is not clear or succinctly stated. After, however, giving the case the best consideration possible, we are unable to say that any injustice has been done the appellant by the decree appealed from. Appellee, with quite as much reason, apparently, as appellant, complains that he is greatly damaged by the action of the circuit court. The commissioner had all of the witnesses before him. He knew at the time they were testifying to what particular item of property the evidence of each was directed, and was therefore in an advantageous position to determine better the value of the evidence. Under such circumstances, special weight should be accorded the commissioner's findings.

While not satisfied that the conclusions reached are absolutely accurate, we think the circuit court has, as nearly as the case presented will admit, reached substantial justice between the parties to this controversy, and its decree is therefore affirmed.

CARPER v. MARSHALL.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—PURCHASE MONEY—BOND—COLLATERAL SECURITY—SET-OFF—EVIDENCE.

1. Where an agreement between a vendor and purchaser provided against the assignment of the last purchase-money note by the vendor until judgments against the vendor constituting a lien on the land were satisfied, and the decree foreclosing the vendor's purchase-money lien, which was largely in excess of the judgment liens against the land, provided for the payment of such judgments after payment of costs and expenses of sale, defendant cannot complain of an assignment of the note in violation of the contract, since he is amply protected against the judgment liens.

2. Where plaintiff, holding a bond of $2,333.33 for purchase money due on land, surrendered it to defendant, the maker, and received from him a purchase-money bond for $2,500 due from third parties, and plaintiff testified positively that he surrendered the bond with the express understanding that the debt due from the maker, and the lien securing it, should not be extinguished, but defendants' testimony thereto was of a negative character, and the commissioner found in favor of plaintiff, the supreme court will not disturb the finding.

3. In an action for the purchase price of land, where defendant had assigned to plaintiff a purchase-money bond due from third persons, to be collected and the proceeds applied on defendant's purchase-money debt due plaintiff, but plaintiff delayed and failed to collect the bond, defendant was entitled to have damages sustained by the delay set off against his liability for the purchase price.

Appeal from circuit court, Craig county.

Bill by one Marshall against one Carper. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Benjamin Haden, for appellant. Marshall & Marshall, Paris & Jones, and S. W. Williams, for appellee.

KEITH, P. The bill in this case was filed by Marshall to recover the balance of the purchase money due upon a tract of land sold by him to Carper in 1890. The purchase price was $7,000, of which sum Carper paid in cash $2,333.33 and executed his two notes, payable on the 1st of March and September, 1891. Carper had a short time before this sold a tract of land to J. H. Hoge and A. B. Humphreys, receiving for it $3,000 in cash, and two notes, of $2 500 each,—the first falling due on the 1st of March, 1891, and the other September 1, 1891,—with interest from date. When the bond for $2,500 fell due, Carper placed it in the hands of Marshall, a practicing lawyer, to collect, and out of the proceeds Marshall was to pay Carper's note to him falling due on the 1st of March. Before this note became due, Humphreys and Hoge conveyed the tract they had purchased to the West Salem Land Company. Marshall, as attorney for Carper, brought a chancery suit to March rules, 1891, against Humphreys and Hoge, to enforce the vendor's lien reserved by Carper, but did not make the West Salem Land Company a party. The West Salem Land Company desired to have this suit dismissed, and, with that end in view, through its vice president it entered into a negotiation with Carper and Marshall which resulted in its paying to Carper a sum upon the $2,500 bond which reduced it to $2,333.33; and thereupon Marshall delivered Carper's bond to him, falling due March 1, 1891,—the first deferred payment upon the land sold by Marshall to Carper,—and Carper transferred to Marshall the amount remaining due on the bond to Humphreys and Hoge, falling due upon the same date. The suit brought to enforce this bond was thereupon dismissed.

Marshall, in his bill, avers that, when he delivered Carper's bond to him, it was with the express understanding that the lien reserved to secure the balance due from Carper, as well upon the first as upon the second bond, was to remain unimpaired by that transaction. He sets out in full all the credits to which, as he claims, Carper is entitled, and prays that the lien which he reserved for the land sold by him to Carper may be enforced for his benefit, and an account be stated by a commissioner to ascertain the balance due to him.

Carper answered this bill. His principal contention is that the transaction between himself and Marshall by which he transferred to Marshall the bond of Hoge and Humphreys, amounting originally to $2,500, and Marshall delivered to him his bond for $2,333, which he had given for the first deferred payment on the land purchased by Marshall, was a satisfaction and extinguishment of the bond, the debt evidenced by it, and of all liens by which it was secured. He avers that the indulgence extended in the collection of the bond transferred by him to Marshall was given by Marshall, and that it would be unjust to visit upon him any loss resulting from it, as it was without his knowledge or direction.

An order was entered directing the commissioner to state an account, who returned a report from which it appears that there is due from Carper to Marshall, secured by a vendor's lien, the sum of $2,211.23. To this report exceptions were filed by Carper, which were overruled, and a decree entered, from which this appeal is taken.

The first error assigned is that by the terms of the contract of sale between Carper and Marshall the last purchase-money note of $2,333.33 was not to be assigned by Marshall until certain judgment liens against him binding the first purchase by Carper had been satisfied.

We think there is no merit in this contention. The decree complained of provides that out of the cash payment received on the sale of the land the commissioners shall first pay and discharge the costs of suit and expenses of sale; and, secondly, such judgment liens against James W. Marshall as bound the land at the time it was aliened by him to Carper, and which remained unpaid at the day of sale. As the sum ascertained to be due from Carper to Marshall is largely in excess of the sum represented by the judgments against Marshall, Carper is amply protected.

The second assignment of error proceeds upon the idea that when Marshall surrender to Carper the first bond for $2,333.33, due upon his sale of land to Carper, and received from him the $2,500 bond due by Humphreys and Hoge, Carper's bond and the lien securing it were extinguished. That such is the usual effect of a transaction which results in placing a bond in the hands of the obligor is true; but Marshall avers that in this case he expressly declined to extinguish the debt from Carper to him, or the lien by which it was secured. He sets up in his bill a somewhat unusual transaction, but, while unusual, it is not on that account less binding, if established by proof. There was nothing illegal or contrary to public policy in making a bargain such as he describes. The rights of third parties do not intervene; it was a transaction wholly between Carper and himself; and, if established by proof, there is no reason why it should not be enforced. Marshall was examined as a witness in his own behalf. He testified explicitly, directly, and frankly in support of the statement which he makes in his bill, while the evidence of Carper upon the same subject is negative in its character. The commissioner to whom the matter was referred, and who heard the witnesses, found in favor of the appellee,—if not in direct terms, by necessary implication. This finding was approved by the circuit court, and we do not feel that the evidence warrants us in reaching a different conclusion.

The third assignment of error involves a consideration of Marshall's duty with respect to the bond of Humphreys and Hoge transferred to him by Carper, as before stated. That bond constituted a lien upon the land sold by Carper to Humphreys and Hoge. It was the first purchase-money bond, and Marshall was entitled to exhaust all the security for its payment, as between himself and Carper. In addition to the lien securing its payment, Marshall could look to both of the obligors and to Humphreys, who signed it as guarantor. By accepting it of Carper, he assumed control and dominion over it, and it became his duty to exercise due diligence to make it out of those primarily bound for its payment.

A bond which is transferred as collateral security is put under the dominion of the creditor, to make his claim out of it. His duties in respect to it are active. He is to employ reasonable diligence in collecting the money on the security and applying it to the principal debt. Muirhead v. Kirkpatrick, 21 Pa. St. 237. He alone is empowered to receive the money to be paid upon it, and to control it in order to protect his right under the assignment. Where the collateral is lost by the insolvency of the debtor in the collateral instrument, through the supine negligence of the creditor, he must account for the loss to his own debtor. Hanna v. Holton, 78 Pa. St. 334.

Carper having parted with all his right of control over the bond which he transferred, Marshall was bound to employ reasonable diligence in its collection. Colebrooke, Collat. Sec. (2d Ed.) § 114; Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 2, p. 312; Williams v. Price, 1 Sim. & S. p. 581.

The doctrine is fully stated in Wilson's Adm'r v. Barclay's Ex'r, 22 Grat., at page 541, by Judge Staples, as follows: "It is clear, as a general rule, the assignee must sue the maker or obligor before he can resort to the assignor. This rule is varied where it is perfectly manifest a suit would be wholly unavailing. It is equally clear that, where the debt which has been assigned is secured by a specific lien, it is the duty of the assignee diligently to enforce such lien, before he can have any recourse against the assignor. If he fails to pursue this course, it is incumbent upon him clearly to show that the security was worthless, and that no loss or damage has resulted from his lack of diligence."

It appears that this bond was assigned by Carper to Marshall April, 1891. Suit was not instituted upon it until the latter part of October of that year,—a term of the circuit court having intervened,—and judgment was not obtained upon it until October, 1893. Carper testified that, if suit had been brought promptly on that bond, the whole of it would have been made out of the obligors. It may be that no loss was sustained, and that no injury was occasioned by this delay. It may be that the obligors had no other property than that which was subjected in the proceedings instituted against them. But these facts do not appear in this record, and we are of opinion that a decree should not go against Carper, the assignor or transferror of the bond to Marshall, until an inquiry has been made upon this subject.

Upon the whole case, we are of opinion that the assignment from Carper to Marshall was received by the latter, not as a payment, but as a means of payment, and that there was no error in the appropriation of payments made by the circuit court, except in so far as it may be affected by the result of an inquiry to ascertain whether any loss was sustained by Carper by reason of Marshall's failure to use due diligence to collect the debt assigned to him.

The decree complained of must be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, with instructions to direct the commissioner to inquire and report what loss, if any, Carper sustained by reason of Marshall's failure to proceed promptly against those liable upon the bond assigned to him. Any loss which Carper may have sustained by reason of Marshall's dealing with this collateral is to be set off against the bond of $2,333.33 due March 1, 1891; and, as to any balance due Marshall, the payments are to be applied as in the reports heretofore made in this cause.

MITCHELL et al. v. WITT, Judge.

ELECTIONS—CONTESTS—COMMON COUNCIL—JURISDICTION.

Under Code, § 160, providing that the returns of election of county, corporation, and district officers shall be subject to the inquiry, determination, and judgment of the court of the county or corporation wherein the election was held on complaint of an undue election or false return, the corporation court has no jurisdiction to try and determine contests over the election of members of the common council of the city, but only such officers of the city as correspond to the officers of the respective counties and districts of the state.

Application by Thomas W. Mitchell and others for a writ of mandamus commanding S. B. Witt, as judge of the hustings court for the city of Richmond, to set aside his order dismissing petitioner's complaint, and to hear and determine an election contest on its merits. Denied.

William L. Royall, for petitioners. L. O. Wendenburg, H. M. Smith, and Geo. D. Wise, for respondent.

CARDWELL, J. Thomas W. Mitchell and others filed their petition in the hustings court for the city of Richmond, alleging that they were qualified voters of Jackson ward, in the city of Richmond; that on the 24th day of May, 1900, there was an election held in the city for general city officers, and for members of the board of aldermen and common council; that the election for aldermen and common council from Jackson ward was an undue and fraudulent election, and resulted in certain parties being certified as elected to the board of aldermen and common council from that ward who were not duly elected. After reciting that a large number of votes which had been cast for certain candidates were fraudulently and falsely counted for the parties to whom the certificates of election were given, the petitioners prayed that the court make inquiry into the matter, and award certificates to the parties to whom they rightly belonged.

The candidates to whom the certificates were awarded by the commissioners of election appeared in court in answer to the petition, and, each for himself, filed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court to hear and pass upon the complaint of the petitioners, and, the case coming on to be heard upon the plea, the judge of the hustings court sustained the plea, and dismissed the complaint.

The case is before us upon the application of the said petitioners for a writ of mandamus, directed to the judge of the court below, commanding him to set aside his said order and judgment dismissing petitioners' complaint, and that he proceed to hear and determine the contest on its merits.

It is contended for petitioners that they have the right, under section 160 of the Code, to make their complaint to the judge of the court below, and to have it adjudicated by him upon its merits; and their learned counsel argues here that, if the members of the common council of the city of Richmond are officers, it is conclusive that it was the duty of the judge below to hear and decide their complaint upon its merits.

The inquiry does not stop there, for it may be conceded that members of the common council are in a certain sense officers, and still the question is, are they such officers as are referred to and embraced within the provisions of section 160 of the Code? This question is to be determined by a construction of that section, read in connection with, and in the light of, all other statutes in force which are in pari materia, viz. sections 106 and 1030 of the Code.

Statutes which are not inconsistent with one another, and which relate to the same subject-matter, are in pari materia, and should be construed together, and effect be given to them all, although they contain no reference to one another, and were passed at different times. Especially should effect be given, if possible, to statutes in pari materia enacted at the same session of the legislature. 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 311, and the numerous authorities there cited.

There is no exception to the universality of this rule. Id., note on page 313.

Sections 106, 160, and 1030 were adopted into the Code of 1887, and are to be construed by the rule stated.

Section 160 provides that the returns of election of county, corporation, and district officers shall be subject to the inquiry, determination, and judgment of the court of the county or corporation wherein the election was held, upon the complaint of 15 or more qualified voters of such county, corporation, or district of an undue election or false return. It then provides as to how the pleadings are to be made up, how proof may be taken, how and when the case may be heard, and that, in judging of such election or return, the court shall proceed on the merits thereof, and decide the same according to the constitution and laws. The section then concludes as follows: "When the contest is decided, a certificate of election shall be granted to the successful party, unless he shall have already received one. If, however, the court shall be of the opinion that there has been no valid election of any person, the proceedings shall be in conformity with section one hundred and six."

Section 106 provides that, when a vacancy occurs in any county, corporation, or district office, the same shall be filled by the court of the county or corporation in which it occurs, or the judge thereof in vacation; when in the office of clerk of the circuit court, by such circuit court or judge thereof in vacation; when in the office of the chancery court of the city of Richmond, by the said court, etc.; when in the office of sheriff of said city, by the circuit court thereof; when in the office of a corporation or hustings court clerk or attorney for the commonwealth, by the corporation or hustings court of such city, etc. The term of office of any officer appointed under this section shall commence as soon as he shall qualify, and continue for the unexpired term of such office; provided, further, when a vacancy occurs in a corporation office, and the charter of such corporation prescribes the mode of filling such vacancy, the vacancy shall be filled in the mode so prescribed.

It is needless to cite authority for holding that no court can be said to have jurisdiction to hear and determine a matter in controversy when the power to execute its judgment is wanting.

Spelling, in his work on Extraordinary Relief (volume 2, § 1377), says: "It is well settled, as a fundamental principle of the law of mandamus, that courts will not grant this extraordinary remedy where to do so would be fruitless and unavailing. If it appear that the writ would be ineffectual to accomplish the object in view, either from the want of power on the part of the respondent to perform the act required, or on the part of the court granting the writ to compel its performance, the court will refuse to interfere." High, Extr. Rem. § 252.

From any point of view that may be taken of section 160 of the Code, when read in connection with section 106, the respondent in this cause is without jurisdiction to hear and determine the matters complained of by the petitioners; for to do so would be fruitless and unavailing. It is true that section 160 provides that, when the contest is decided, a certificate of election shall be granted to the successful party, etc.; but, were such certificate awarded in this case, it would be wholly ineffectual, as the holder of it, upon presenting it to the board of aldermen or common council of the city, as the case might be, would be met with the response that the council was by express authority, under section 1030, the judge of the election, qualification, and returns of its members; and, if the judgment should be that there had been no valid election in Jackson ward of any person to the common council, it would likewise be fruitless and unavailing, as section 106 of the Code makes no provision for filling the vacancy.

It will not be claimed that authority anywhere exists for respondent to fill by appointment a vacancy in the common council of the city adjudged by him to exist. On the contrary, the statute, as we shall presently see, confers this power expressly upon the common council. It is obvious, therefore, that it was not the legislative intent to include within the provisions of section 160 members of the common council of a city, but only such officers of the city as corresponded to the officers of the respective counties and districts of the state, viz. sheriff, treasurer, clerks, attorney for the commonwealth, etc. When the legislature came to legislate generally upon the government of cities and towns, it provided by section 1030 that "the council shall judge of the election, qualification and returns of its members; may fine them for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds of its members, expel a member; and if any member returned be disqualified or expelled a new election to fill the vacancy shall be held at the same place, on such day as the council may prescribe."

These sections do not conflict, nor are they inconsistent with each other. One (section 160) gives the court jurisdiction, upon a proper petition, of all contests over corporation officers, and the other (section 1030) empowers and authorizes the council itself to adjudicate all questions as to election of its members.

Whether the allegation of petitioners that the candidates for the common council in Jackson ward, at the election of May 24th last, cannot obtain their rights by a contest before the council be true or not, section 1030 specifically prescribes this as their remedy, and, if it be ineffectual, it is not the fault of the statute; and this court is without authority to issue its writ of mandamus to compel the honorable judge of the hustings court, the respondent here, to take jurisdiction and decide upon the complaint, as he rightly held that he was without power to do so. King William Justices v. Munday, 2 Leigh, 165; Page v. Clopton, 30 Grat. 415.

The mandamus prayed for must therefore be denied.

EUBANK et al. v. BOUGHTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. July 5, 1900.)

MANDAMUS—SCHOOL TRUSTEES — DETERMINING COLOR OF SCHOOL CHILDREN—JUDICIAL DISCRETION—DECISION OF BOARD—APPEAL TO COUNTY SUPERINTENDENT.

1. Under Code, §§ 1466, 1492, providing that white and colored persons shall be taught in separate schools, and making it the duty of school trustees to enforce the school laws and regulations, it is the duty of the board to assign white children to schools for white children, and, when any question arises as to the color of a particular applicant, they are to determine it, and courts will not interfere by mandamus to control their determination.

2. Mandamus will not lie to compel a board of school trustees to receive into a school for white children one whom they have decided is a negro, within Code, § 49, declaring every person having one-fourth of negro blood to be a colored person, since petitioner has a right of appeal from the decision of the board, under Code, § 1439, subd. 8, giving the county superintendent of schools jurisdiction to decide finally all complaints concerning the acts of any persons connected with the school system within his bounds.

Error to circuit court, King and Queen county.

Application by George Boughton for a writ of mandamus to compel Eubank, Latane, and Deshazo, district school trustees, to receive his son into a school set apart for white children. From an order directing the issuance of the writ, the trustees bring error. Reversed.

Claggett B. Jones, for plaintiffs in error. Isaac Diggs, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. George Boughton filed his petition in the circuit court of King and Queen county praying for a mandamus upon Eubank, Latane, and Deshazo, district school trustees for Stevensville district, in said county, in which he states that he is a voter, a taxpayer, and head of a family, with two children between the ages of 5 and 20 years, who reside with him in the district and county aforesaid; that he and his wife and children are white, and his children are entitled to attend the public free school for white children, but that they have been refused admission by the trustees; and he therefore prays for a mandamus directed to the trustees above named to compel them to receive his son into the school set apart for white children. The trustees answered, saying that in the exercise of their discretion they had refused to grant the request of petitioner, because they were informed and believed that the child of petitioner is a negro, and to permit him to attend the school for white children would not only materially interfere with its prosperity and efficiency, but, in their judgment, would destroy it.

Upon the issue thus made testimony was taken, and the circuit court being of opinion that it established the fact that petitioner's son "has not one-fourth of negro blood in him," and is therefore a white person, awarded the writ of mandamus. This judgment is before us upon a writ of error.

The writ of mandamus is the appropriate means of compelling the performance by a public officer of a duty which is either imposed upon him by some express enactment or necessarily results from the office which he holds. It does not lie in any matter requiring official judgment, or resting in sound discretion; for in such a case the court can do no more than compel the officer to exercise his function according to some discretion when he has refused or neglected to act at all. By it an inferior court may be directed to hear a case, but the decision to be rendered cannot be affected. Spell. Extr. Relief, §§ 1432, 1433; Thurston v. Hudgins, 93 Va. 784, 20 S. E. 966.

Section 1492 of the Code provides, among other things, "that white and colored persons shall not be taught in the same schools but in separate schools under the same general regulations as to management, usefulness and efficiency."

Section 1466 makes it one of the duties of the boards of school trustees "to explain and enforce the school laws and regulations." When, therefore, application was made to the board to admit to a white school the son of petitioner, it became at once the duty of the board to ascertain, before granting or refusing the request, whether the child of petitioner was a white person or a negro,—that is to say, whether he had more than one-fourth of negro blood; for that is the test established by section 49 of the Code, which declares that "every person having one-fourth or more of negro blood shall be deemed a colored person."

It is the duty of the board to assign white children to schools for white children, and it is none the less their duty to assign colored children to the schools for colored children. When the question arises as to the color of a particular applicant, the board must take evidence, and make such disposition of the matter as shall seem right. Here, then, is a duty which calls for the exercise of judicial discretion. It is true that when the fact is ascertained the duty is plain. When the status of the applicant is fixed by the judgment upon the evidence, the law itself assigns him to the proper school. The law has seen fit to confide the determination of the question to a board of school trustees, and the discharge of the duty thus imposed upon the board involves, as we have seen, the exercise of a judicial discretion, and the court cannot control its exercise. But the decision of the board is not final. If petitioner felt himself aggrieved by its action, he had, under subdivision 8 of section 1439 of the Code, a right of appeal to the county superintendent of schools, who is given jurisdiction to "decide finally all appeals or complaints concerning the acts of any persons connected with the school system within his bounds, unless the matters in question are properly referable to other authorities." So there are two grounds upon which the judgment complained of must be reversed. It undertakes to control the official judgment of the board of trustees in the exercise of a discretionary power specially confided to them by the statute, and because the petitioner is given a remedy by appeal to the county superintendent.

"Where a party aggrieved by the action of a board of school directors has an adequate remedy by appeal to the county superintendent, he is not entitled to a writ of mandamus." Spell. Extr. Relief, § 1445; Marshall v. Sloan, 35 Iowa, 445; Barnett v. Directors, 73 Iowa, 134, 34 N. W. 780; Mitchell v. Witt (Va.) 36 S. E. 528.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, with costs.

ANDREWS v. ROANOKE BLDG. ASS'N & INV. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. July 5, 1900.)

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATIONS — WITHDRAWING MEMBER — RIGHTS — ACTION — ACCRUAL — LIMITATIONS — RECEIVERS — DISSOLUTION.

1. Since a suit by a withdrawing member of a building and loan association to recover the withdrawal value of his stock does not accrue until there is a sufficient fund in the hands of the association applicable for that purpose, a suit by such member to have a receiver appointed, and to wind up the affairs of the association, is not barred by limitations, where no fund ever existed, since his withdrawal, out of which his claim could have been recovered by suit.

2. Where, after notice of withdrawal was given by a member of a building association, but before such notice became effective, the association changed its by-laws, by which one-fourth of the amount paid in by holders of installment stock was set apart for the purpose of paying withdrawals, so that the installment stock was converted into paid-up stock, leaving no stock from which a fund could be raised for the payment of withdrawals, such withdrawing member was entitled to the appointment of a receiver for the association, and, if necessary, to wind up its affairs.

Appeal from corporation court of Roanoke; John W. Woods, Judge.

Suit by W. K. Andrews against the Roanoke Building Association & Investment Company for a receiver and to wind up its affairs. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

S. Hamilton Graves, for appellant. Cocke & Glasgow, for appellee.

KEITH, P. Appellant instituted his suit in the hustings court of the city of Roanoke, on behalf of himself and all other creditors of the appellee on the 30th of September, 1898, in which he states that he is the owner of 10 shares of the stock of the company, upon which he had paid $500 in monthly installments of $10 each; that on the 20th of April, 1893, he gave notice of withdrawal to the company in due form; that under the by-laws, as they then existed, his notice did not become effective until the 20th of the ensuing May; that on the 15th day of April, 1893, at a meeting of the stockholders, a change was made in the by-laws, the effect of which was to create a specific sum out of which withdrawals could be paid, which was limited to one-quarter of the amount paid into the association by the holders of installment stock; that as of May 15, 1893, there were in existence 1,643 shares of installment stock, monthly payments upon which would have produced something more than $400; that a number of said shares have been paid for and discharged, and the residue have all been converted into paid-up stock under the amendments of the by-laws of May 15, 1893, with the exception of 22 shares, for which notice of withdrawal had been filed prior to May 15, 1893, and of which the shares of appellant constitute a part; that at a regular annual meeting of the stockholders, held on the 15th of April, 1898, further amendments to the charter and changes in the by-laws were proposed, and to that end a petition was presented to the judge of the hustings court, who entered an order as of the 19th of July, 1898, making the amendments asked for, by virtue of which, whenever there happens to be as much as $500 in the treasury, the company notifies its stockholders, and invites bids from them, the member offering the largest number of shares of stock to be canceled for the least amount of money being accepted. It appears that there is not, and never has been, in the treasury of the company, a fund applicable to the demands of the appellant; nor can there be in the future, since there are no longer any contributing members.

There are other averments of fact in the bill, the tendency of which are to strengthen the position of the appellant, but enough has been said to enable us properly to present our conclusions with respect to the law of the case.

The defendant demurred, and also filed a plea of the statute of limitations, setting forth that the cause of action did not arise within three or five years before the institution of the suit.

The position occupied by a withdrawing member of a building association is not very clearly defined by the authorities. It is said that he is not in all respects a creditor, for, if that were so, he might get judgment, issue an execution, acquire a lien upon real estate, and subject the personalty of the association, to the prejudice of other creditors. He is no longer a member of the association, so far as his right to participate in its management and control is concerned. He has no right of action against the company until a fund accrues out of which, in accordance with the charter and by-laws of the company, his debt should be paid; and, as it appears from the averments of this bill that no such fund existed at any time in this case, it would seem that the right of action has never accrued to him as a creditor. If this be true, then it follows that his right to sue is not affected by the statute of limitations; but, if he is to be regarded only as a creditor, he is still out of court, because there was no right of action which entitled him to be in court. A member of such an association must, upon withdrawal, retain some relation to the company, growing out of his membership, other than that of creditor. It seems to us that by so much as he falls short of being clothed with the rights of a creditor, by so much there must remain in him the residuum of his rights as a member; otherwise, as in the case at bar, he could not sue as a creditor, because there was no fund out of which his debt could be paid, and the company, by its dereliction of duty, would deny all redress if he is not permitted to seek a remedy in his capacity as stockholder. These propositions seem to be supported by authority.

In Heinbokel v. Association, 58 Minn. 340, 59 N. W. 1050, 25 L. R. A. 216, the supreme court of Minnesota held that a member of an association who has brought himself within the rules by notice of withdrawal cannot bring an action, and take judgment against the association, when there is no money in the treasury legally applicable to the payment of his claim. To the same effect, see Engelhardt v. Association, 148 N. Y. 281, 42 N. E. 710, 35 L. R. A. 289.

In support of the position that a withdrawing member has not lost all of his right or interest as such in the association, there are numerous decisions and the authority of respectable text writers.

"The right of members to presently withdraw deposits is practically limited to funds on hand, and the withdrawing member must show that there are funds for that purpose before he can enforce his demand; but it is an abuse of discretion for the directors to invest the entire funds in real estate, so as to leave none applicable to the payment of withdrawing members, and thus defeat their rights. When notice of withdrawal is given the association, it should arrange the disposition of its receipts so as to meet its payments when due. While the right to withdraw is only grantable out of funds designated for that purpose, it is not intended that rightful lack of funds shall defeat the right as against the members. So, if the association is solvent, and a member gives notice of withdrawal, and the notice had matured before the association is being wound up, he is entitled to be paid out of the assets, after outside creditors, in priority to those members who had not given notice, notwithstanding the fact that, after he had given the notice, there were no funds for payment. The intention of the rule is to prevent the application of the funds to withdrawals to such an extent that its operations will be crippled; and, when it winds up, the reason of the rule does not apply, which readily defeats the application of the rule itself." Thomp. Bldg. Ass'ns, c. 8, § 13.

It is said in End. Bldg. Ass'ns (2d Ed.) § 514, where the demands of all the members of such a corporation cannot be paid in full, there are ordinarily several classes advancing contradictory claims, "to wit, members who have given notice of withdrawal, and the period of whose required notice may have expired before the proceedings to wind up were instituted, and members who have given no such notice. * * * The tendency of the English courts, whilst recognizing that a withdrawing member is not a 'creditor' of the association in the ordinary sense of the word, has been to allow them a preference supposed to be based in the rules of the society over those who have given no withdrawal notice."

In Sibun v. Pearce, 44 Ch. Div. 354, Lindley, L. J., says, of the position of one who has given notice of withdrawal, but has not received payment: "That he is not an ordinary creditor is plain. He cannot come into competition with outside creditors. On the other hand, as between himself and the continuing members, he is entitled to be paid the amount due to him before they can divide the assets. In that sense he is a creditor, though he cannot take part in the affairs of the society."

We have seen that a withdrawing member cannot sue until a sufficient fund is accumulated by the society to meet his demand, for until that event has happened he has no right of action, and it is well established that the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the right of action accrues. We have seen that it is the duty of the association to set apart a fund to meet its obligation to withdrawing members, and it conclusively appears from the bill under consideration that this duty in this instance has not been performed, and that the course taken by the stockholders precludes the possibility that appellant can obtain relief from that source.

The prayer for relief asks the appointment of a receiver, and, if need be, the winding up of the affairs of the company. This prayer, upon the facts presented by the bill, is sufficient to entitle the appellant to the relief which he seeks, if, upon a hearing on the merits, he is able to establish by proof the case which he has made in the pleadings.

The decree of the hustings court must be reversed, and the cause remanded to be further proceeded in in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

DE LOACH et al. v. SARRATT.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 3, 1900.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — MALADMINISTRATION—COSTS—CLAIMS—ORDER OF PAYMENT—COMPENSATION.

1. Where administrators voluntarily place a fund belonging to their decedent's estate out of their hands and beyond their control, they will be held liable for the costs of proceedings supplementary to execution instituted by a judgment creditor of the decedent to subject such fund to the payment of his judgment,—such proceeding being rendered necessary by reason of the failure of the administrators to properly administer the estate; and, in case such costs cannot be collected from the administrators, the judgment creditor may recover his costs from the fund before it is applied to the payment of his judgment.

2. Under Rev. St. 1893, § 2048, providing that the funeral expenses and expenses of the last illness of a deceased person shall be first paid, in the administration of his estate, it is proper for the court, in proceedings supplementary to an execution, brought to subject a fund belonging to the estate of a deceased person to the payment of a judgment against the decedent, on which an execution was returned unsatisfied during the lifetime of the judgment debtor, to provide that the funeral expenses and expenses of the last illness shall be paid before the fund is applied to the payment of the judgment.

3. Administrators indorsed a check given in payment of life insurance on the life of their decedent to one who collected the check and deposited the proceeds in his own name, as trustee. Held, that the administrators never received or paid out the money, so as to entitle them to commissions thereon.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Cherokee county; George W. Gage, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth De Loach and another against A. A. Sarratt. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and on the return of an execution unsatisfied, and after the death of the judgment debtor, plaintiffs applied for an order in proceedings supplementary to execution for the purpose of subjecting a fund belonging to the estate of the deceased judgment debtor, in the hands of F. G. Stacey and others, administrators, to the payment of the judgment. From an order made in such proceedings, the judgment creditors appeal. Modified.

The following is a copy of the order complained of:

"On 7th August, 1899, I made an order designating Arthur L. Gaston, Esq., to examine one F. G. Stacey, of Gaffney, concerning certain property belonging to the estate of A. A. Sarratt, deceased, and alleged to be in his possession. The order was made pursuant to section 314 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The examination was had, and a report made to me. On the coming in thereof, the plaintiffs applied for an ex parte order directing the payment of the funds in Stacey's hands over to them on their judgment. I did not make the order then, but gave notice to the attorneys of S. G. and W. J. Sarratt, administrators of defendant, and to the attorney of Stacey, that I would hear the plaintiff's motion, at Chester, on 25th August, 1899. On that day the motion was heard, and it was resisted by the attorneys for Stacey and the Sarratts. Pending the hearing of that motion, and before the attorneys resisting the same had notice of it, they gave notice that they would move before me, at Spartanburg, on 5th September, to set aside the order of 7th August, and the proceedings had before Arthur L. Gaston thereunder. The grounds of that motion were argued on 25th August, and have been considered. The order of 7th August was directed to be served on the parties in interest, and it was served on S. G. Sarratt and W. J. Sarratt, administrators, and on F. G. Stacey; and they all appeared before the referee and before us by counsel. The facts are fully stated in the report of A. L. Gaston, Esq., referee, and I shall not repeat them here, but only affirm his findings, except where modified. It was admitted at the hearing that the plaintiffs' judgment for some $10,000 against A. A. Sarratt was the oldest against the estate, and that there was only one other, junior thereto, for some $260, belonging to Beauregard Goings. It was also conceded that A. A. Sarratt left a family of some ten children, of whom six are minors, and that they all reside in Cherokee.

"At the hearing before me on 25th August, the witness F. G. Stacey asked leave, by formal notice, to commence an action, making all claimants parties, to settle the right to have the fund in his hand. I see no warrant in the statute for this demand, and this is a statutory proceeding. Stacey does not deny the possession, nor does he claim any interest in the property. See section 319, Code. Besides, the administrators are practically parties to this proceeding. The order was served on them. They have appeared along with Stacey, and have been heard.

"The most serious difficulty I have had is this: Ought the fund in Stacey's hands to be paid by him to the administrators, to be administered according to section 2048, Rev. St. 1893, or ought the provisions of section 314 of the Code be complied with and enforced? The administrators once had this money, for they indorsed the check. The money was deposited with Stacey, not for the trusts of A. A. Sarratt's estate, but in trust for S. G. Sarratt and W. J. Sarratt. This money is liable for the payment of plaintiffs' judgment. It would be liable if the administrators had it. But the administrators demand it for administration according to the statute; that is, to receive their commissions, and to pay funeral expenses and expenses of last illness, etc., and then to pay plaintiffs' judgment. Section 317 of the Code empowers me to order any property of the judgment debtor in the hands of either himself or any other person to be applied to the satisfaction of the judgment. Manifestly, I ought not to give force to the provisions of the Code, and ignore the provisions of section 2048, Rev. St. The plaintiffs are entitled to have the fund in Stacey's hands applied to their judgment, but let $500 be reserved thereout, to be applied to a homestead for A. A. Sarratt's children, if they establish the same before the proper tribunal. Out of the balance let the fees of the witnesses be paid, including a fee for the referee of twenty-five dollars and his disbursements. Then let so much be reserved as is necessary for the payment of the funeral and other expenses of last sickness of A. A. Sarratt, deceased. Then let the defendant administrators have their lawful commissions for receiving the fund, but not for paying it out. Then, plaintiffs' judgment. And, to secure the proper and orderly execution of this order, let the fund be paid forthwith by F. C. Stacey to the clerk of this court, and let him disburse the same, taking such commissions therefor as is allowed by law. Let a copy of this order be served on F. G. Stacey and S. G. and W. J. Sarratt, and let the original be manifested to them. In the event either party (the plaintiff, Stacey, or the Sarratts) appeals from this order, they may apply before me to have its execution deferred until the judgment of the supreme court is had thereon, meantime continuing the injunction heretofore granted."

From this decree plaintiffs gave due notice of their intention to appeal. and, pursuant to said notice, do now appeal from said decree, and ask that it be modified by this court, upon the following grounds:

"First. For that his honor erred in not ordering the entire fund of $5,000 in the hands of F. G. Stacey to be paid directly on the judgment of plaintiffs, in whose favor execution had been issued on their judgment against A. A. Sarratt in the sum of $11,201.24, and tested in the lifetime of the said judgment debtor. Second. For that his honor erred in not, at least, ordering the whole of the fund in the hands of F. G. Stacey to be paid on the judgment of the plaintiffs, less the sum of $500 to be held and applied to a personal exemption in favor of the heirs of A. A. Sarratt, should they establish their claim thereto before the proper tribunal; the plaintiffs being the owners of an execution issued on their judgment recovered against A. A. Sarratt, and tested in his lifetime. Third. For that his honor erred in not holding, as was urged, that where execution had been issued and tested against the judgment debtor, A. A. Sarratt, in his lifetime, his administrators personally cannot be affected, and scire facias against them would be both unnecessary and unwarranted. Fourth. For that his honor erred in allowing commissions out of the fund to the administrators of A. A. Sarratt. Fifth. For that his honor erred in not giving full force and effect to sections 317 and 314 of the Code of Procedure of South Carolina, and in allowing, in proceedings supplementary to execution, the provisions of section 2048, Rev. St. 1893, to in any manner override same. Sixth. For that his honor erred in ordering the fees of witnesses and the fee of Arthur L. Gaston, Esq., referee, to be paid out of the fund, and in not requiring the fees of said witnesses and referee to be paid by F. G. Stacey."

W. B. De Loach and Wm. B. McCaw, for appellants. Munro & Munro, Duncan & Sanders, and J. C. Jefferies, for appellee.

McIVER, C. J. This is an appeal from an order granted by his honor, Judge Gage, made in a proceeding supplementary to an execution, issued to enforce a judgment obtained by the said James E. De Loach and Elizabeth De Loach against the said A. A. Sarratt in his lifetime. This execution having been returned nulla bona in the lifetime of the judgment debtor, and the judgment creditors, who are the appellants herein, having learned that the estate of their judgment debtor had become entitled to a large sum of money, the proceeds of a policy issued by the New York Life Insurance Company upon the life of said A. A. Sarratt, which had passed into the hands of the respondent, F. G. Stacey, they applied for and obtained an order from his honor, Judge Gage, requiring the said Stacey to appear before Arthur L. Gaston, Esq., who was apointed referee for that purpose, and be examined touching the same. Copies of this order were duly served upon the said F. G. Stacey, and also upon the other respondents herein, S. G. Sarratt and W. J. Sarratt, who claimed to be administrators of the deceased judgment debtor, A. A. Sarratt. This examination, together with the testimony of other witnesses, was taken and reported to the court, all of which is set out in the "case." Thereupon the order bearing date 16th of September, 1899, was granted by Judge Gage, from which the judgment creditors alone appeal; asking certain modifications thereof, as set out in their exceptions. For a more full understanding of the questions presented, let this order and the exceptions thereto be embraced by the reporter in his report of the case. Inasmuch as it was agreed at the hearing of this appeal that the question as to the right of homestead set up in behalf of the children of the deceased judgment debtor, whereby the sum of $500 should be reserved out of the fund in question, should be reserved, we pass by the exception raising that question, and will not consider or decide that question, but will confine our attention to the other points in which error is imputed to the circuit judge. These points are (1) the allowance of the witness fees out of the fund; (2) the allowance of the fee of the referee and his disbursements; (3) the allowance of the funeral expenses and other expenses of the last illness of the judgment debtor; (4) the allowance of commissions to the administrators.

As to the first and second of these points, which may be considered together, inasmuch as they both practically relate to the costs of the proceedings, it seems to us clear that this proceeding was rendered necessary by the illegal and improper action of the administrators, and therefore they should be held primarily liable for all the costs and expenses incident to the proceeding. The testimony in the case leaves no doubt upon our minds that these administrators, instead of pursuing the usual and proper course in administering the assets of their intestate's estate, saw fit, for some reason (as to which the court is not at liberty to speculate, though it would not be difficult to form a conjecture as to what was their real motive), voluntarily to place this fund beyond their control, and that this alone rendered this litigation necessary, to enable the judgment creditors to obtain their just rights. But, if these costs cannot be made out of the administrators personally, then the fees of such witnesses as they may have summoned, as well as the fee and disbursements of the referee, whose services they doubtless obtained, should be paid by the judgment creditors, or (what is the same thing, practically) should be deducted from the fund before applying the same to their judgment.

As to the third point, we agree with the circuit judge that the funeral expenses and the expenses of the last illness of the judgment debtor should be provided for out of the fund before applying the same to the judgment. Section 2048, Rev St., gives a preference to claims of that character over judgments, where such judgments have no lien upon the fund to be administered (and here it does not appear that these judgment creditors had ever acquired a lien upon the fund in question); and, when the court takes possession of the assets of an intestate, it should, as far as practicable, conform to the law prescribed for the administrator in the administration of such assets. In this way the provisions of section 2048 can be harmonized with the provisions of the Code in reference to proceedings supplemental to an exception.

As to the fourth and last point, however, we cannot agree with the circuit judge, as we do not think that the administrators are entitled to any commissions on this fund, either for receiving or paying out the same, for the reason that they cannot be said to have ever either received or paid out the same. It is true that the circuit judge says in his order that "the administrators once had this money, for they indorsed the check." But this is a mistaken inference from the testimony. This fund was originally represented by a check drawn by the New York Life Insurance Company on the New York Security & Trust Company, payable "to the order of S. G. Sarratt and W. J. Sarratt, administrators"; and this check they, by their indorsement thereon, transferred and delivered to F. G. Stacey, trustee, who collected the money and deposited the same in bank, not to the credit of the estate of A. A. Sarratt, or to the credit of S. G. Sarratt and W. J. Sarratt, as administrators of said estate, but to his own credit, as trustee. For, as the circuit judge finds (and his finding is not only supported by the testimony, but has not been excepted to or appealed from), "the money was deposited with Stacey, not for the trusts of the estate of A. A. Sarratt's estate, but in trust for S. G. Sarratt and W. J. Sarratt." Now, if these administrators had indorsed this check to Stacey for collection, with instructions to deposit the proceeds in bank when collected, to the credit of the estate of A. A. Sarratt, or to their own credit, as administrators of that estate, then it might with some propriety be claimed that they had, at least, constructively, received the proceeds of the check, and were therefore entitled to commissions for receiving the same. But that is not the case here. On the contrary, it is more like the case of an administrator, holding a note payable to his order as such, who by indorsement transfers the same to a third person, who collects the money due on the note, and deposits the same in bank to his own credit; and in such case it could not with any sort or propriety be claimed that such administrator had received the amount of money mentioned in the note. It seems to us, therefore, that the circuit judge erred in holding that the administrators were entitled to commissions for receiving the fund in question, and that in this respect, also, his order must be modified. The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from must be modified as hereinabove indicated, and, when so modified, that the order be affirmed.

EBAUGH v. EASTERN BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N OF SYRACUSE, N. Y.

FOREIGN BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION—STOCK—CONTRACT TO MATURE SHARES—VALIDITY UNDER LAWS OF NEW YORK—NEW YORK LAW—REFEREE'S FINDINGS—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Plaintiff's stock certificates in defendant building and loan association provided that in consideration of certain membership fees and monthly dues, payable for 6½ years, amounting to $595 for each $1,000 worth of stock, the stock should be redeemed at its par value at the end of that period. Plaintiff, having performed his part of the contract, sued to enforce it; and his action was referred to a referee, who found as a fact that the statutes of New York, where defendant resided and the stock was issued, which were in force at the time of contract, did not forbid the making of such contract, and also that by New York law a corporation entering into a contract, suffering the other party to perform, and receiving and retaining the benefits thereof, is bound by the contract, though in excess of its charter powers. This report was confirmed by the circuit judge. Held, that the findings as to the statutes and law of New York were findings of fact, and not subject to review on appeal, and hence that plaintiff's contract was enforceable against defendant.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by David W. Ebaugh against the Eastern Building & Loan Association of Syracuse, N. Y., to recover the par value of certain shares of stock. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff on a referee's report, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The cause was tried before a referee, who made the following findings:

"All issues of law and fact arising on the pleadings having been referred to me, I proceeded to hold a reference, and took the testimony which is herewith reported.

"The defendant is a corporation chartered in 1890 under the laws of the state of New York. In the spring of 1892 an agent of the defendant approached the plaintiff, in Greenville, S. C., where he resides, and solicited him to become a stockholder in the defendant company. The agent exhibited to the plaintiff certain printed circulars or literature, and a specimen of the certificate of stock issued by defendant. The agent also made certain verbal statements to the effect that the company would pay to the plaintiff par value for the stock after seventy-eight monthly payments, and this agreement would be valid. But, as I am in doubt as to the admissibility of these statements, I have not considered them in the discussion of the questions at issue. Practically the same statements, put in a clearer and more tangible form, were contained in the circulars issued by the defendant company, and used by its agent in soliciting the plaintiff's subscription. These statements represented the company as promising unconditionally and absolutely that it would pay to the stockholder one hundred dollars for each share of stock at the end of seventy-eight months, alleging that it was 'the only association making a contract definite in every particular'; that its 'shares mature in exactly six and one-half years'; and that, 'on a basis of ten shares (one thousand dollars' maturity value), he will have paid in five hundred and ninety-five dollars, and receives one thousand dollars.' The certificate itself contained the following promise: 'The said Eastern Building and Loan Association of Syracuse, New York, agree to pay said shareholder, or his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of one hundred dollars for each of said shares at the end of seventy-eight months from the date hereof.' This promise is clear, unconditional, and absolute. The circulars issued by the defendant show that this was its construction of this promise. I do not think that this promise can be limited or controlled by any indefinite or vague provisions contained in the by-laws. A similar certificate, together with the charter and by-laws of the defendant company, were before the supreme court in the case of Williamson v. Association, 54 S. C. 582, 32 S. E. 765. The court in that case held that the promise was absolute and unconditional, and bound the defendant to pay one hundred dollars for each share at the end of seventy-eight months. The decision in that case is conclusive of this. The evidence shows, and I so hold, that the plaintiff paid his entrance fees and all monthly dues. The Williamson Case was an appeal from an order of the circuit judge dissolving the attachment and dismissing the action. This order of the circuit judge proceeded upon two grounds: (1) That the notes and bonds attached were not the subject of attachment; (2) that the changes made in the charter in 1894 and in the by-laws of 1896 provided that not more than one-half of the amount received each month from dues and stock payments should be used in paying withdrawing and maturing stock, and that withdrawals should be paid in the order of the applications therefor. On this ground the circuit judge held that the plaintiff had no present cause of action, and dismissed the proceedings. In the present case there is absolutely no evidence that there were any changes made either in the charter or by-laws, so that the questions at issue are to be decided as though no such changes had been made. The supreme court reversed the order of the circuit judge, and held that, under the contract of the defendant, it was bound to pay to the plaintiff the par value of its stock after seventy-eight months. The question as to whether this promise was in excess of the charter powers was not expressly decided by the supreme court, but that court did decide that, even though it were in excess of its charter powers (in the language of Railroad Co. v. McDonald [Ind. App.] 46 N. E. 1022, 60 Am. St. Rep. 172), 'the general rule is that where a private corporation has entered into a contract not immoral in itself, and not forbidden by any statute, and it has been in good faith performed by the other party, the corporation will not be heard on a plea of ultra vires.' This proposition is fully sustained by the decisions of New York. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the following decisions of that court: Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. 62; De Groff v. Thread Co., 21 N. Y. 124; Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 13 N. E. 419. This constituted the only evidence before me as to what was the law of New York touching this point. I find as a matter of fact that the law of New York is that, where a corporation enters into a contract that is in excess of its charter powers or is unauthorized by law, it will nevertheless be bound to perform its agreement as contained in the contract, if it suffers the other party to perform his agreement, and receives the benefits and retains them. This being the law of New York, it is conclusive of the case at issue. I find, as a matter of fact, that the defendant promised to pay to the plaintiff one hundred dollars for each share of the stock taken by him, at the end of seventy-eight months, and that it represented to him that in issuing this stock it would be bound to perform this agreement according to its terms. I further find that the plaintiff was induced by this promise and this representation to take the stock, and that, believing the promise to be valid and that the defendant intended to perform it, he paid the entrance fee and the monthly dues. I further find that the defendant, knowing that the plaintiff relied upon the validity of this promise, allowed him to pay his money, and that defendant has continued to hold onto this money, and has never offered to return it. I therefore hold that, even if the contract made by the defendant was in excess of its charter powers, it would not be heard to plead ultra vires, but would be bound, under the law of New York, to perform its promise as expressed in the certificate. The defendant introduced in evidence chapter 122, Laws N. Y. 1851, and chapter 564, Laws N. Y. 1875, under which defendant's charter was issued, and he urged upon me to hold that these acts forbid the defendant to make a contract such as that contained in the certificate. There is no provision in these statutes which forbids such a contract. The most that can be said is that the statutes do not confer the powers, or authorize a corporation chartered under them to make such an agreement; in other words, that such an agreement is in excess of its charter powers. But I am by no means convinced that these acts do not confer upon building and loan associations the power to make an agreement of the kind set forth in the certificate of stock. The objection urged against this agreement is that it provides for the maturity of the stock at a definite time. Chapter 122, § 2, authorizes building and loan associations to provide 'the manner of redemption of shares by advances made thereon.' 'And the ultimate amount to be paid to the owners of unredeemed shares.' This chapter, as well as chapter 564, evidently contemplates that a building and loan association may issue paid-up stock; and they do not impose any limitation upon the price at which such stock is to be issued, or as to the terms of its redemption. It is clear that under these statutes the association could issue ten shares of paid-up stock for five hundred and eighty-five dollars in cash, to be redeemed at the end of seventy-eight months. For the same reason, I do not see why such an association may not issue stock to be fully paid up by seventy-eight monthly payments, and to be redeemed at par at the end of that time. The latter promise may be unwise, but this is not the question at issue. It is whether such a contract is forbidden by the statutes. I am clearly of the opinion that it is not forbidden by the statutes, and I so hold. The most that can be said is that such a promise is not authorized by the statute. I therefore conclude that the promise made by the defendant to pay the plaintiff one hundred dollars for each share of stock at the end of seventy-eight months is not immoral in itself, and is not forbidden by statute either in New York or in this state.

"The defendant introduced in evidence the decision in the case of O'Malley v. Association, 92 Hun, 572, 36 N. Y. Supp. 1016, for the purpose of showing that an agreement like that contained in Ebaugh's certificate is not enforceable under the laws of New York. The plaintiff objected to the introduction of this decision as evidence on the ground that it was irrelevant to the issues in this case, to wit: (1) That the decision was rendered in 1895, whereas the contract sued on was made in 1892; and (2) in that the decision was made by the supreme court of the state of New York, which is not a court of last resort. While I have admitted the decision, I do not think it has any force in determining the issues between the plaintiff and the defendant. The decisions of the supreme court of New York do not settle the law of that state. They tend to this result no more than do circuit court decisions in South Carolina. I repeat that in my opinion this contract is neither immoral, nor is it forbidden by the laws of New York or of this state.

"It is possible that this contract might not be enforceable by a stockholder as against creditors. But there is no such question in this case. There is no allegation that the defendant owes any debts. On the contrary, it was stated in argument that the defendant association was abundantly solvent. The question is merely between the association itself and one of its stockholders,—between him who promises and him to whom the promise is made. It is urged that to allow plaintiff to recover judgment on his contract will work a preference to him over other stockholders. This argument might meet with some consideration if insolvency proceedings had been commenced, and a receiver appointed. But no such proceedings have been started, and there is no evidence that to allow the plaintiff judgment will work a preference in his favor. But, even if it did work a preference, this would be no defense to an action at law brought upon the defendant's agreement. Again, it is said that, if the courts hold the defendant to be bound by its promise as contained in its certificate, this would operate to bankrupt the defendant. But this argument cannot prevail. It is the business of the court to enforce contracts as made, and its hands will not be stayed by reason of the debtor's plea that the enforcement of his obligations will reduce him to bankruptcy. It may be that the defendant's agreement with its stockholders was unwise, but, if so, this court has nothing to do with that question. This is an action at law brought upon a contract made by the defendant. This contract is to be enforced according to its terms.

"To summarize my conclusions, I hold as follows: (1) That the defendant bound itself in express terms to pay to the plaintiff one hundred dollars for each share of stock subscribed by him, at the end of seventy-eight months, provided he paid his monthly installments during that time, and that the plaintiff did pay all his monthly dues. (2) That this promise was not immoral in itself, and was not forbidden by the statutes or law of New York, as established at the time of the contract. (3) That even if this contract was in excess of its chartered powers, and was unauthorized by the laws of New York, yet, under the principle of law as established in that state and in this state, the defendant would be bound to discharge its promise, where it had received and where it retains the benefit of the transaction. I find that it did receive and does retain the benefit of the transaction, and that it suffered the plaintiff to perform his part of the agreement under the belief that its promise was valid, and that it would discharge such promise according to its terms. I therefore hold that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of one thousand dollars, with interest from October 15, 1898, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and for the costs of this action. All of which is respectfully reported."

The following is the decree of the circuit judge:

"The defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of New York, with its principal place of business in the city of Syracuse. In the early part of the year 1892 it began business in the state of South Carolina, and organized in the city of Greenville a local branch of said association. The plaintiff is a resident of the city of Greenville, in said state. The defendant's agent approached the plaintiff for the purpose of inducing him to become a stockholder in the defendant company. The agent exhibited to the plaintiff a form of the certificate of stock, which contained, among other things, this promise: 'Eastern Building and Loan Association of Syracuse, New York, agree to pay said shareholder, or his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of one hundred dollars for each of said shares, at the end of seventy-eight months.' At the same time the agent exhibited to him certain printed circulars, or literature, of the defendant company. One of these circulars was entitled 'The Definite Contract Plan.' This circular stated:

"'Q. What amount is deposited monthly? A. Seventy-five cents per share. * * * Q. When will the shares reach their par value? A. Shares mature in exactly six and one-half years. Q. How much will a member have to pay in altogether? A. On a basis of ten shares (one thousand dollars maturity value), he will have paid in five hundred and ninety-five dollars ($595), and receives one thousand dollars. * * * All shares on which payments are made are regularly matured at the expiration of seventy-eight months (six and one-half years) from date of certificate. * * * Illustration showing costs and profits to the investor of ten shares, of $1,000, six and a half years, at time of maturity:

He pays a membership fee of $1.00 per share	$ 10 00
He pays monthly installments of $7.50 per month for 78 months ($7.50× 78)	585 00
Total amount invested	$ 595 00
He receives in cash at maturity	1,000 00

"' * * * The only association making a contract definite in every particular. * * * Stock matures in seventy-eight months.'

"On reading the circulars, and after listening to the persuasive talk of the agent, the plaintiff was induced to become a subscriber for ten shares of stock. Thereupon the certificate sued upon was issued to him. This certificate is dated on April 1, 1892. It certifies that: 'D. W. Ebaugh, of Greenville, county of Greenville, and state of South Carolina, is hereby constituted a shareholder of the Eastern Building and Loan Association of Syracuse, New York, incorporated under the laws of New York, and holds ten shares therein, of one hundred dollars each, and in consideration of the membership fee, together with agreements and statements contained in the application for membership in the association, and full compliance with the terms, conditions, and by-laws printed on the front and back of this certificate, which are hereby referred to and made a part of this contract; and the said Eastern Building and Loan Association of Syracuse, New York, agree to pay to said shareholder, or his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of one hundred dollars for each of said shares, at the end of seventy-eight months from the date hereof.' Ebaugh paid the entrance fees, and continued to pay the monthly installments until seventy-eight months had elapsed. The last payment was made on October 1, 1898. In subscribing to this stock and in making these payments, Ebaugh trusted to the statements contained in the circular, and to the promise made in the certificate. About one month before the last payment was made, the association wrote to Ebaugh, stating that they could not carry out the contract, and stating that they could not pay him one hundred dollars upon the end of seventy-eight months, but that he would have to continue making payments. In reply to this, Ebaugh wrote that he had made a definite contract with the association, and expected them to comply with its terms. A short time after making the last remittance, he signed a blank receipt upon the back of the certificate, and sent the same to the association, with the request that they forward him a check for the money due him. The association refused to make payment, and on January 17, 1899, this action was commenced to recover from the association the sum of one thousand dollars, with interest thereon from October 1, 1898. Certain property of the defendant company in this state was attached in said action. The defendant made answer, alleging that there was no contract to mature the stock at a definite period, but that it was only estimated that the stock would be matured in seventy-eight months. It also claims that any promise to mature the stock within a definite time would be contrary to their by-laws and charter, and contrary to the laws of New York.

"By agreement of counsel, all issues of law and fact were referred to Oscar Hodges, a member of the bar at Greenville, as special referee. Mr. Hodges took testimony, and heard argument, and filed his report, wherein he concludes 'that the plaintiff is entitled to recover judgment against the defendant for the sum of one thousand dollars, with interest from October 15, 1898, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and for the costs of this action.' To this report the defendant filed certain exceptions. After hearing argument, I am satisfied that the report of the referee is correct in every particular, and the exceptions are hereby overruled. The defendant certainly made definite assurances in those circulars, and a definite promise as to the maturity of stock, —that if the plaintiff would pay the entrance fees, and his monthly dues for seventy-eight months, at the end of that time it would pay to him one hundred dollars for each share of stock taken by him. These assurances and this promise were made for the purpose of procuring the plaintiff as a stockholder. This promise was definite. The plaintiff relied upon it, and made the payment of his entrance fees and his monthly dues. The association knew that the plaintiff was relying upon its promise, and allowed him to make all these payments and to incur the liability of a stockholder. It received the full benefit of this transaction, and it cannot now be heard to say that the contract was contrary to its by-laws or its charter. Even if this contract were in excess of its charter powers, the association would nevertheless be bound by it, inasmuch as it received the full benefit thereof. In the cases of Williamson v. Association (S. C.) 32 S. E. 765, and Welling v. Same (S. C.) 34 S. E. 409, these same questions were raised. The supreme court had before it the same circulars, the same certificate, the same by-laws, and the same matters of law as were introduced in evidence in this case, and its judgment was that the defendant association was bound to the full extent of its promise. These cases conclude all the issues here, and render unnecessary a further discussion of the principles involved.

"This is a law case, and it will be necessary to have judgment entered regularly upon this order. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff, David W. Ebaugh, do recover of the defendant, Eastern Building & Loan Association of Syracuse, New York, the sum of one thousand dollars, with interest from October 15, 1898, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, now amounting to one thousand and eighty dollars, together with costs of this action, and that the plaintiff be, and he is hereby, permitted to enter judgment for said sum and costs."

T. H. Spain, for appellant. Haynsworth, Parker & Patterson, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The facts of this case are fully set forth in the report of the master and the decree of the circuit judge, which will be incorporated in the report of the case. Contracts similar to that which gave rise to the action herein have recently been construed by this court in the case of Williamson v. Association, 54 S. C. 582, 32 S. E. 765, and Welling v. Same, 56 S. C. 280, 34 S. E. 409. See, also, cases cited in the notes to Williamson v. Association (S. C.) 32 S. E. 765, 71 Am. St. Rep. 822. The appellant contends that the contracts must be construed with reference to the laws of New York, and attempts to differentiate this case from those just mentioned on the ground that the answer alleges, and the testimony establishes the fact, that under the laws of that state the by-laws of the association, and not its express agreement, must prevail in the interpretation of the contract between the parties. Both the master and circuit judge found, as matter of fact, that the laws of New York did not forbid the defendant from entering into an agreement by which the shares of stock would mature in a definite time. In his report the master says: "The question as to whether this promise was in excess of the charter powers was not expressly decided by the supreme court, but that court did decide that, even though it were in excess of its charter powers (in the language of Railway Co. v. McDonald [Ind. App.] 46 N. E. 1022, 60 Am. St. Rep. 172), 'the general rule is that where a private corporation has entered into a contract not immoral in itself, and not forbidden by any statute, and it has been in good faith performed by the other party, the corporation will not be heard on a plea of ultra vires.' This proposition is fully sustained by the decisions of New York. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the following decisions of that court: Arms Co. v. Barlow, 63 N. Y. 62; De Groff v. Thread Co., 21 N. Y. 124; Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 13 N. E. 419. This constituted the only evidence before me as to what was the law of New York touching this point. I find as a matter of fact that the law of New York is that, where a corporation enters into a contract that is in excess of its charter powers or is unauthorized by law, it will nevertheless be bound to perform its agreement as contained in the contract, if it suffers the other party to perform his agreement, and receives the benefits and retains them. This being the law of New York, it is conclusive of the case at issue." The report of the master was confirmed in all respects by the circuit judge. As this is an action at law, the foregoing findings of fact are not subject to review, but are conclusive on this court. As the laws of New York are not in conflict with the construction which this court has placed upon contracts similar to that upon which the action herein is founded, we fail to discover any facts causing us to differentiate this case from those hereinbefore mentioned. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

DARWIN et al. v. MOORE.

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION—CHOSES IN ACTION—TITLE OF HEIRS AND DISTRIBUTEES—HARMLESS ERROR—MARRIED WOMEN—SEPARATE ESTATE—CONTRACTS.

1. Heirs and distributees of a deceased person cannot acquire title to his choses in action, without administration proceedings, merely by taking possession, so as to authorize the maintenance of an action thereon in their own names.

2. On appeal, a judgment for plaintiff will not be reversed where it appears that the trial court erred in holding that defendant's answer was not verified, where it appears that plaintiff was entitled to recover on the merits, and thought it was verified.

3. In an action on a note executed by a married woman in 1890, it is not necessary for plaintiff, to charge her separate estate, to show that the proceeds of the note were used for its benefit, since all that the law required at the time of the execution of the note to charge the defendant's separate estate was that she should have contracted with reference to her separate estate.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court, Cherokee county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by John T. Darwin and another against Mary M. Moore. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

N. W. Hardin, for appellant. W. B. De Loach, for respondents.

POPE, J. R. R. Darwin departed this life intestate, on the 10th day of November, 1893, survived by the plaintiffs as his only heirs at law and distributees. At his death he held, as the owner thereof, a mortgage on 112 acres of land, situate in Cherokee county, in this state, executed by the defendant Mary M. Moore while she was the wife of H. M. Moore, now deceased, to secure a sealed note dated 29th August, 1890, and maturing 29th day of August, 1895, for the sum of $112.93, with 8 per cent. interest. After the death of R. R. Darwin, his two children, the plaintiffs, took possession, as the owners thereof, of said sealed note and mortgage, and now hold the same as such. On the 9th day of January, 1899, these two children of the said R. R. Darwin brought an action against the said Mary M. Moore as defendant to obtain judgment on said note and mortgage. The defendant appeared and answered. All the issues were referred to a special referee, by whose report a judgment for $1,095.11 in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendant, as well as for foreclosure of the mortgage on the 112 acres of land executed to secure the debt, was recommended. That cause came on to be heard before his honor, O. W. Buchanan, as presiding judge, upon exceptions to the report, the pleading, and testimony. He decreed in favor of plaintiffs. The defendant now appeals, as follows: (1) For error in holding that the answer of the defendant was not verified. (2) For error in holding that "the testimony fully establishes the fact that the debt secured by the mortgage was created with reference to the separate estate of the defendant, who was at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage a married woman"; whereas, he should have held, it appearing that the defendant was a married woman, and her separate estate charged with the payment of a debt secured by a mortgage, that it developed upon the plaintiffs to show, by the preponderance of the testimony, that the debt represented by the note and mortgage was used for the benefit of her separate estate, and, this not being established by the above-stated rule of law, judgment should have been in favor of the defendant. (3) For error in not holding from the testimony that the action was prematurely brought. (4) For error in not holding that plaintiffs could not maintain this action. (5) For error in holding that the "plaintiffs herein are entitled to the relief asked for in the complaint," for the reasons hereinabove stated, and adjudging that the lands of the defendant be sold to pay said debt. At the hearing before us, the appellant abandoned exceptions numbered 3 and 4; hence they are not for our consideration.

This court deems it a duty it owes, in upholding the law in relation to intestate estates, to state that the practice of the plaintiffs in avoiding any administration of the estate of their father by suing in their own names as his heirs at law and distributees, as holders of his personal property, cannot be sanctioned. It is true Mr. John T. Darwin, as one of the plaintiffs, in his testimony states: "There was no necessity for administration, in my opinion;" but we would state that the opinions of an individual claimant of property cannot outweigh the law. Strictly speaking, there is no ownership of personal property of an intestate by his children. They are only entitled to receive what is left after paying his indebtedness and the expenses of administration. The legal title to such personal property of an intestate vests in his administrator. But in the case at bar the defendant declines to raise this question, and we fear, therefore, that, as between the plaintiffs and defendant, we must decide alone upon the questions here presented.

As to the first question, we agree with the circuit judge that the plaintiffs would be entitled to judgment even if the answer of the defendant was verified. But in justice to N. W. Hardin, Esq., who prepared the answer as the attorney of the defendant, it should be stated that this court is perfectly satisfied that his client, Mrs. Mary M. Moore, signed the answer which was verified by her oath before M. Hardin, as a notary public. Her testimony to the contrary was but the utterances of a feeble old woman, who did not apparently understand what she was saying in this connection. She admitted that Mr. Hardin came to her house as her attorney, and that she laid the facts of her defense before him. This, however, as before intimated, is an abstraction, and we overrule this exception.

As to the second exception, we may remark that all that the law required at the date of this transaction between Dr. Darwin and Mrs. Moore was that it should appear that the contract was made with reference to her separate estate. When this was made to appear, no attention need be paid to the question whether such contract was beneficial to the married woman's estate. When Mrs. Moore was testifying, she certainly in her cross-examination admitted that she "contracted this debt," and at that time she "intended to pay it. * * * I never contracted any debts except for myself." "I owned all the lands, and what debts I contracted I contracted for in the interest of my estate." The good lady evidently was impressed with the idea that she would not be required to pay this debt as long as she lived, and the long credit (five years) given to her by Dr. Darwin evidences the fact that something about a long credit was talked about between them. But the old lady fixed by her contract as the time for which she was to have credit five years. That time has passed, and five years additional have passed. She knew what she was doing when she contracted this debt. It was for her separate estate. The debt is now due, and she must pay it.

As to the fifth exception, it must be overruled for the reasons just given. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SHUTE v. MANCHESTER FIRE ASSUR. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 11, 1900.)

INSURANCE — PROPERTY — TITLE — DEED — PRODUCTION — PAROL TESTIMONY — DELIVERY OF DEED—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where, in an action on a fire insurance policy providing that it should be void if the building was on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple, the plaintiff testified on cross-examination that several years prior to the issuance of the policy he had executed a deed to the property to his son, but it had never been delivered, and the deed was not produced, or any testimony introduced on behalf of defendant, a judgment of nonsuit was erroneous.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Lancaster county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by H. H. Shute against the Manchester Fire Assurance Company and another. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. E. & R. B. Allicon, for appellant. Ernest Moore, for respondents.

POPE, J. The trial of this action was had before Judge Buchanan at the October term, 1899, of the court of common pleas for Lancaster county. After plaintiff closed his testimony, upon the motion of defendant the Manchester Fire Assurance Company Judge Buchanan ordered the nonsuit of plaintiff. After entry of judgment thereon, plaintiff appealed.

It seems to us that the error of the circuit judge, if error there be, lies in a very narrow compass,—so narrow that we may lay our finger on it, if it exists. The grounds of the motion for nonsuit were: "That the proof does not correspond with the allegation of the complaint; the testimony of the plaintiff showing that he did not have the estate in the property in question which the complaint alleged; objection having been made to all evidence showing any estate or insurable interest in the plaintiff other than alleged in the complaint. The insurable interest represented by the plaintiff and his wife in the property mentioned in the policy was not insured. That where the plaintiff alleges himself to be the owner of the property, and bases his complaint thereon, alleging that such insurable interest was insured under the policy, therefore he cannot recover thereon by proving another insurable interest, not contemplated by the parties or mentioned in the policy. That the plaintiff alleges one contract, and offers proof as to another. Also, that the very policy annexed as an exhibit to the complaint contained a promissory warranty on the part of the plaintiff that he was the sole and unconditional owner of the property, and that the building was on ground owned by the insured in fee simple, and in his complaint the fulfillment of this condition is alleged, whereas there is no proof either of the contract alleged, or the fulfillment of the terms and conditions thereof." The foregoing grounds of motion for a nonsuit were substantially taken down by a stenographer. The plaintiff (appellant), in argument, contended that the execution of the alleged deed of conveyance had not been proved, and the deed had not been offered in evidence, and that the title of the property was still in the plaintiff; and, when the judge indicated an adverse view, plaintiff's counsel remarked, "If your honor has any doubt about the delivery of the deed, we would like to put the subscribing witnesses on the stand, as to the execution and delivery of the alleged deed." The judge refused to do this; remarking that the plaintiff had rested, and this was a motion for a nonsuit. The circuit judge then made his ruling on the motion, as follows, viz.: "My idea about the case is this: Here is a man comes to an insurance company, by his agent, and says: 'Look here. You have been carrying my insurance about 3 or 4 years. I want to renew my insurance.' Practically says that, because, when he says that by an agent, he says that himself. No questions were asked, at all. The company says: 'All right. Here it is.' Well, it turns out now that at a time heretofore that property upon which this policy was written had been conveyed to somebody else. The agent of the company says: 'Well, I insured you' such a time and such a time. 'I will insure you in pursuance of the contract.' Well, now, not one syllable is given him of any change at all in the condition. Here is a man who has conveyed away the property, knows the insurance has been carried as his property, and does not give the insurance company a word of notice. Is that putting these men on notice? The company did not know it. Was it his negligence, his lack of care? I don't think, from whatever standpoint you view it, there is any evidence of waiver. There is certainly not any evidence here to show any fee-simple title, nor can the complaint be sustained here upon the ground of a lesser estate. Now, if plaintiff's statement be true, he not only has no lesser estate, but no estate at all, except an estate hung up in the skies, depending upon the affection the children have for their —for the plaintiff? I don't think so. He does not sue as agent,—as trustee. He sues in his own name. He does not say he was acting for A., B., and C.,—acting as agent, —but the allegation is that he is owner in fee simple. Well, now, it might be said in reply that the matter of forfeiture is a matter of specific defense; but it is also true, when a plaintiff undertakes to anticipate the defense, and to prove that, and to prove himself in court and out of court at the same time, he goes out of court, because he could have gone and proved his loss alone. Now, by the same thing he attempts to prove his status in court he proves himself out of court. I think the nonsuit ought to go. That is my judgment." The judge then signed the following order of nonsuit: "The plaintiff having concluded his evidence, and a motion for a nonsuit having been made by the defendant, after hearing argument, ordered that said motion for nonsuit be, and the same is hereby, granted, upon the grounds made and reasons expressed, taken down by the stenographer. October 24, 1899. O. W. Buchanan, Judge."

Notice of appeal from the judgment and order of nonsuit, and from the ruling of the circuit judge at the trial, within 10 days from the rising of the court, to the supreme court, for reversal and correction of the same, was given; and the following are the exceptions and grounds of appeal: "(1) Because the forfeiture of an insurance policy is a matter of defense, and the policy of this insurance was duly admitted and produced in court, and it was incumbent upon the insurance company to show by competent evidence wherein the forfeiture lay, and the circuit judge erred in withholding the issues from the jury. (2) Because the introduction of the policy raised the presumption that its terms had been complied with, and it was then a question for the jury to determine, and the judge erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. (3) Because the circuit judge erred in assuming that there was a conveyance by the plaintiff to his sons, changing the title to the house insured and the surrounding lands, when the alleged deed was not proven and not offered in evidence at all. (4) Because he erred in assuming that there was a change of title in the property, when all the witnesses that made any reference to the alleged deed testified that the same had been signed by the plaintiff, but not delivered as a deed, and was never intended by either party to operate as a conveyance in the lifetime of plaintiff. (5) Because the alleged deed was set up in the answer as a defense, and it was incumbent on the defendant company to prove the same, and the judge erred in assuming the alleged change in the title without such proof. (6) Because the mere admission that the alleged deed was signed in 1892, but never delivered, is not legal proof of the conveyance of the property. The testimony of the Shute family, drawn out on the cross-examination, that the plaintiff had some years ago signed a paper, to take effect after his death, but which was not delivered, and was never intended to be delivered, in plaintiff's lifetime, was no evidence to pass the title out of plaintiff. And the circuit judge erred therein. (7) Because the plaintiff's attorneys, when they discovered the inclination of the judge, proposed to go further than their duty, and swear the subscribing witnesses to the alleged deed, to show that the same was not delivered, and was never intended to be delivered, as a conveyance, but the court refused this request. (8) Because the alleged deed was signed in 1892, but not delivered, and the house was first insured in 1894, again in 1895, and now again in 1896, by the defendant company; and the presiding judge erred in assuming that the title to the property insured changed hands after the first policy was delivered, contrary to the facts, not considering that this would raise the question of waiver of the defense. (9) Because, when E. K. Palmer applied for the policy in 1894, 1895, and in 1896, it was proof that no concealment and no misrepresentations were made, and that no questions whatever were asked by the insurer, and that Palmer had no knowledge of any change whatever in the title, and that Shute, the plaintiff, had no knowledge of the contents of the policy, and that he had no communication at any time with any agent of the insurance company; and the circuit judge misconceived this testimony, and erred in assuming that there was no waiver by the defendant company, and no negligence on its part. These were questions of fact for the jury. (10) Because it was in proof that the defendant, immediately after the house was burned down, was the first to raise the question of forfeiture set up in its answer, and before the said E. K. Palmer, agent, had had knowledge of the alleged change in the title, and before the plaintiff had any knowledge of the contents of the policy of insurance; and the inquiry when and how this information was acquired by the defendant company should have been left to the jury, to determine whether or not there was a waiver of this defense. (11) If the insurer, before issuing the policy, asks for no information, and the insured makes no representations, it must be presumed that the insurer has, in person or by agent, in such a case, obtained all the information desired as to the premises insured, or that he ventures to take the risk without it, and that the insured, being asked nothing, has a right to presume that nothing on the risk is desired from him. Such were the facts in this instance, and the nonsuit was erroneously granted. (12) Insurance companies or their agents are presumed to know what facts and circumstances are material to the risk much better than persons applying for the insurance, and if they, as in this instance, choose to accept the risk without inquiry, and when a loss occurs it appears that some fact, which the insurance company may regard as material to the risk was not communicated by the insured, common honesty and fair dealing forbid that this shall operate as a forfeiture of the policy. (13) Because the proof did not vary from or contradict the allegations of the complaint, and, even if it were so, it was no ground for a nonsuit. (14) Because the policy of insurance did not contain a promissory warranty to bind plaintiff. (15) Because, even if any of the material specifications in the policy were not proven, the conduct of the defendant company was such as to raise the presumption of a waiver, and was a question of fact for the jury to determine."

There is no doubt but that the circuit judge was impressed with the idea that the plaintiff sued for one thing, and, in his dilemma, wanted to recover for another thing. In discussing the matter of a nonsuit, this court, in the case of Willis v. Hammond, 41 S. C. 158, 19 S. E. 312, said: "It is settled law in this state that the circuit judge ought not to grant a motion for a nonsuit if there is any competent testimony before the jury in support of plaintiff's tender of issues; but, on the other side, it is equally true, if no such testimony is offered, such motion should be granted. The solution of this question therefore involves a consideration of the pleadings, and the fact whether any testimony was offered by plaintiff to support the issues there tendered." When the plaintiff in this action at bar complains upon the policy of insurance made for him by his agent, E. K. Palmer, with the defendant insurance company, and makes such policy a part of his complaint, there can be no doubt but that such policy evidences the contract betwixt the parties. The contract was in writing, and it became the duty of the circuit judge to expound such writing. This contract contained these provisions: "This entire policy shall be void * * * if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, or if the subject of the insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple." So, as we said, it was the duty of the judge to construe these provisions of the policy. Again, the deed itself, which was testified to by the plaintiff and his two sons, was not brought before the court, except in this testimony. Therefore the circuit judge had no right to say what the testimony of these witnesses proved (he said that such testimony showed that the plaintiff had no fee-simple title to the land on which the building insured was located), especially when the deed itself was not produced, and reliance was had upon the testimony of the plaintiff, which declared that the deed was "signed." He never declared in his testimony that the deed was "delivered." It is the duty of the jury to take care of the testimony. In addition to all these matters, it was in testimony that E. K. Palmer never told the insurance company of this deed, for he did not know of it, and that the plaintiff never told the insurance company of this deed, and yet this insurance company, as soon as it became liable to pay this policy, suddenly, through its adjuster, disclosed to the plaintiff that it knew of this deed. Now, with such testimony before the court, and with no explanation of when or how the insurance company had this knowledge, the circuit judge had no right to take such testimony from the consideration of the jury. If the insurance company knew that this land had been conveyed to the three sons, and yet, after such knowledge, granted a policy thereon to the plaintiff, it may be (we will not assert it as a fact) that the insurance company waived the requirement of its policy that the plaintiff should be the sole and unconditional owner of the land, or that the building it insured should be located on land owned by the plaintiff in fee simple. Without expending any further time, we prefer to have the new trial without any hampering restrictions thereon from us. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the action be remanded to that court for a new trial.

RIVERS v. PRIESTER. PRIESTER v. WHALEY et al. PRIESTER et al. v. SAME.

TRIAL—WAIVER OF IRREGULARITY—DOCKETING OF CAUSE ON CALENDAR—EXTRA TERM.

Where a party, without objection, participates at an extra term of the circuit court in the trial of a cause not docketed at the preceding regular term, he will be deemed to have waived his objection that the cause was not docketed on the calendar of the preceding regular term, and the court has jurisdiction, notwithstanding Code, § 28, providing that no cause shall be tried at any extra term of the circuit court unless previously docketed on some one of the calendars of the last preceding regular term of said court.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Barnwell county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action of trespass to try title by J. M. Rivers against T. E. Priester, consolidated with a motion by J. P. Priester against Whaley & Rivers to vacate a judgment in foreclosure. There was a judgment in favor of plaintiff in the action of trespass to try title, and defendant appeals. Judgment affirmed, as is also the denial of the motion to vacate the judgment in foreclosure.

J. O. Patterson, for appellants. Bates & Simms, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. The facts of this case are thus set forth by Judge Townsend in that portion of his decree which we have copied, as follows: "The first above mentioned case is for trespass to try title, in the usual form, and was, by consent, referred to the master to take testimony and to report to this court, and said report is in. The remaining two matters were motions to vacate and set aside a judgment in foreclosure heretofore entered in this court, and all of these matters, being closely connected and dependent upon the same state of facts, were, by consent, heard by me together, upon the pleadings and testimony in the first case, and upon the papers in the motions above stated. The following are facts found by me after hearing the whole matter, and, for convenience, are arranged in narrative form: Upon the 27th day of February, 1891, and the 7th day of September, 1891, the above-mentioned J. P. Priester executed and delivered to Whaley & Rivers two mortgages upon the real estate in the complaint set forth and described, in the sum of three thousand dollars each, and these two mortgages were duly recorded in the office of R. M. C. for said county upon the 27th day of February and the 7th day of September, 1891, respectively, in Book 54, p. 99, and Book 54, p. 135. The said Priester having defaulted in the payment of said mortgages, an effort was made by the said Whaley & Rivers to foreclose the same under the power contained in said mortgage, by an advertisement in one of the newspapers in said county. The said defendant J. P. Priester, through his attorneys, Messrs. Patterson & Holman, filed an action, entitled 'J. P. Priester v. Whaley & Rivers,' for an accounting, and injunction pending same; and the said sale was enjoined, and a rule to show cause why the injunction should not be continued pending the trial of the case was granted by his honor, Judge Witherspoon, and at the November, 1894, term of said court the matter was argued, the injunction continued, and an order of reference to take the accounting demanded by the mortgagor was signed by his honor, Judge Witherspoon, all at the said term of court. The order of reference to the master, however, required the reference to be held by a given day, and the same was not held within the time limited by said order; and when the same was held the mortgagor's attorneys aforesaid appeared before the master, and objected to the reference on the ground that the said order was functus officio, and had expired by its own limitation, and at the same time gave notice that at the succeeding term of the court said attorneys would apply for an order of discontinuance of said action filed on behalf of said Priester, mortgagor. Nothing was done by the master at this reference, beyond taking proof of the mortgages admitted by the complaint of the plaintiff; and the defendant mortgagees, Whaley & Rivers, who in said action had filed an affirmative answer praying foreclosure of said mortgages, gave due notice to plaintiff's attorneys that upon a given day they would take the testimony of J. M. Rivers, one of the defendants, before a notary public in Charleston, de bene esse. At the hearing no one appeared for the plaintiff, the testimony of Rivers was taken, and the whole accounting gone into and testified to in detail; and this testimony so taken was duly sent to the clerk of this court, to be used in the trial of the cause, and the whole matter (that is to say, the application for a discontinuance, the report of the master, and the testimony de bene esse) was all ready for a hearing at the regular term, in July, 1895. This court was not held, however, at that term, owing to the illness of Judge Watts, but his honor, Chief Justice McIver, appointed a special term, to be held in August of said year, and at this special term Judge Watts presided. The case was called up, and Messrs. Patterson & Holman moved to discontinue the action, and defendant's attorney moved for a trial and a judgment of foreclosure. His honor, Judge Watts, granted a judgment of foreclosure, and in said decree it appears that the plaintiff's attorneys had announced that they had obtained all the relief demanded by them. Upon the filing of this decree the attorneys for Priester, the mortgagor, gave notice of appeal to the supreme court from the judgment of foreclosure, and prepared their case, with exceptions, etc.; but the said appeal was dismissed for want of prosecution, and the lands described in the complaint and answer were sold by the master for said county upon sales day in November in 1895, under said decree of foreclosure, and were purchased by J. M. Rivers, who complied with the terms of sale and received master's title to the same upon the same day,—sales day. After the sale by the master the said lands were sold by the sheriff of said county under certain and sundry judgments recovered against the said mortgagor, J. P. Priester, subsequent to the date and record of said mortgages foreclosed as above stated; and at this sale the said J. P. Priester and his said attorneys, Messrs. Patterson & Holman, purchased said land, and instructed the said sheriff to make titles to Mrs. T. E. Priester, the wife of the said J. P. Priester, which titles were executed and delivered in March, the year following. At the March term, 1896, the said master's report of sale came in, and was duly confirmed by his honor, Judge Aldrich, without objection, and thereafter certain efforts were made to obtain possession of said premises, in the nature of writs of assistance, on the part of the purchaser at said master's sale, J. M. Rivers, but proved ineffectual, owing to Mrs. T. E. Priester and J. P. Priester setting up independent title in Mrs. Priester; and the judge held that she not having been a party to the record, and no lis pendens having been filed, she could not be ejected in a summary way, as desired, but that she should have her day in court, whereupon the above first entitled action was brought by the said J. M. Rivers to recover possession of the premises, and for damages for its holding by said Mrs. Priester. Mrs. Priester's answer sets up, practically, in defense, that the judgment of foreclosure above alluded to was a nullity, having been recovered at a special term of the court, and that the case was not formerly upon the calendar, and hence the master's title conveyed nothing to the plaintiff J. M. Rivers. These issues being made up, the case, by consent, as above stated, was referred to the master to take testimony. At these references (there were several) it was admitted that both plaintiff and defendant claimed from a common source, in the person of J. P. Priester; and it was shown that the plaintiff claimed under the foreclosure proceedings in re J. P. Priester v. Whaley & Rivers, upon the mortgages above set forth, whilst the defendant claimed under the judgments against J. P. Priester, and sheriff's sale thereunder. The question thus presented is, which has the paramount title? Damages were also proved at said reference in favor of plaintiff, and not contradicted, of one hundred dollars per planting year. Plaintiff's counsel gave notice at the reference that if it was deemed by the court that an allegation of damages should be specifically made, and that there should be such allegation in the prayer for judgment, they would ask for an amendment of the complaint so as to conform to the undisputed testimony as to the damages. At the close of these references the defendants' attorneys, Messrs Patterson & Holman, and also on behalf of J. P. Priester, had served upon Whaley & Rivers, the judgment creditors in foreclosure, as above stated, two motions to vacate said judgment of foreclosure, which are the two motions set forth at the head of this decree. These motions base the relief desired upon the same ground as set up in the answer of Mrs. T. E. Priester, to wit, because of the alleged lack of jurisdiction in the court at said special term to try a case not at that time on the calendar. These are the facts constituting a history of this case. Having, therefore, fully considered the facts of the case, I am of the opinion, and I so conclude, that the foreclosure case, as above stated, having been commenced in November, 1894, and having had orders granted therein, and the same having been in all respects fully ready for trial at the regular term of the court preceding the special term, and at the special term was heard without objection on the part of the mortgagor, J. P. Priester, on account of the alleged nondocketing, but the hearing having been fully acquiesced in by the said attorneys for Priester, his honor's decree in foreclosure was rightly granted. And the case of Simms v. Phillips, cited by Messrs. Patterson & Holman, does not apply to the case in foreclosure heard by his honor, Judge Watts, in that the said case was heard without objection on the ground of nondocketing, and that this was a right that could be waived by consent or acquiescence in same, whereas in the case of Simms v. Phillips the case was not ready for trial at the regular term preceding the extra term, and was heard over the objections specially raised by the defendant's attorneys on the ground that the case had not been ready for trial at the said regular term, and had not been docketed by defendant's consent," etc.

The record contains the following statement: "Only so much of the testimony is printed as shows the damages for the possession of the land, and the notice of proposed amendment of the complaint which was given at the reference before the master,—all other questions of fact, as found by Judge Townsend, being admitted to be correct,—and the only questions raised by this appeal being: First, whether Judge Townsend is right in holding that Judge Watts had jurisdiction, at a special term of court, to hear and determine the case of foreclosure in the original suit of J. P. Priester v. Whaley & Rivers, and that that question is, as to J. P. Priester and his wife, Mrs. T. E. Priester, res adjudicata, and that Mrs. Priester is estopped by the facts to defeat plaintiff's recovery; and, second, whether the judge abused his discretion in allowing the amendment to the complaint. It is admitted that the judgment in the case of J. P. Priester v. Whaley & Rivers, under which the plaintiff J. M. Rivers purchased, was in all respects regular, and properly entered up in the clerk's office,—the only objection now urged against it being that it was obtained at a special term of court, and, in appellants' view of the testimony, was not docketed the requisite length of time before the said hearing, although it is admitted that no objection of this nature was made by defendants' attorneys in said suit at said trial, and that they took an appeal to the supreme court for the decree of foreclosure, served exceptions, etc.; but no exception of this character was taken, and finally said appeal was duly dismissed for want of prosecution, and the master's report of sale thereafter duly confirmed, without objection."

The circuit judge refused the two motions to vacate the judgment hereinbefore mentioned, and adjudged the plaintiff's title to be paramount to that of Mrs. T. E. Priester, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the land, and to enter up judgment for $400 damages for the unlawful withholding of said possession. He also ordered that the complaint be amended so as to conform to the testimony, by adding a specific allegation of damages.

We will first consider the question of jurisdiction. The only ground upon which it was contended that Judge Watts did not have jurisdiction to try the case was that it had not been docketed the requisite length of time before it was heard. The circuit judge, in his decree, points out the distinction between this case and that of Simms v. Phillips, 46 S. C. 149, 24 S. E. 97. The court of common pleas for Barnwell county had acquired jurisdiction of the cause before the special term of court commenced.

If the court did not have jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, it could neither have been tried at the general nor at the special term thereof. The statutory provision as to what cases could be heard at the special term of the court related merely to the time of hearing, and not to the subject-matter of the action. The parties to the action had the right to waive compliance with the statutory requirements as to the docketing, which the circuit judge finds was done in this case. In the case of Overstreet v. Brown, 4 McCord, 79, the court uses this language: "* * * Although a person cannot by consent give jurisdiction to a court where it had no jurisdiction before, yet, where the court has jurisdiction of the matter, and the party has some privilege which exempts him from the jurisdiction, he may waive that privilege if he chooses to do so." If judgments could be declared null and void by reason of the fact that the cases had not been docketed the requisite length of time before the court convened, even when this objection was waived, it would unsettle titles throughout the entire state. As to the order of amendment, we fail to discover any abuse of discretion on the part of the circuit judge, or any other error, in granting it. Judgment affirmed.

LAVENDER v. DANIEL et al. SAME v. LAVENDER et al. SAME v. HUMPHRIES.

DOWER—RELEASE—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF—CONDITIONAL DEED.

1. Where a wife indorsed her renunciation of dower on a deed executed by her husband to their son for land subject to a mortgage, subsequent purchasers of the land on foreclosure of the mortgage, to which the son was a party, took the title to the land free from plaintiff's claim of dower, since her claim of dower was barred as against the son, and was consequently barred as against the purchasers at the judicial sale.

2. A deed by a husband, absolute on its face, and purporting to have been given for a money consideration, on which the wife indorsed her release of dower, cannot be changed to a conditional deed by testimony that the real consideration for it was the promise of the grantee to assume a mortgage indebtedness against the land, and to support the grantor and his wife during the remainder of their lives, so as to entitle the wife to recover dower in the land on failure of the grantee to pay off the indebtedness, and support the grantor and his wife, as against purchasers without notice of the condition at foreclosure sale under the mortgage, to which the grantee was a party.

3. Under Rev. St. 1893, § 1902, declaring that "when a husband dies intestate, and his wife accepts her distributive share of his estate, she shall be barred of dower in the lands of which he died seised and all he had aliened," where a widow received and receipted for her distributive share of her husband's estate, and afterwards sought to revoke her election, the burden is on her to show that she was misled as to the condition of the estate before making the election, and her right to retract is not established by her testimony that she receipted for her distributive share in consequence of certain information which she received, the nature of which or from whom she received it she failed to disclose.

Appeals from common pleas circuit court of Cherokee county; Buchanan, Judge.

Actions by Polly Lavender against C. J. Daniel and another, against D. R. Lavender and another, and against W. T. Humphries, and to establish her dower right to certain lands, and have the same set off to her. From a judgment of the circuit court reversing a judgment of the probate court in favor of defendants, they appeal. Reversed.

Simpson & Bomar, for appellants. J. C. Jefferies and Carlisle & Carlisle, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. These three cases, all growing out of the same state of facts, and involving the same principles of law, were heard, and will be considered, together. Some time in February, 1899, Polly Lavender, the respondent herein, filed a petition, in each of the three cases above stated, against the defendants therein, as parties in possession of different parcels of the land, in the court of probate, for her dower in said land, alleging that she was the widow of one George Lavender, who died on the 8th of April, 1897, having been seised during coverture of said land. The defendants answered, claiming that the petitioner was barred of her dower (1) by the fact that she had renounced her dower on a deed executed by said George Lavender on the 21st March, 1888, conveying the same to his son P. C. Lavender; and (2) because the petitioner had accepted her distributive share of her deceased husband's estate. At the trial it appeared that the said George Lavender, on the 15th of February, 1888, had executed a mortgage on the said lands to one Lewis Clary prior to the date of the deed to his son, above referred to. Subsequently, but at what time does not appear, an action was commenced by one Thomas McCraw, as administrator of said Lewis Clary, against the said George Lavender, for the foreclosure of said mortgage, to which action the said P. C. Lavender, and D. R. Lavender, also a son of the said George, were also made parties defendant, as persons claiming some interest in the said land. That action culminated in a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and by an order of the late Judge Norton bearing date the 14th April, 1890, the land was directed to be sold; and on sale day in November, 1890, the land was sold, and bought by the defendants C. J. Daniel, D. R. Lavender, and W. T. Humphries (the other defendants in the two cases first named being, as we suppose, parties in possession, as tenants or otherwise), who divided the land among them. The proceeds of this sale were applied, first, to the costs of the action of Marsh, as the administrator of Clary, against George Lavender and others, and next to the mortgage in favor of Clary, leaving a balance in the hands of the master. The master made his report on the sale, which was confirmed, and the deeds from the master to the defendants C. J. Daniel, D. R. Lavender, and W. T. Humphries, conveying to them the premises out of which dower is claimed, were offered in evidence. It further appeared in evidence that P. C. Lavender, after his father had conveyed to him the land in question, had executed a mortgage on the same to one R. S. Lipscomb, bearing date the 15th April, 1889, to secure the payment of a note for $800. It also appears that one M. Bonner had set up a claim, as judgment creditor of George Lavender, to the balance in the hands of the master; whereupon it seems that both Lipscomb and Bonner were made parties to the case of McCraw, as administrator of Clary, against George Lavender and others, and an order was passed referring it to the master to inquire and report to whom the balance in the hands of the master should be paid. The master made his report, to which all parties consented, and recommended that "the costs of this action—that is, costs of officers, and $25 for Bonner's attorneys—be first paid out of the fund in hand, and that the sum of $500 be next paid to M. Bonner or his attorneys, and that the sum of $299 be paid to R. S. Lipscomb or his attorneys, and that the balance be paid to George Lavender or his attorneys." Subsequently, it appears from the evidence, a compromise agreement between P. C. Lavender and George Lavender was made, by the terms of which "all moneys left after the payment of the sum agreed to pay M. Bonner and the mortgage of R. S. Lipscomb should be equally divided between George and P. C. Lavender," and the evidence shows that this arrangement was carried out.

To sustain the second ground upon which the defendants claim that the dower was barred, the papers of the estate of George Lavender were offered in evidence, "which showed that D. R. Lavender was administrator of the estate, and made settlement thereof in the probate court of Cherokee county on the 28th of December, 1898; that on the same day, in accordance with the decree of the probate judge, he paid to Polly Lavender the sum of twenty-seven and $^{42}/_{100}$ dollars in full of her one-third interest in the estate"; to which statement copied from the "case" is appended the final decree, setting forth in detail the amounts due to each of the distributees, and adjudging that the administrator shall pay the same. The defendants also offered in evidence the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender, above referred to, covering all the land out of which dower is claimed, upon which is indorsed a former renunciation of her dower by the petitioner, Polly Lavender. This deed, upon its face, is an absolute conveyance, and purports to have been executed in "consideration of the sum of sixteen hundred dollars to me paid by P. C. Lavender," and appears to have been duly recorded on the 15th April, 1889. They also introduced in evidence the mortgage of P. C. Lavender to R. S. Lipscomb, covering all the land described in the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender, being the mortgage hereinabove referred to.

The plaintiff, Polly Lavender, was examined in reply, and, after saying that D. R. Lavender, the administrator of the estate of George Lavender, was her son, her testimony proceeded as follows: "Q. When you received any money from D. R. Lavender, did you have any notice, or did you think or know, that it would knock you out of your dower interest in this matter? (Defendants object. The competency of this question to be reserved until final argument.) A. No, sir; I did not. Q. Before signing any receipt for this money, did you ask for any information? (Defendants object. Ruling reserved.) A. Yes, sir. Q. In consequence of information you received, did you sign receipt? (Objected to by defendants. Ruling reserved.) A. I did. Q. Did you intend by signing this receipt to release your dower in this matter? (Defendants object. Ruling reserved.) A. No, sir; I did not. Q. What was the consideration of the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender upon which you renounce your dower? (Objected to by defendants. Ruling reserved.) A. P. C. Lavender was to take the land, pay the debts, and keep us up, as I understood. It was why I signed dower in said deed. Would not have done it otherwise. (All this objected to. Ruling reserved.) Have never renounced dower in that property to any one else. Q. Did P. C. Lavender pay off the debts and support you and husband on the place, as he agreed to do? (Objected to. Ruling reserved.) A. No, sir; he stayed there one year, and the land was sold for the debts." Cross-examination: "Witness was present in the probate judge's office for Cherokee county some time ago, and D. R. Lavender paid me some twenty odd dollars, part of my husband's estate."

Upon this testimony the judge of probate heard these cases, and in his decree he sustained both of the grounds upon which the defendants claimed that the right of dower had been barred, and he rendered judgment dismissing petitions in each of the three cases. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed to the circuit court upon the several grounds set out in the "case," and the same came on for hearing before his honor, Judge Buchanan, who reversed the judgment of the probate court, and remanded the cases to that court for such proceedings as are necessary to admeasure to the petitioner her dower in each of the three cases. From this judgment of the circuit court the defendants appealed upon the several grounds set out in the record, which we do not deem it necessary to state in detail, as we propose to consider the several questions made thereby.

The exceptions raise two general questions: (1) Whether the renunciation of dower indorsed upon the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender bars the plaintiff's claim of dower in the land covered by that deed; (2) whether the plaintiff, by receiving her distributive share of her deceased husband's estate, has barred her claim of dower.

As to the first question, it seems to us clear that it must be answered in the affirmative. When the plaintiff executed her renunciation of dower, indorsed upon the deed from her husband to her son P. C. Lavender, she undoubtedly barred herself of any claim of dower in the land embraced in that deed as against P. C. Lavender and all persons claiming under or through him; and when the land was sold under the proceedings in the action brought by Thomas McCraw, as administrator of Lewis Clary, to which the said P. C. Lavender was a party, there can be no doubt that the purchasers at that sale took their title freed from the plaintiff's claim of dower. As we understand it, the rule is well settled that a purchaser at a judicial sale acquires the title and interest of all the parties to the action under which such sale is made; and, if P. C. Lavender took his title freed from the plaintiff's claim of dower, then the purchasers at such sale acquired all his right, title, and interest, and they also held the title free from the plaintiff's claim of dower.

But it is contended that the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender, though absolute on its face, was in fact conditional merely, and that P. C. Lavender, having failed to perform the condition upon which he was to take the title under that deed, lost all right to, or interest in, the land, as well as all right to any interest that he might otherwise have acquired under the renunciation of dower indorsed upon said deed by the plaintiff, before the land was sold under the proceedings in the action of McCraw, as administrator of Clary, against George Lavender and P. C. Lavender, and therefore the purchasers at such sale (who are the defendants in these actions) took their titles subject to the plaintiff's claim of dower. Even if this could be conceded, while it might have the effect of protecting the plaintiff from the effect of her renunciation of dower indorsed upon the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender, if she were asserting her claim of dower against the said P. C. Lavender, we do not see how it is possible that it should affect the rights of third persons, purchasers at a judicial sale of land to which the records showed that one of the parties held the absolute legal title, free from any claim of dower on the part of the plaintiff, especially when there is not a shadow of testimony even tending to show that these purchasers had any notice whatever of this hidden equity, which now for the first time she seeks to set up in order to avoid the effect of her renunciation of dower which was spread upon the records. Such a doctrine would operate a fraud upon such purchasers, and would tend to destroy all confidence in titles acquired at judicial sales.

Besides, it appears from the record that the proceeds of the sale of this land were applied, not only to the satisfaction of the mortgage to Clary, upon which the plaintiff had not renounced her dower, but also to a judgment obtained by one Bonner against George Lavender (incorrectly states was a judgment against P. C. Lavender), as well as the judgment of the balance due upon the mortgage executed by P. C. Lavender to one R. S. Lipscomb after he acquired the title from his father, and that the balance of the proceeds of the sale was equally divided between George Lavender and P. C. Lavender by agreement between them, the said Bonner and Lipscomb having subsequently been made parties to the action under which the sale was made. So that, practically, the defendants claim as purchasers at a judicial sale made for the purpose not only of satisfying liens on the land imposed thereon by George Lavender, the original owner, but also for the satisfaction of a mortgage placed thereon by P. C. Lavender in favor of Lipscomb, while he held the legal title to the land under a deed absolute in its terms, with a renunciation of dower indorsed thereon, which was spread upon the records. Now, if the land had been sold under proceedings directly instituted for the foreclosure of the mortgage in favor of Lipscomb, it cannot be doubted that the purchaser at such sale would take his title free from any dower incumbrance, in the absence of any evidence (and there is none here) of notice to Lipscomb and the purchaser at such sale of the hidden equity now sought to be set up by the plaintiff. In such a case, the plaintiff would have been remitted for her claim of dower to the surplus of the proceeds of the sale after satisfying the Lipscomb mortgage. So here it seems to us that, if the plaintiff had any claim at all, it should be upon the proceeds of the sale improperly applied to the satisfaction of liens in favor of which she had not renounced her dower, and that she cannot make any claim on the land in the hands of purchasers, or those claiming under them, as the proceeds of the sale under which they bought have, in part at least, been applied to the satisfaction of a lien placed upon the land of the holder of the deed therefor, upon which she has renounced her dower.

But, in addition to this, we do not think it can be conceded that it has been shown by any competent evidence that the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender, which upon its face was certainly an absolute deed, was in fact a mere conditional deed, and that upon the failure of the grantee to perform the conditions the title never vested in him, and hence that the renunciation of dower indorsed thereon amounted to nothing. While it is quite true that the authorities cited by respondent's counsel do show that it is competent to introduce parol evidence tending to show that the consideration mentioned in a deed is greater or less than that therein stated, as well as how such consideration is to be paid or satisfied, yet we are not aware of any case in which it has been held that it is competent by parol evidence to change the nature and effect of a deed, as, for example, to convert a deed absolute on its face into a mere conditional deed, as it was proposed to do in this case. This can only be done where fraud is alleged and proved, and in this case there is neither allegation nor proof of fraud. See Latimer v. Latimer, 53 S. C. 483, 31 S. E. 304, where it was held that, except where fraud is alleged and proved, it is not competent to show by parol that a deed purporting to be based upon good consideration, executed for a specific purpose, was based upon valuable consideration, and executed for an entirely different purpose. It seems to us, therefore, that the parol testimony of the plaintiff, introduced for the avowed purpose of showing that the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender, though absolute on its face, was intended to be a conditional deed, and that as the condition was not performed the deed became nugatory, was clearly incompetent for any such purpose. But, even if that testimony was competent, we do not think it shows what is claimed for it. The circuit judge in his decree says: "The testimony is that the said P. C. Lavender was to pay the mortgage debt of George Lavender, and support George Lavender and his wife, the petitioner herein, during their lives, upon the property, and after their death the property was to be his absolutely." Now, the only testimony we find in the record before us is that of Polly Lavender, which we have copied in full in our statement of the case. By reference to that testimony, the marked difference between what the witness testified to and what the circuit judge represents the testimony to have been may readily be perceived. But, waiving this, we may remark that, if the testimony be as the circuit judge represents, then it is clear beyond dispute that such testimony was incompetent; for if the testimony tended to show that the conveyance was to P. C. Lavender, with a reservation of a life estate in the grantor and his wife, only to become absolute in the grantee upon the death of his mother and father, then clearly parol evidence was wholly incompetent to effect an entire revolution in the character and effect of a deed absolute upon its face.

But the real contention on the part of the respondent seems to be that the parol evidence was to show that the true consideration of the deed was not the sum of $1,600, mentioned in the deed, but was in fact an agreement on the part of the grantee to pay the debts of his father, and to furnish a support to him and his wife during their lives, for which purpose the parol evidence in question may have been competent. We must, therefore, consider the question under that aspect, and in connection with the further fact, testified to by the plaintiff, that this agreement was not complied with by P. C. Lavender. Granting this to be so, the question still remains as to what is the effect of such testimony. The respondent contends that the effect was to convert the deed from an absolute into a conditional deed, and that, upon the failure of the grantee to perform the conditions, his estate became forfeited, and hence the renunciation of dower indorsed upon the deed at once became nugatory. We are not prepared to assent to such a view. If the real consideration of the deed was the agreement of the grantee to pay his father's debts, and provide a support for his father and mother during their lives, how does such an agreement differ in principle from an agreement to pay the specified sum of money as a consideration of the deed? If a person buys land on a credit, and enters into an agreement, whether by note, bond, or otherwise, to pay a stipulated sum as the purchase money thereof, at a specified time, and fails to perform such an agreement, it never was supposed that he thereby forfeited his title to the land, or even that the land, in the absence of any mortgage, became impressed with any lien; for it is settled by at least three cases in this state that the doctrine of the vendor's lien for the purchase money which prevails in England never was recognized in this state. Wragg v. Comptroller General, 2 Desaus. 509; McCorkle v. Montgomery, 11 Rich. Eq. 114; Morse v. Adams, 2 S. C. 56. Upon the same principle, we do not see how the failure to perform any other agreement entered into as a consideration for a conveyance should operate as a forfeiture of the estate conveyed, in the absence of any provision of the deed to that effect.

But even assuming, for the purposes of this discussion only, that this was a conditional deed, as it is called, the next inquiry is whether the estate conveyed was upon a condition precedent, or upon a condition subsequent. The very terms of the condition show that it was the latter, and not the former, as the obligations which it claimed the grantee assumed necessarily implied that he must first be invested with an estate in the land, as he could not otherwise comply with such conditions.

If, then, the estate was conveyed to P. C. Lavender upon a condition subsequent, then the mere failure to perform such condition did not ipso facto devest his estate, which could only be affected by the grantor taking the necessary steps to revest the estate in him; and it is not pretended this was ever done. See Hammond v. Railroad Co.,

15 S. C., at pages 33, 34, recognized and followed in the subsequent case of Kibler v. Luther, 18 S. C. 606. It seems to us, therefore, that, under any view that may be taken of the first general question stated above, the circuit judge was in error in holding that the plaintiff was not barred of her dower by her renunciation indorsed upon the deed from George Lavender to P. C. Lavender, which was duly spread upon the records.

While this would be conclusive of this appeal, yet, as the second general question has been raised and argued, we will proceed to consider it also, which involves the inquiry as to the effect of the receipt by the plaintiff of her distributive share of her deceased husband's estate. In section 1902 of the Revised Statutes of 1893, it is expressly declared that "when a husband dies intestate, and his widow accepts her distributive share in his estate, she shall be barred of her dower in the lands of which [he] died seised, and all of such as he had aliened." Now, as the undisputed facts are that the husband of plaintiff died intestate, and that she on the 28th September, 1898, received her distributive share of his estate, the case is brought directly under the provisions of the statute, and she is barred of her dower in the lands.

It is contended, however, and the circuit judge seems to hold, that the election which the plaintiff made to take her distributive share of her husband's was not made upon full information, and therefore she has the right now to retract such election, and assert her claim for dower; citing the case of Hill v. Gray, 45 S. C. 91, 22 S. E. 802. That case, however, differs widely from the present case. There it appeared that there never had been any administration upon the estate of the wife's deceased husband, and hence, as was said in that case, it was "difficult to understand how the widow's distributive share of the estate could have been ascertained, without which she could not properly be said to have made any election; for it is well settled that the widow is entitled to have full information of her interest before she can be held to any election." Indeed, in that case there was no evidence that the widow had ever received a single dollar out of her deceased husband's estate; certainly not that she had ever received a part of her distributive share of her deceased husband's estate. Here, however, the undisputed facts are that there was administration upon the estate of plaintiff's deceased husband; that such estate had been finally settled in the office of the judge of probate, and the rights and interests of the several distributees were finally ascertained and determined by the decree of that officer; and that she then and there received and receipted for the amount thus ascertained of her distributive share of the estate. And neither the plaintiff, nor any one of the distributees, so far as appears, has ever even intimated any dissatisfaction with that settlement, until the institution of these proceedings for dower were commenced, about two months afterwards. While, therefore, it is quite true that a widow is entitled to full information as to the condition of her deceased husband's estate before she shall be put to her election whether she will claim her dower or her distributive share, yet when she has made her election, and has actually received the amount of her distributive share, as ascertained by the decree of the judge of probate, and she now comes and asks the court to allow her to retract the election which she has made, the burden of proof is certainly upon her to satisfy this court that she was deceived, or, at least, misled, by incorrect or insufficient information as to the condition of the estate, into making such election. Now, the testimony on the part of the plaintiff not only fails to meet this burden, but rather tends to show the contrary. The only testimony which we find in the "case" as to this matter is that of the plaintiff herself and the records of the court of probate. She does say that she signed the receipt for her distributive share in consequence of certain information which she received, but what that information was, or from whom it was received, she was not asked, and she does not say. Indeed, there is not the slightest intimation in her testimony that she was in any way misled or deceived by any one as to the condition of the estate; and as the transaction took place in the office of the judge of probate, where all the papers of the estate were, it is difficult, if not impossible, to conceive how she could have been misled, even if any one were disposed to do so, without imputing to the judge of probate the grossest fraud and dereliction of duty, of which there is not a semblance of testimony. It is true that the plaintiff does say that she did not so intend, by signing the receipt; but, as was held in Buist v. Dawes, 3 Rich. Eq. 281, the rights to dower and "thirds," using that word in the sense of the wife's distributive share, are both legal rights, and the acceptance of the one (whether intended as a waiver of the other or not), is a bar, at law and in equity, to the claim of the other. Of course, this proposition is subject to the qualification that where it appears to the satisfaction of the court that where the widow has been induced to accept either of these alternative rights by fraudulent or incorrect representations the bar will not arise. But that case also shows that where the widow has actually accepted a sum of money in lieu of her dower, or has accepted the amount of her distributive share of her deceased husband, and comes before the court asking to be allowed to retract the election which she has made upon the ground that she was induced to make such election by false or incorrect information, she must, before she can be heard, return or tender back the money which she had received; for equity will not allow her, while still holding the fruits of the one alternative, to claim the other inconsistent alternative, and there is no pretense that the plaintiff has done this in these cases.

In view of the testimony in relation to this matter, all of which is set out above, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to conceive what warrant there is in the testimony for the conclusion reached by the circuit judge that the plaintiff endeavored to find out whether she would bar herself of her claim of dower, and from the information which she received she accepted her distributive share, not intending thereby to waive her claim of dower. In the first place, there is no evidence whatever as to the nature of the information which she received; for she was not asked, and she did not say, what it was, or from whom it was received. The conclusion of the circuit judge that the plaintiff tried to find out whether, by accepting her distributive share, she would bar her claim of dower, is absolutely without any evidence to support it. Besides, the plaintiff, like every one else, is presumed to know the law, and she must be presumed to know what is plainly written in the statute. So, also, the following language found in the circuit decree is without a shadow of testimony to sustain it, and must be based purely upon conjecture: "I do not know who it was advised the petitioner, and cannot say how she was advised, but certain it is that her son D. R. Lavender was the administrator of the estate of her husband, and he is one of the defendants in this action, and it would have been of interest at least to him to have advised his mother in a manner contrary to her interest, and thus influence her to accept a distributive share of the estate, and thus try to prevent her from recovering dower in the property of which he is an owner." This intimation that a son has practiced a fraud upon his mother is not only without testimony to support it, but is based solely upon the assumption that a son would be willing to practice fraud upon his mother simply because it was to his interest to do so. Even if human nature be as bad as some seem to suppose it to be, this court is not willing to make any such assumption, as the well-settled doctrine is that fraud cannot be presumed, but must be proved by such testimony as is competent in a court of justice.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the judgment of the court of probate of Cherokee county be affirmed: to which last-named court these cases are remanded for the purpose of having final decrees in each of these three cases entered dismissing the petitions in each of said cases.

STATE v. FOOTE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 16, 1900.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTION—NEW TRIAL—APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. In a prosecution for murder, a physician who attended deceased from the time he was shot until he died, several days thereafter, may base his opinion as to the cause of death on his personal observation and examination; a hypothetical statement of facts not being essential.

2. The court charged that "if a party is shot, and while getting well pneumonia sets in, and caused his death, the gunshot wound would be the primary cause probably of his death, and he would be liable," and that if the death of the deceased was produced by a cause independent of the gunshot wound defendant could not be convicted. Held, that the instruction was correct.

3. Where the court charged that the jury should ascertain whether defendant caused the deceased's death or whether he died from disease, and, if caused by defendant, whether it was in self-defense, or under such circumstances as justified defendant in the belief that it was necessary to save his own life, or save himself from serious bodily harm, and there was testimony that the deceased died from a disease brought on by the wound inflicted by defendant, the charge was not erroneous.

4. Where a motion for a new trial because the verdict is not sustained by the evidence has been overruled, the supreme court will not disturb the ruling if the verdict was supported by some evidence.

5. That the court, in a prosecution for murder, stated, in its refusal of a new trial on the insufficiency of the evidence, that if the doctor who testified as an expert had stated that the death was not caused by the wound the jury had the right to discredit the testimony, and find that the wound caused the death, does not constitute error, since the court is not bound to set aside a verdict if the jury has disregarded the opinion of an expert witness.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Abbeville county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Prosecution against Thomas Foote for murder. Conviction, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Graydon & Graydon and Frank B. Gary, for appellant. Solicitor Ansel, for the State.

JONES, J. The appellant, under an indictment for the murder of James Walker, was convicted of manslaughter, and now seeks to reverse the judgment imposed, upon exceptions to the admission of certain testimony, to the charge of the jury, and to the refusal of the motion for a new trial.

The first three exceptions relate to the admission of the testimony of Dr. B. M. Carlton, who gave his opinion as a medical expert as to the cause of the deceased's death. It appears that in an altercation between the parties on Sunday, May 29, 1898, the defendant shot Walker, wounding him in the fleshy part of the thigh, and that Walker died on the Friday following. There was an issue whether the wound inflicted caused the death. The witness testified that he was a practicing physician; that he attended Walker on the day he was shot, and extracted the ball; that he saw the patient the next day, and again on Friday, June 3, 1898, when he was in a dying condition. Then the following questions and answers were made, upon which the exceptions were taken: "What caused his death? He died from peritonitis. Peritonitis caused his death? Yes, sir; I presume he died from peritonitis caused from this wound. (Mr. Graydon objects.) What is your medical opinion as to what caused that peritonitis? Well— (Mr. Graydon objects.) By the Court: Peritonitis cannot be caused by drinking water, can it? Witness: No, sir; and in this case I don't know as a fact what caused it, but I presume that it was that wound." The specific objection made in the exceptions to this testimony is that the witness failed to state any fact upon which he based his opinion, but in the argument before this court the position is taken that the witness should have stated facts, or, if he desired to express an opinion, it should have been upon a hypothetical state of facts. We think the testimony was competent. In 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 444, the general rule is correctly stated thus: "Physicians may give their opinions of the cause of death, such opinions being based upon knowledge derived as attending physician, or from examination, or from hypothetical statements." It is very common practice to allow a medical expert to state his opinion as to the cause of death, based upon his own personal observation. While it is quite proper that the jury, as far as practicable, should be informed as to the facts or circumstances upon which the opinion is based, it is not error to permit such expert opinion when it appears to be based upon the witness' personal observation. If the objecting party desires, he may, on cross-examination, develop all the circumstances inducing the opinion which are capable of reproduction to the jury, and thus test the value of the opinion. A hypothetical statement of facts as the basis for the opinion of a medical expert as to the cause of death is not necessary when the opinion is based upon the personal observation or examination of the witness.

The fourth exception assigns error in charging the jury as follows: "It matters not whether the death is attributable to the gunshot, but if it hastened his death, but for a minute, he would be responsible for the death." The specific error complained of is not pointed out in this exception, and it was not argued. It was not disputed that the wound was given by the defendant, and there is no doubt that one is responsible if by his unlawful agency he hastens the death of another.

The fifth exception imputes error as follows: "In charging the jury as follows: 'If a party is shot, and while getting well pneumonia sets in, and caused his death, the gunshot wound would be the primary cause probably of his death, and he would be liable,'—the said charge being erroneous and misleading, and having a tendency to prejudice the jury against the defendant, and to injure his case, for the following reasons: (1) Because it is contrary to the rule of law that the state must prove in such a case beyond a reasonable doubt that the sickness which caused the death was brought about by the wound; (2) because the reasonable presumption in the case stated by his honor would be directly contrary to what he stated to the jury it would be, namely, that the wound in such a case did not produce the pneumonia which was the immediate cause of the death; (3) because his honor in making said statement too clearly intimated to the jury his opinion that the wound inflicted in this case caused the peritonitis from which the deceased died." That portion of the charge containing the sentence complained of is as follows: "Now, if your inquiry leads you to the belief that the death of the deceased was produced by some other cause than by the gunshot wound, he could not be convicted. But I charge you that, if he died from some disease brought on by that gunshot wound, he should be held liable for it. It matters not whether death is attributable to the gunshot, but if it hastened his death, but for a minute, he would be responsible for the death. If a party is shot, and while getting well pneumonia sets in and caused his death, the gunshot wound would be the primary cause probably of his death, and he would be held liable. If a man receives a wound by which death is produced, the party inflicting it is liable for the consequences, although the deceased might have recovered by the exercise of more care and prudence, or with better treatment." While the sentence excepted to, when isolated from its connection, is objectionable, yet, when taken in connection with the whole charge, we cannot think there was prejudicial error. The jury was clearly instructed that, if the death of the deceased was produced by a cause independent of the gunshot wound, the defend ant could not be convicted, but that he was liable if the death was from a disease brought on by the wound. The exception is overruled.

The sixth exception imputes error as follows: "Sixth. In charging the jury as follows: 'Now, you will say what caused the man's death. Not so much that, but did the defendant here cause it, or did he die from blood poison or pyæmia or pneumonia? If so, then under what circumstances was the wound inflicted? Was it in self-defense, or was it under such circumstances as made the defendant believe that it was necessary for him to resort to his gun in order to save his own life or to save him from serious bodily harm?'—the said charge being misleading and prejudicial to the defendant in the following particulars: (1) In having no relevancy to the facts of the case, there being no testimony that the deceased died from blood poison or pyæmia or pneumonia; (2) because it withdrew from the consideration of the jury every defense set up by the defendant except that of self-defense; (3) because it, in effect, told the jury that, if they believed that the deceased died from any of the diseases mentioned by his honor, the defendant caused his death; (4) because the said charge is in violation of the constitution of this state, in that his honor thereby intimated his opinion that the defendant was guilty, and charged on the facts." This charge was relevant to the facts. There was testimony in behalf of the state tending to show that the deceased died from a disease brought on by the wound inflicted by the defendant. The court was careful to impress upon the jury the duty of ascertaining whether the defendant had any agency in the death of the deceased,—in other words, whether death resulted from the wound inflicted by defendant, or from some independent cause; and this issue was not withdrawn from, but was fairly submitted to, the jury. Nor do we see any ground for the complaint that the circuit judge charged upon the facts.

The remaining exceptions relate to the refusal of the motion for a new trial. When there is absolutely no testimony tending to sustain the verdict, it is the duty of the court to grant a new trial, and it is error of law in such a case to refuse; but, when there is some testimony to sustain the verdict, the refusal of a new trial by the circuit court on the testimony is final. In this case we do not find such absolute want of testimony as to make it error of law to refuse a new trial. It is contended, however, that the circuit judge committed error of law in basing his refusal upon an improper and untenable ground, inasmuch as he stated as his reason therefor "that, if the doctor had stated that the death was not caused by the wound, the jury had the right to disregard the testimony, and find that the wound caused the death of the deceased." This does not constitute error of law. A circuit judge is not bound to set aside a verdict, even if the jury in reaching its conclusion may disregard the opinion of an expert. Jones v. Fitzpatrick, 47 S. C. 58, 24 S. E. 1030. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

MORTGAGES—ALTERATION—CONSENT OF MORTGAGOR — ABSENCE OF FRAUD — INSERTING NUMBER OF ACRES—MATERIALITY—SUBROGATION.

1. Where, three years after a mortgage was executed and recorded, it was altered, at the request of the mortgagor, by inserting the rate and payment of interest, to make it conform to the note, in the absence of fraud such alteration did not render the mortgage void.

2. Where, three years after a mortgage was executed and recorded, it was altered, at the request of the mortgagor, by inserting, after the description of the premises, "containing 165 acres, more or less," which expressed the exact number of acres in the tract, it did not render the mortgage void, since the alteration was immaterial.

3. Where a mortgage executed by defendant to plaintiff was recorded in 1883, and a junior mortgage to D. was recorded in 1884, and at the time of the execution of both a prior mortgage in favor of M. was on record and unsatisfied, the fact that a part of the proceeds of D.'s loan was used to discharge M.'s mortgage does not entitle him to be subrogated to the rights of M., since he was not a surety for defendant, and there was no equitable assignment to him of M.'s rights.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Lexington county; James Aldrich, Judge.

Action by U. X. Gunter against D. U. Addy and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant the Dundee Mortgage & Trust Investment Company appeals. Affirmed.

G. T. Graham, for appellant. Meetze & Muller, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. So much of the circuit judge's decree as is necessary to understand the questions presented by the exceptions is as follows:

"This action, instituted in 1897, and heard at the fall term, 1899, came before this court on the pleadings, the testimony taken by a special referee, and the argument of counsel. The Dundee Mortgage & Trust Investment Company, Limited, answered the complaint, and has contested the claim of the plaintiff. The other defendants have not answered. At least, no such answers were submitted to the court. The defendant D. U. Addy on January 31, 1883, made and delivered his note, whereby he promised to pay to plaintiff the sum of $919.18, with interest from date at ten per cent. per annum; interest to be paid annually, and, if not so paid, to become principal, and bear interest at ten per cent. The consideration of this note is a prior note, a small open account, and $5 or $10 paid in cash. To secure said debt, defendant D. U. Addy on the same day executed and delivered to plaintiff a mortgage upon 'a certain tract or parcel of land, known as "Gable Lands," on waters of Cut-Log Branch, county and state aforesaid, bounded on the north side by lands of Bell Crout, on the east by lands of Mrs. Betty Smith, on the south by lands of Wesley Risenger, on the west by lands of Alanzo Rose'; and the same was duly recorded on February 15, 1883. D. U. Addy on March 24, 1884, to secure a loan of $2,200 then paid to him in cash by the Dundee Mortgage & Trust Investment Company, Limited, executed and delivered to said defendant company a mortgage of real estate, covering, with other lands, the premises mortgaged to plaintiff as above stated. This mortgage was duly recorded on March 28, 1884. The condition of the note or bond given as aforesaid by the said D. U. Addy to plaintiff, as stated in the said mortgage, when executed, delivered, and recorded, was 'for the payment of the full and just sum of nine hundred and nineteen (919) dollars and 18 cents.' Afterwards, to wit, on February 16, 1886, the following words were inserted, written upon the face of said mortgage, immediately after the words just cited, to wit, 'with interest from date at ten per cent. per annum; interest to be paid annually, and, if not so paid, to become principal, and bear interest at ten per cent.' At the same time the following words were inserted, written in said mortgage just after the description of the mortgaged premises, to wit, 'containing one hundred and sixty-five (165) acres, more or less.' It is apparent from an inspection of said mortgage that the words above stated are not in the same handwriting nor in the same ink as in the body of the mortgage. I may be mistaken as to the handwriting. The same person may have written both the original instrument and the words inserted.

"As the plaintiff submitted his said mortgage in evidence, and it appears to have been altered, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to explain this appearance. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 569; Vaughan v. Fowler, 14 S. C. 358. Plaintiff has fully and satisfactorily explained the said alterations. The said words were inserted in said mortgage on February 16, 1886, at the time when Mrs. Addy, the wife of defendant Addy, signed her renunciation of dower on said mortgage, and were put there with the consent (indeed, at the instance) of D. U. Addy himself. The rule is well settled that 'any alteration of a note in a material part, after its execution, without the assent of the maker, renders it void.' Kennedy v. Moore, 17 S. C. 466; Stagg v. Cepoon, 1 Nott & McC. 162; Miller v. Starr, 2 Bailey, 359; Vaughan v. Fowler, 14 S. C. 355. There was no fraud or suggestion of fraud on the part of any one in making the said alterations. It is reasonable to conclude that D. U. Addy only desired to make the mortgage conform to the wording of the note, which was and is correct, and to make the description of the mortgaged premises more certain. I do not think that the defendant the Dundee Mortgage & Trust Investment Company, Limited, can complain of this ruling. When it lent money to D. U. Addy, it had full constructive notice of plaintiff's mortgage as recorded. With this knowledge, it lent money to D. U. Addy, and took a junior mortgage upon the premises. The insertions or alterations in plaintiff's mortgage, made as above stated, were made nearly two years after the Dundee Company had lent money to Addy, taken his bond and mortgage therefor, and had recorded the latter. The plaintiff, however, must stand upon his mortgage as he accepted and recorded it, and can ask for foreclosure and sale and for the payment of the money as therein stated. Plaintiff is entitled to a judgment, as against D. U. Addy, upon his note, for the amount therein stated; but he is entitled to be paid upon said indebtedness, from the sale of the mortgaged premises, only so much as the said mortgage, without the insertions, purports to secure. The Dundee Company, in the answer, pleads that it is a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration, without notice of plaintiff's mortgage, and is entitled to have the mortgage adjudged to be the first lien on the mortgaged premises. What has been said, and will hereafter be said, must, I think, dispose of this claim, and adversely to the said Dundee Company.

"On January 15, 1881, D. U. Addy and his wife, E. C. I. Addy, to pay a debt for $500 owing by them to Westly Nichols, executed and delivered to said Nichols a mortgage of the lands heretofore described as being covered by the mortgage of the plaintiff and of the Dundee Company. This mortgage was duly recorded on January 15, 1881. This mortgage was upon record, unsatisfied, when both the plaintiff and Dundee Company took their mortgages, and both had constructive notice thereof. On April 2, 1884, the Dundee Mortgage & Trust Investment Company, Limited, paid to said Westly Nichols $350, the balance then due upon said mortgage; and thereupon the said Westly Nichols marked said mortgage 'Satisfied,' and said satisfaction was duly entered of record across the face of the record of the mortgage. The Dundee Company asks that, if plaintiff's mortgage is held to be a first lien upon the mortgaged premises, it be subrogated to all the rights that the said Westly Nichols had under his said mortgage, which was first lien on said tract of land at the time of the execution of plaintiff's mortgage. Upon this subject the special referee reports: 'With reference to the Westly Nichols mortgage, which bears date the 15th January, 1881, recorded in Book D, p. 334, it is admitted that the defendant the mortgage company placed in the hands of G. T. Graham, Esq., a considerable sum of money, to wit, $2,200, to be paid to Addy when the amount due on the Nichols mortgage and the J. H. Lewie mortgage were satisfied, and that Graham paid Nichols the balance due on his mortgage, to wit, $350, out of the money paid into his hands by the mortgage company, and that after paying the Nichols mortgage, and a mortgage or two of J. H. Lewie, and attorney's fees, together with other costs of loan, the balance was turned over to Addy by Graham.' The assertion of the right of subrogation by the Dundee Company is denied. I can see no possible ground for it to rest upon. The Dundee Company was no surety for Addy. It had no interest in the debt or lands. It was a stranger to Addy and to Nichols. The Dundee Company, as the lender of the money, lent no money to Addy under the terms of the loan, and for its own protection the Dundee Company used a part of the money to pay the Nichols mortgage.

The contract or agreement was carried out, and the Nichols mortgage was paid, and formally and legally satisfied and discharged. The idea of an assignment, either as the act of the parties, or an equitable assignment by way of subrogation, did not enter into the transaction at all. There is nothing to base defendant's claim of subrogation upon, and it is dismissed."

The conclusion which this court has reached upon certain questions raised by the exceptions renders speculative the other questions therein presented. There are practically but three questions to be considered, the first of which is whether the insertion in the plaintiff's mortgage of the words, "with interest from date at ten per cent. per annum; interest to be paid annually, and, if not so paid, to become principal, and bear interest at ten per cent.," rendered it null and void. The circumstances under which the alterations were made are set forth in the circuit judge's decree, and clearly show that they were not made with a fraudulent intent. They were made three years after the execution and recording of plaintiff's mortgage, and two years after the execution and recording of the appellant's mortgage. The plaintiff was only allowed to foreclose his mortgage for the amount due him as disclosed by the record. The defendant has in no way been prejudiced, and we do not see what right it has to complain.

The second question is whether there was error in deciding that the insertion of the words, "containing one hundred and sixty-five acres, more or less," rendered the mortgage null and void. These words were not material, for the following reasons: (1) Because they expressed correctly the number of acres contained in the tract, and were not in conflict with the other description of said land; and (2) they could not, in any event, prevail against the words describing the land by boundaries, even if they had been in conflict.

The third question is whether the circuit judge erred in deciding that the appellant was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of Westly Nichols. For the reasons stated by the circuit judge, this court concurs with him that the appellant did not have such right. Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. TENNY et al.

TRESPASS—PLEADING—EMINENT DOMAIN—STATUTES—REPEAL.

1. Where defendants were convicted under an affidavit and warrant charging trespass after notice, by going on land of another, an exception to the judgment, that there is no such offence as that charged, is not well taken, since the words used sufficiently allege the offense of entry on land of another after notice from the owner or tenant prohibiting the same.

2. Spartanburg City Charter (17 St. at Large, p. 439) gave the city power to open streets, provided they should first pay damages for land taken, and directed the appointment of five freeholders to fix damages; Act Dec. 24, 1884 (18 Stat. 781), provided the mode by which lands should be taken for streets, roads, and highways by cities, required a board of 12 freeholders to assess damages, and repealed all acts inconsistent therewith; and Act March 2, 1899 (23 St. at Large, p. 205), authorized the city of Spartanburg to condemn land for a sewer system, the land to be condemned and damages assessed in the manner provided by law for opening streets. Held, that the charter provision for the assessment of damages was repealed by the act of 1884 (18 St. at Large, p. 781), and that proceedings subsequently taken under it were void.

3. Where defendants in a prosecution for trespass sought to introduce evidence of condemnation proceedings of the land in question under a repealed statute, the evidence was properly excluded.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Spartanburg county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

G. O. Tenny and Earl Sanders were convicted of trespass. From a judgment of the circuit court affirming conviction before a justice, they appeal. Affirmed.

Simpson & Bomar, for appellants. Solicitor Lease, for respondent.

JONES, J. This appeal is from the judgment of the circuit court affirming the judgment of a magistrate's court, wherein the defendants were tried and sentenced under an affidavit and warrant which, after amendment, charged that defendants on March 8, 9, 10, 25, and again on April 15 and 17, 1899, "committed a trespass after notice, by going on the land of deponent [S. S. Daniel] and cutting a ditch," etc.

The first and second exceptions relating to the amendment of the affidavit, were taken under a misapprehension, and were not insisted on.

The fourth exception complains of the judgment on the ground that there is no such offense in this state as that charged. This exception is disposed of by the case of State v. Hallbach, 40 S. C. 298, 18 S. E. 919, wherein an affidavit and warrant charging that defendant committed a trespass on land after notice sufficiently alleged the offense of "entry on the inclosed or uninclosed land of another after notice from the owner or tenant prohibiting the same."

The third and fifth exceptions complain of error in excluding from the evidence a paper purporting to be a report of a board of assessors to the city council of Spartanburg, claiming to have been selected to assess the damage done to the property of Dr. S. S. Daniel, in which report the assessors found no damages to the property. The report was dated March 22, 1899, and was made pursuant to a notice by the said city council to S. S. Daniel, dated March 16, 1899, notifying him that the city council finds it necessary, in constructing a system of sewerage, to make excavations, to lay pipes, etc., across the said Daniels' lot, and requesting him to nominate two freeholders within 10 days, who, together with two freeholders named by the city council, would select a fifth freeholder, to assess the damage that may be done to the premises. The report was signed by the five freeholders selected in accordance with said notice. This report was sought to be introduced in justification of the entry by defendants on the prosecutor's land after notice forbidding the same. The magistrate rejected the evidence, holding the proceeding void on the ground that such board of assessors was not legally constituted, and this ruling was affirmed by the circuit court. The proceedings were taken under the act of December 24, 1880 (17 St. at Large, p. 430), incorporating the city of Spartanburg, which gave the city council power to lay out and open new streets in said city, and to close up, widen, or otherwise alter streets, provided they shall first pay damages to the landowners; said damages to be fixed and determined by five freeholders of said town, two of whom shall be chosen by the said city council, two by the said landowner, and the fifth by the persons so chosen. The act of December 24, 1884 (18 St. at Large, p. 781), entitled "An act to provide a mode of procedure by which lands may be taken by cities and towns for streets, roads and highways for public use," required six freeholders to be appointed by the city authorities, and six others by the landowner to determine the damage, etc. The act of March 2, 1899 (23 St. at Large, p. 205), authorized the city council of Spartanburg to condemn private property for the establishment, etc., of a system of sewerage; "the same to be condemned and the compensation and damages therefor assessed as is now provided for by law for the opening or widening of streets." The act of 1884, supra, being a general act on the subject, and repealing expressly all acts repugnant thereto, operated to repeal so much of the act of 1880, supra, as related to the mode of assessing damages, etc. It follows that the proceedings under the act of 1880 were void, and could constitute no justification or defense even for entry on the prosecutor's land after such proceedings,—much less, for an entry previous to such proceedings. The evidence in this case was to the effect that the ditch was dug on the prosecutor's premises previous to the said proceedings to assess damages. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

GOING v. MUTUAL BEN. LIFE INS. CO.

LIFE POLICY—DEATH BEFORE DELIVERY—CONDITION REQUIRING GOOD HEALTH—RIGHT TO INSPECT POLICY—TRIAL—NONSUIT—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY—PRIVATE RULES OF COMPANY—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Plaintiff's evidence in an action against a life insurance company showed that a policy issued on her husband's life was sent to the local agent for delivery; that thereafter her husband became seriously ill, and three days before his death tender of the first premium was made to the agent, which he refused to accept,—stating, as one witness said, that the company would not allow him to deliver policies to sick men." The policy itself provided that it should not take effect "until the first premium shall have been actually paid during the lifetime of the insured." No condition in the policy required payment during good health. Held, that a motion to nonsuit should have been denied, since the condition requiring payment of the first premium during the lifetime of the insured was complied with by its tender, and the question whether there was any other condition would depend on the view taken of the testimony by the jury.

2. An insurance company wrote plaintiff's attorneys, regarding a contested policy, that the contract of insurance had never been completed, as the insured had never paid the premium. Undisputed evidence in the subsequent action against the company showed that tender had been made during the life of the insured. Held, the introduction of the attorneys' reply that such tender had been made, and that in their opinion there was a valid claim, was not objectionable, as the mere opinion of the attorneys, nor as a self-serving declaration, and should be admitted in evidence as part of the correspondence.

3. On an issue whether insured was notified that his policy was ready for delivery, a third party's testimony as to what message was given G. for the insured, and as to what G. told him the next morning with reference to the message, was hearsay evidence and inadmissible.

4. In an action on a policy, an agent's manual, forbidding agents to deliver policies unless the applicant was in good health at the time of delivery, was inadmissible, without proof that the applicant knew the rule.

5. Where an agent's manual, showing rules of the company, was excluded from evidence in an action on a life policy because it was not shown that the insured knew the rules, subsequent testimony to that effect did not invalidate the ruling, as its correctness was dependent on the state of the testimony at the time.

6. Where the agent testified, in an action on a life policy, that the company's rules forbade his delivery of policies to applicants not in good health at the time of delivery, a prior ruling excluding an agent's manual showing the same rule, if error, was harmless.

7. Where an applicant for life insurance became fatally ill after issuance, but before delivery, of his policy, the fact that he reserved the right to inspect it before paying the first premium would not defeat recovery thereon, providing he waived the right and tendered payment, since the reservation was intended solely for his benefit.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Union county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by Emma Going against the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ansel, Cothran & Cothran, for appellant. R. W. Shand and James Munro, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This action was brought upon a policy of insurance on the life of the deceased husband of the plaintiff, alleged to have been issued by the defendant company, and payable to her if she survived her husband, as she did. The defense set up by the company was that the policy sued upon had never been delivered, and there was never any completed contract of insurance. While some of the facts are contested, the following seem to be undisputed: On the 4th of May, 1898, J. D. Going, the husband of the plaintiff, made an application for insurance in writing, which is set out in the "case"; and this, together with the certificate of the medical examiner, was forwarded to the home office of the company, in Newark, in the state of New Jersey, where it was received and marked "Approved" the 9th of May, 1898, and the policy was prepared, bearing date the 10th of May, 1898, signed by the proper officers of the company, and sent to the local agent of the company at Union, S. C., through the office of the state agent at Raleigh, N. C. Precisely when the policy reached the office of the local agent at Union does not appear, though there is but little doubt that it was about the 15th of May, 1898, when Mr. L. S. Townsend, the local agent, was absent from home, and did not return until about the 15th or 20th of June, 1898. Nor did it distinctly appear at what time the assured, J. D. Going, learned that the policy had been returned to Union; but it must have been on or before the 29th of June, 1898, for on that day the judge of probate, accompanied by B. B. Going, brother of the assured, at his request called on Mr. Townsend, the local agent, and tendered him the amount of the first premium, which the local agent refused to accept, for the reason, as he said, that "the company would not allow him to deliver policies to sick men." On the 28th of May, 1898, the assured was taken sick with what proved to be typhoid fever, and on the 29th of June, when the tender was made, was very sick, and he subsequently died, on the 2d of July, 1898. Soon after this Messrs. Munro & Munro, attorneys at law, having been employed to collect the insurance, called on the local agent, Mr. Townsend, for blanks to make out the claim, and were referred by him to Mr. Pearson, the vice president of the company; and they thereupon wrote him a letter, under date of 28th of July, 1898, demanding payment of the policy of insurance issued by the company, which "your agent afterwards refused to deliver," and also for blanks for proofs of death, if required. To this letter the vice president of the company replied by letter under date of 1st August, 1898, saying that: "The contract of insurance to which you refer was not completed by Mr. James D. Going, as he did not pay the premium. There is, therefore, no claim against this company because of said contract." These two letters were received in evidence without objection, but, when the plaintiff offered to introduce a letter of Messrs. Munro & Munro in reply to the letter of the vice president of the company, objection was made, which objection was overruled, and the letter was read in evidence, in which Messrs. Munro & Munro, after acknowledging the receipt of the letter of the vice president, use this language: "Mr. Going, as you say, did not pay the premium; but the full amount of the premium was tendered to your agent, and demand made for the policy, in the lifetime of Mr. Going. It seems to us that there is a claim against your company because of the contract, and we trust you will reconsider the matter and pay the policy." To this letter no reply was received, and on the 14th of December, 1898, this action was commenced. At the close of the testimony for the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove a completed contract, inasmuch as it was claimed that delivery of the policy was essential to complete the contract, and there was no evidence of either actual or constructive delivery of the policy. The motion was refused, and exception taken by defendant's counsel. The defendant then offered its testimony, in the course of which certain exceptions were taken as to the rulings of the circuit judge upon the admissibility of some of the testimony offered by defendant. The case went to the jury under the charge of the judge, to which certain exceptions were taken; and, a verdict having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff, a motion for a new trial on the minutes was made, which being refused, judgment was entered upon the verdict. From this judgment defendant appeals upon the several exceptions set out in the record. These exceptions impute error to the circuit judge (1) in refusing the motion for a nonsuit; (2) in his rulings as to the admissibility of testimony; (3) in his charge; and (4) in refusing the motion for a new trial.

First as to the motion for a nonsuit, which was based upon the ground "that the plaintiff has failed to prove a completed contract." Now, on a motion for a nonsuit the question is not whether the plaintiff has failed to prove his case, but the only question is whether the plaintiff has failed to produce any testimony tending to prove his case. Assuming the view most favorable to the appellant,—that the real meaning of this ground is that there was no testimony tending to show a completed contract,—we will proceed to consider the question in that aspect. While it is conceded that there was testimony tending to show that the policy which evidenced the contract sued on was sent to the local agent by the defendant company for the purpose of being delivered to the assured, yet the contention is that, while that would amount to a constructive delivery to the assured, provided it was sent for unconditional delivery, yet, as there were two conditions (one that the first premium should be paid, and the other that the policy should not be delivered if the assured was at the time sick), and while the first might be regarded as having been complied with by the tender of the amount of the first premium, yet there was no testimony that the second (that the assured was in good health at the time) was complied with, and there was therefore no testimony that the contract had ever been completed, and that, on the contrary, the testimony on the part of the plaintiff showed that, when the first premium was tendered and the policy was demanded, the assured was very sick, and died in a few days thereafter. It is very obvious that this position of appellant rests entirely upon the assumption that the testimony on the part of the plaintiff tended to show that the policy was sent by the company to its local agent not for unconditional delivery, but that it was sent for delivery upon the compliance by the assured with the two conditions above stated. Now, while it is true that the policy does contain these words, "This policy does not take effect until the first premium shall have been actually paid during the lifetime of the insured," which necessarily imply that the policy was not to be delivered until that condition was complied with, yet there is not a single word in the policy which implies or even intimates that there was any other condition upon which the policy was to take effect or to be delivered. On the contrary, it is expressly declared in the policy itself that the defendant company "has, by its president and secretary, signed and delivered this contract" on the 10th of May, 1898, which, it will be noted, was the day after the application for insurance had been received and marked "Approved;" and counsel for respondent has cited an authority (Bliss, Ins. § 153), which is based upon the case of Xenos v. Wickham, 2 L. R. H. L. 296, in which it was held that a policy purporting to be "signed, sealed, and delivered" by the proper officers of an insurance company must be conclusively taken, as against the company, to have been not only duly signed and sealed, but also duly delivered, and that such a policy is complete and binding against the party executing it, though in fact it remains in his possession, unless there is some particular act required to be done by the other party to declare his adoption of it, and that it is not necessary that the assured shall formally accept or take away a policy, in order to make the delivery complete. Now, in the case before the court the only act remaining to be done by the assured after it was executed, so far as the contract on its face shows, was for the assured to pay the first premium, which was, in effect, done during the lifetime of the assured, by the tender of the amount of such premium, which, it is conceded, and properly conceded, was equivalent to payment; and so that condition was complied with, and the contract was completed. It is contended, however, by the appellants, there was another condition to the delivery of the policy, which was not, and could not have been, complied with at the time the delivery of the policy was demanded, to wit, that the assured must then have been shown to be in good health, which was not only not shown, but, on the contrary, the testimony tended to show that the assured was at the time very sick of a disease from which he died in a few days thereafter. But it is very obvious that the policy, which constitutes the contract between the parties, contained no such condition, and the attempt is to raise such a condition by the testimony as to the instructions given to the local agent by the company. Whether it would be competent to annex to a written contract any other condition than that contained in the written contract is a question which we do not propose to consider at present, as no such question seems to have been made up to the time when the motion for a nonsuit was submitted. Assuming, then, for the purposes of this particular inquiry only, that such testimony was competent, it is apparent that the only testimony which had then been offered (for, of course, in considering a motion for a nonsuit our attention must be confined to the testimony of the plaintiff offered in chief) was the simple declaration of the local agent as to the reason why he refused the tender made of the first premium, which was that "the company would not allow him to deliver policies to sick men," as testified by Mr. Greer, one of the parties who made the tender, though the other witness, B. B. Going, who went with Greer to make the tender, did not remember that the local agent gave any such reason for refusing to accept the money when tendered, but that his reply was: "He said he had the policy,—the paper; it was all right, but he would not accept of the money." And when that witness was recalled he testified as follows: "Q. When you went there to Mr. Townsend to tender the money, what did he say? (Objected to by counsel for defendant because it was incompetent to prove by this witness declarations of the agent as to what the company had done. Objection overruled, and the witness testified as follows:) A. He said he would not take the money. He said he had the policy, and he said it had been accepted,—the company had accepted it,—but he would not take the money." The only other testimony to which we deem it necessary to refer in this connection is that of the correspondence between the Messrs. Munro, as attorneys for the plaintiff, and the vice president of the defendant company, to whom they had been referred by the local agent, in which the vice president, in his letter, denies the liability of the company solely upon the ground that the contract had not been completed by the assured, "as he did not pay the premium"; making no allusion whatever to any other condition or alleged condition in the contract. These two letters were received in evidence without objection, but, when the letter of Messrs. Munro & Munro in reply to that of the vice president was offered, objection was made upon the ground that "it is simply the opinion of a distinguished lawyer"; but the objection was overruled, and the letter received in evidence, very properly, as we shall see when we come to consider the second general question in the case. This being the state of the testimony when the motion for a nonsuit was submitted, we think it clear that there was no error in refusing the motion; for there was no doubt that the first condition upon which the policy was to take effect, as stated in the policy (the payment of the first premium), was, in law, complied with by the tender, which was undisputed; and whether there was any other condition depended entirely upon the view which should be taken of the testimony, and that was a matter to be determined by the jury.

We proceed next to the consideration of the second general question, involving the inquiry whether there was error in any of the rulings as to the admissibility of testimony specified in the second, third, fourth, and fifth exceptions. In the second exception the error complained of is the admission of the letter of Messrs. Munro & Munro in reply to the vice president of the company, hereinabove referred to. It will be observed that the objection made at the time this letter was offered was based solely upon the ground that "it is simply the opinion of a distinguished lawyer"; but in the second exception it is claimed that this letter was incompetent for a wholly different reason, to wit, because "it is in the nature of self-serving declarations." Strictly speaking, therefore, this exception could not be considered; but, waiving this, we think the letter was clearly competent, in either view. In the first place, it was a part of a correspondence, a portion of which had been received without objection. In the next place, the manifest purpose of the letter was to correct a misapprehension under which the vice president seemed to be laboring; for, as we have said, the vice president, in his letter, which was received without objection, had based his denial of responsibility entirely upon the ground that the first premium had not been paid, which, while true as matter of fact, as the money had not actually been paid, yet was not true as matter of law, as the undisputed fact was that the money had been tendered during the lifetime of the assured, which, as it was properly conceded, was equivalent to payment. The manifest object of the letter in question was simply to correct this misapprehension on the part of the vice president, by calling his attention to the fact of the tender having been made,—a fact of which he possibly may have then been ignorant. The letter was not objectionable as the opinion of a distinguished lawyer; for such was not its purpose, and the only opinion expressed in it was that, in view of the fact of the tender, to which the attention of the vice president was called, the writer thought that he might take a different view from that expressed in his letter to which this was a reply. At all events the letter could in no aspect be regarded as anything more than the expression of Mr. Munro's opinion that tender would be equivalent to payment in a case like this,—an opinion in which this court, as well as every one connected with this case, seem to concur. Nor is the letter objectionable as "in the nature of self-serving declarations"; for the only fact stated in it was a fact about which there was no dispute,—that the amount of the first premium had been tendered during the lifetime of the assured. In no view that we have been able to take was the letter in question incompetent, and to have rejected it would have worked great injustice to the plaintiff, by allowing a garbled correspondence to go before the jury. It would have been like allowing a part, only, of a conversation between parties to be offered. The second exception must therefore be overruled.

The third and fourth exceptions, being of a similar character, may be considered together. It seems that when Mrs. L. S. Townsend, the wife of the local agent, was on the stand, after testifying that she was in the habit of opening her husband's business letters in his absence, and had received the policy in this case, she was asked what message she had sent assured when she received the policy, to which objection was made; and the court ruled that this would be incompetent unless it was made to appear that such message had been received by the assured. Then the witness J. A. Brown was asked whether he heard Mrs. Townsend give a message for J. D. Going to any one, to which he replied, "Yes;" that he heard her deliver a message to Oliver Going. But, when he was asked what that message was, the court made the same ruling as above. The witness was then asked what Oliver Going had told him the next morning in reference to the message, which was ruled out as hearsay. We see no error in any of these rulings. If the defendant desired to prove that a message had been sent to J. D. Going, the assured, the proper witness to prove that fact would be the person who delivered the message to J. D. Going; and, if it was desired to prove what was the reply of J. D. Going to such message, the proper witness to prove that fact would have been the person who received the reply. The claim that Oliver Going, the person selected to carry the alleged message to J. D. Going, was the mutual agent of the parties, is not sustained by any testimony competent for that purpose; for it is well settled that agency cannot be proved by the mere declarations of the alleged agent, for there is no evidence that any message was ever received by J. D. Going. If any such message was ever sent to J. D. Going by Oliver Going, the defendant had the ready means of proving it, by putting Oliver Going on the stand as a witness; but this was not done, and surely the defendant cannot be allowed to supply that testimony by offering a third person as a witness to prove the declarations of Oliver Going, as that would be purely hearsay testimony. This view is sustained by McGee v. French, 49 S. C. 454, 27 S. E. 487. The third and fourth exceptions must therefore be overruled.

The fifth exception, imputing error to the circuit judge in refusing to receive in evidence that printed rule of the defendant company, furnished to its agents, by which an agent is forbidden to deliver a policy unless the first premium has been paid, and unless the assured is in good health at the time, cannot be sustained, for two reasons: (1) Because we think the ruling was right; (2) because, even if erroneous, it was harmless error. At the time this book, called "The Agents' Manual," containing the rules for the guidance of agents, was offered in evidence, no testimony had been offered tending to show that the assured had ever been informed of these rules or assented thereto; and therefore the testimony was clearly incompetent, under the case of Riordan v. Doty, 50 S. C., at page 547, 27 S. E., at page 943. Besides, upon principle, we think that the private instructions given by a corporation to an agent, to govern his dealings with third persons on behalf of the corporation, should not be received, unless made known to the persons with whom they deal. Especially should this be the rule in a case like this, where a policy of insurance, which contains the terms of the contract, is sought to be avoided by some private instruction to the agent, not made known to the applicant when he takes out his policy. It is true that, after the ruling excepted to was made, the local agent did testify that he did tell the assured at the time he was examined by the doctor that, if he did not then make payment of the premium, he could not deliver the policy when it was returned approved by the company, if he was seriously sick at the time; but, of course, the correctness of the ruling must be tested by the testimony as it appeared at the time the ruling was made, and the question could not be affected by any testimony offered afterwards. But, even if there was error in ruling out the printed instructions to the agents, yet such error was manifestly harmless, for the agent was afterwards permitted (whether correctly or not, we cannot undertake to decide in this case, as there was no objection, or, rather, no exception, taken to such testimony) to testify that his instructions from the company were not to deliver any policy until the first premium was paid, and not then unless the applicant was then in good health, so that the company got the same benefit from these instructions as if the book had been admitted in evidence when it was offered. The fifth exception must therefore be overruled.

The sixth exception is based upon an alleged error in the charge of the circuit judge, or, rather, in his modification of a request to charge submitted by the defendant. It seems that there was some testimony tending to show that, in the conversation between the local agent and the assured on the day of the medical examination, the assured had been told by the agent that if, when the policy was returned, there was anything in it that he did not understand, or that it was not exactly understood it was to be, he could not be obliged to take the policy, to which the assured assented; and upon that testimony the circuit judge was requested to charge the jury, "upon the effect of that agreement, if they believe the testimony of Mr. Townsend, that the contract was therefore not completed until Mr. Going had an opportunity to examine that policy, and he examined it and signified his acceptance of the policy, and that he could not, when seriously sick, take advantage of the change of affairs then, to tender the money without an examination—without an acceptance—of the policy, and demand the policy and tender the payment." In response to that request the jury were charged as follows: "If there was an understanding or agreement between the agent of the company here and Mr. Going that Mr. Going should inspect that policy before he paid the premium,—should have a chance to look at it and see whether or not he should accept it,—then I charge you, as matter of law, the contract would not be complete until he had inspected it, or waived his right to inspect it, and signified his willingness to accept it; but if he went there and accepted it just as it was, and tendered the premium, or if he sent anybody there for that purpose, and the company had sent the policy to their agent, with the intent to deliver it to Going if he paid the premium and accepted that policy as insurance on his life, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover." The point of the exception lies in the insertion of the words which we have italicized,—"or waived his right to inspect it." In this there certainly was no error, for the reservation of the right to examine the terms of the policy before paying the premium for the policy was for the benefit of the assured solely; and, if he chose to waive that right, the other party surely has no reason to complain. Indeed, this exception seems designed to raise, in another form, the point on which the defense was really rested,—that there was a condition in the contract whereby the policy was not to be delivered unless the assured was in good health when the premium was tendered and the policy was demanded. Whether there was such a condition was a question of fact, depending upon the testimony, of which the jury were the sole judges; and they have solved that question in favor of the plaintiff, under instructions to which no exceptions were or could have been taken by the defendant,—that if they believed there was such a condition, and the same was not complied with, then their verdict should be for the defendant,—and this must be an end of the matter. The sixth exception must therefore be overruled.

The seventh and last exception imputes error to the circuit judge in refusing the motion for a new trial, for three reasons: (1) Because of error in excluding the printed rules of the company containing instructions to agents as to the delivery of policies. This has been already disposed of, by what we have said in considering the fifth exception. (2) Because there was no dispute as to the facts of the case, and, under the law as given to the jury by the court, they were bound to render a verdict for the defendant. The third ground of the motion for a new trial is practically involved in the second, and they may therefore be considered together. The rule, as we understand it, is that where, as in the cases of Dent v. Bryce, 16 S. C. 1, and Thompson v. Lee, 19 S. C. 489, the judge directs a verdict, and the jury disregard such direction and find a verdict contrary to that directed, then it is the duty of the circuit judge to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial, and, if he refuses to do so, then there is such error of law as this court may correct. But where, as in this case, the jury were instructed that if, from the testimony, they believed a certain fact or series of facts, then their verdict should be for the plaintiff or defendant, as the case may be, but if, from the testimony, they did not believe such fact or series of facts, their verdict should be the other way, then a motion for a new trial presents a question for the discretion of the circuit judge, with which this court has no power to interfere. It cannot properly be said that there was no dispute as to the material facts of this case. In the first place, there was testimony tending to show that the policy, which had been approved by the company, was returned to the local agent at Union for delivery to the assured at least 10 days before the assured was taken sick; but there is no evidence that the assured received any notice to that effect until the 29th of June, 1898, when the assured, being quite sick at the time, sent his brother and a friend to the local agent to pay the premium and demand the policy. What occurred between the agent and these gentlemen when the premium was tendered was at least left in some doubt by the testimony, as one of them testified that the agent simply refused to accept the tender, without giving any reason for such refusal, while the other said that the reason he gave was that "the company would not allow him to deliver policies to sick men." Not a word was said as to his having any general or special instructions to this effect from the company,—just simply the bald declaration above quoted, which might have been a mere expression of opinion upon the part of the agent. Then, too, there is another significant circumstance which appears in the testimony, and that is, when demand was made on the company for payment of the policy, the vice president denies responsibility solely upon the ground that the first premium had not been paid, and makes no allusion to the noncompliance with any other condition; and even when he is informed by Mr. Munro's second letter that, while it was true that the premium had not in fact been paid, yet it had been tendered, which, in his view, was equivalent to payment, he makes no reply whatever. From this testimony it is possible that the jury may have inferred that there was in fact no condition that the policy was not to be delivered if the assured was not in good health at the time, and that such condition was an afterthought. Be that as it may, however, it was a question of fact for the jury, and with their finding we have neither the power nor the disposition to interfere. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BARRON v. WILLIAMS et al.

INSURANCE—GIFT BY INSURED—EVIDENCE—FRAUD OF CREDITORS—PERSONAL PROPERTY—HOMESTEAD EXEMPTIONS.

1. Testimony of insured's son and daughter, whose character and credibility were unimpeached, that two years prior to his assignment for the benefit of creditors he delivered his life policy to his wife, saying, "This is yours," and instructed her to put it away, and keep it, was uncontradicted, and was corroborated by a letter written during his last illness, instructing her to collect the insurance, and saying it was all hers. The assignment for creditors conveyed all insured's property not exempt as homestead, but did not mention the life policy, which was not delivered to the assignee, but remained in possession of his wife, and was not mentioned in an appraisement of his personal property made shortly after the assignment. Held, that such testimony showed a gift of the policy by the insured to his wife prior to his assignment, and a finding that it passed to the assignee was erroneous.

2. Where the personal property of an insured, including the cash surrender value of his life policy, did not exceed his homestead exemption, a gift of such policy to his wife was not void as to creditors, since, as an insolvent debtor may convey his homestead to his wife, such gift did not affect their rights.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of York county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by John I. Barron, individually and as administrator of the estate of Mary L. Barron, deceased, against George W. Williams, as administrator of the estate of Walter T. Barron, deceased, and others. From a judgment in favor of George W. Williams, administrator, and other defendants, but allowing plaintiff a portion of his claim, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Geo. W. S. Hart, for appellant. D. E. Finley and T. Y. Williams, for respondent D. E. Finley.

JONES, J. The object of this action is to determine the ownership of a policy of insurance issued November 22, 1888, by the Equitable Life Assurance Society, on the life of Walter J. Barron, who died intestate January 21, 1899. The policy was made payable "to Walter T. Barron, his executors, administrators, or assigns." The plaintiff, as administrator of Mary L. Barron, who died intestate February 12, 1899, claims the policy under an alleged gift by Walter T. Barron to his wife, Mary L. Barron. The defendant D. E. Finley claims the policy under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors executed to him as assignee June 2, 1896, by the firm of Kennedy Bros. & Barron, of which Walter T. Barron was a member, and by Walter T. Barron individually. This assignment conveys all the individual and partnership property of the assignors not exempt from levy, attachment, and sale as a homestead, but does not mention specifically the policy of insurance. In the event the transfer to Mary L. Barron is not sustained, the plaintiff and the five defendants named in the title of this cause as surviving children of Walter T. Barron and Mary L. Barron claim that the policy should go to them as part of the homestead exemption of their father. The circuit court held that there was no transfer of the policy by Walter T. Barron to Mary L. Barron; that the policy passed to the assignee, D. E. Finley, under the assignment for creditors; but that, Mary L. Barron having paid the premiums on the policy from the date of the assignment to the death of Walter T. Barron, her administrator was entitled to such a proportion of the fund as the payments she made bear to the whole number of payments.

We think the preponderance of the evidence is clearly against the conclusion of the circuit court that there was no transfer of the policy by Walter T. Barron to Mary L. Barron. Indeed, we fail to find anything in the evidence to sustain the conclusion of the decree below. The plaintiff testified positively that his father, Walter T. Barron, in 1894, delivered to his mother, Mary L. Barron, a policy in the Equitable Life Assurance Society on the life of Walter T. Barron, saying to her: "This is yours. Put it up. Keep it." This is corroborated by Elizabeth E. Barron, one of the defendants, a daughter of Walter T. Barron, who testified that more than two years previous to July, 1896, when her brother Lapsly died, her father delivered to her mother a policy in the Equitable Life Assurance Society, saying: "This is yours. Put it away in a safe place." The identity of the policy in question with the policy referred to by these witnesses is shown by the testimony of an officer of the Equitable that said company issued but one policy on the life of Walter T. Barron. There is no imputation whatever against the character and credibility of these witnesses. Their evidence was objected to as incompetent under section 400 of the Code. It does not appear that this objection was ruled upon by the circuit court, nor is such ruling, if any, questioned by any exception; but, as we are relying upon said testimony, we may say in passing that the testimony was not objectionable under section 400, because it was not in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and the deceased person. This evidence was further corroborated by a letter addressed by Walter T. Barron to his wife, Mary L. Barron, dated November 30, 1898, during his last illness, which was found in his pocket after his death. In this letter, among other matters, not necessary to mention, Walter T. Barron wrote: "First collect the insurance. It is all yours." The policy was never delivered to the assignee under the deed of assignment for creditors, nor, as stated, was it referred to specifically in the deed of assignment; on the contrary, the policy remained in the possession of Mary L. Barron, and after her death it was found in her private desk. In the listing and valuation of the personal property of Walter T. Barron made by Joseph F. Wallace a short time after the assignment of June 2, 1898, no mention is made of this policy. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, we are satisfied that Walter T. Barron gave this policy to his wife previous to the deed of assignment. But it is argued that such a voluntary transfer was fraudulent and void as against Walter T. Barron's existing creditors. In order to avoid a gift by the husband to the wife for fraud, it is incumbent on the creditors to show that the gift was detrimental to their rights. As stated in Bridgers v. Howell, 27 S. C. 434, 3 S. E. 790: "There can be no fraud, either actual or constructive, in a debtor putting beyond the reach of the ordinary process of law funds or property which by law are exempt from the payment of a debt, for the reason that the creditor is not thereby deprived of any right or impeded in the enforcement of it." So, in Finley v. Cartwright, 55 S. C. 198, 33 S. E. 359, it was held that an insolvent debtor who is the head of a family in this state may, as against his creditors, convey his homestead to his wife. It was incumbent, therefore, on the contestee assignee for creditors to show that at the time of this transfer or gift of the policy to his wife the homestead exemption would not protect this property from creditors. It does not appear what amount of personal property was owned by Walter T. Barron at the time of the gift to his wife, but it does appear that Mr. Barron's personal property was valued by Mr. Wallace about June, 1896, and found to be $335. This did not include $34.89 money on deposit in the Loan & Savings Bank in the name of Walter T. Barron. There was evidence to show that the cash surrender value of the policy on June 2, 1896, the date of the assignment to D. E. Finley for creditors, was only $94.15. From this evidence alone the only proper inference is that at the time of the transfer of the policy to Mrs. Barron, Mr. Barron did not own personal property exceeding his homestead exemption; hence the transfer could not be in fraud of the rights of creditors. We may add that a policy of insurance, like any other chose in action, may be transferred by parol, unless some unwaived provision in the policy forbids it. We find nothing in the policy forbidding such a transfer. The insurance company makes no question on that score, but by a consent order has paid the fund, $2,641.24, into the hands of the clerk of the court for the person entitled to the same. Our conclusion above disposes of the case, and it is unnecessary to consider further. The administrator of Mary L. Barron is entitled to the fund in court. The judgment of the circuit court is therefore reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to the court below to order the whole fund, $2,641.24, paid to the plaintiff, as administrator of Mary L. Barron.

Ex parte BULLOCK.

HOMESTEAD—WIDOW'S RIGHT BARRED—DEVISE.

Where petitioner's husband devised a part of his real estate to one of his sons in fee, and the balance to petitioner for life, remainder to the son, and expressly excluded his other children from any participation in his property, it was improper to set off homestead to the widow and children of deceased, since a specific devise of real estate by testator will defeat any claim of homestead therein.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court, Greenwood county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Petition by Parmelia G. Bullock to have homestead set off to her in the real and personal estate of her husband. From an order confirming the report of commissioners setting off homestead in such estate, David M. Bullock, as executor and devisee under the will of deceased, appealed. Reversed.

Giles & Magill and Eugene W. Able, for appellant. W. K. Blake, for appellee.

GARY, A. J. The record contains the following statement of facts: "David C. Bullock died 2d day of May, 1898, seised and possessed in fee of a tract of land of 150 acres, more or less, in Cooper township, Greenwood county, whereon he lived, leaving surviving him his widow, Parmelia G. Bullock, and D. M. Bullock, Albert Bullock, Martha Parkman, and Mary Polatti, children of a former marriage, all adults, and none of whom lived on the premises. That the petitioner's mother lives with her on said premises. That said David C. Bullock left a will recorded in office of probate judge for Greenwood county, the provisions of which the petitioner refuses to accept. That no process has been lodged with any officer against the homestead. That the said Parmelia G. Bullock resides on the said premises with her mother. That D. M. Bullock was appointed under the said will executor of the same, and qualified as such on the 5th day of May, 1898." The first item of the said will provides for the payment of debts. In the second item the testator wills to the petitioner the homestead on which he resided, "so long as she may live." The third and fourth items are as follows: "(3) It is my wish and will that my son David Manly Bullock shall have free and undisturbed use of the entire balance of my real estate (except as to item 2) so long as my beloved wife, Parmelia G. Bullock, may live. (4) At the death of my beloved wife, Parmelia G. Bullock, it is my wish and will for my son David Manly Bullock to have the entire real estate I may own, and at his death to go to his children that may be living." The debts against the estate amounted to about $200. The circuit judge decided that the petitioner and the children of the testator were entitled to homestead. David M. Bullock appealed upon exceptions which will not be considered seriatim, as the practical question raised by them is whether there was error in so ruling.

It does not appear whether the debts were contracted prior or subsequent to the adoption of the constitution of 1895. If they were contracted before the constitution of 1895, the case of Beaty v. Richardson, 56 S. C. 173, 34 S. E. 73, shows that a devise by the testator would defeat the widow's right to claim homestead. If they were subsequently contracted, there are no provisions of the new constitution requiring a different construction. The present case is materially different from Ex parte Worley, 54 S. C. 208, 32 S. E. 307, as in that case the widow had an interest in the land, while in this case she has none. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

COOLEY et al. v. COOLEY et al.

WILLS—SETTING ASIDE DEVISES—LEGITIMACY—DISMISSING COMPLAINT.

1. Plaintiffs, the legitimate children of testator, sued to set aside certain devises to illegitimate children, and for an accounting by the executors. One of the plaintiffs, as administrator of his brother, had previously begun suit on a judgment against testator, and it was stipulated that the liability of the estate therefor should be determined in the present suit. The master to whom the matter was referred reported that the judgment had been paid by lapse of time. No exceptions were taken to the report. Held error to dismiss the complaint without granting defendants affirmative relief against this judgment.

2. Where, in an action to set aside certain devises in a will, the question turned on whether a certain child was legitimate or illegitimate, it was error for the master to whom the matter was referred to reject the direct and positive testimony of the child's mother and sisters merely because they were interested parties.

3. On the question whether a certain child was legitimate or illegitimate, four witnesses, including the child's mother and sisters, testified positively to its legitimacy, while plaintiffs produced only testimony of "rumors in the neighborhood," etc., to the contrary. Held, that the finding of the circuit judge that the evidence greatly preponderated in favor of the child's legitimacy was amply supported by the evidence.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by Lewis J. Cooley, Chantey A. King, Mary Hall, and W. C. Cooley against

John T. Cooley, Ella Alverson, Thomas O. Cooley, Esther Cothran, Sanford Cooley, Anna Prudence Cooley, Olliday Cooley, and Stacy Cooley to set aside certain devises contained in the will of J. J. Cooley, and to have an account against the executors. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

The following are the plaintiffs' exceptions and grounds of appeal:

"(1) His honor erred in reversing the report of the master upon the ground that the master erred in rejecting altogether the testimony of parties to the case and in relying upon the evidence of disinterested witnesses, and in holding in this connection that 'section 400 is express authority against rejecting a witness on account of interest, except in certain cases therein mentioned.' (a) It being respectfully submitted that no objection was raised to the competency of the testimony of said parties, and it was all admitted without objection, and 'no person offered as a witness' was 'excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action.' Code, § 400. (b) The law does not circumscribe or restrict the master in the exercise of his judgment in determining upon what witnesses he can rely, and, therefore, in the exercise of his discretion, in coming to his conclusion, he had the right to accept or reject any evidence in the case without committing error of law. (c) The court erred in confusing the exclusion of the witness because of interest, under section 400, and the disregarding of the evidence when admitted for any reason which might appeal to the judgment and common sense of the master. (d) Because it is evident from the mere reading of the master's report that he had used the word 'rejecting' in the sense of 'disregarding.'

"(2) His honor erred in holding that, 'It seems to me that the testimony of these witnesses was competent, and the master should not have rejected it.' (a) For it is here assumed that the master held said testimony to be incompetent, when in fact he did not do so, but admitted said testimony; there being no question made as to its competency, either before the master or before his honor, the presiding judge. (b) For the further reason that the master, when he came to weigh the testimony and form his conclusions, was free to follow his own best judgment as to what testimony should be rejected as lacking credibility, or he had the right to offset the testimony of one witness of equal credibility with that of another, thereby determining the weight of the evidence.

"(3) His honor erred in concluding 'that the master has based his conclusion as to the marriage of John and Stacy Cooley and the birth of Olliday upon irrelevant testimony, the same being hearsay,' for it is respectfully submitted: (a) That it nowhere appears that the said master considered any testimony in the case which was incompetent. (b) That John J. Cooley's admissions, which the circuit judge held were clearly hearsay, upon the ground that they were declarations of a person not a party to the action, and who had no interest in the subject-matter, and was at that time dead, were competent as against those claiming through or under him. (c) The most material fact in the case being as to the time when the said John J. Cooley was married to the defendant Stacy Cooley, it is respectfully submitted that the declarations of the said John J. Cooley in his liretime with reference thereto were competent, and fell within the class of exceptions as to the admissibility of hearsay evidence recognized by the authorities. (d) That the said testimony characterized as hearsay, and especially the testimony of numerous witnesses as to the admissions of John Cooley made after 1884, when defendants claim Olliday was born, to the effect that he and Stacy were not married, was admitted without objection, and therefore became competent, even if originally incompetent. See testimony of Judson King, John T. Chapman, David Jenkins, Jas. T. Campbell, Dr. Benson Harrison, Hewlett Chapman, and others.

"(4) His honor erred in holding that the testimony of Wm. Davenport, in so far as he refers to it, was incompetent and was not testimony on a question of pedigree, and, in this connection, in holding that common repute was only admissible in cases of pedigree.

"(5) His honor erred in concluding as follows: 'In view of the fact that the said John and Stacy Cooley were legally married and had one child in lawful wedlock, I think the testimony preponderates to establish the fact that Olliday was born illegitimate wedlock;' it being respectfully submitted: (a) That the testimony shows that one child born in lawful wedlock died in infancy. (b) That the clear preponderance of the testimony showed that Olliday was illegitimate. (c) That the testimony which the circuit judge, in coming to his conclusion, disregarded as incompetent, was either—First, competent under the rule of evidence; or, second, was admitted without objection, and therefore became competent for the purposes of this case, and, with that testimony in the case, the conclusions of the master were supported by the clear preponderance of the evidence. (d) Admitting that defendants' testimony that Olliday was born in 1884 is true, not only is there some evidence, but there is a preponderance of evidence, going to show that the marriage did not take place until after that time. (e) That, even admitting that the said Olliday Cooley was not illegitimate, the devise to the other defendants admitted to be illegitimate exceeded one-fourth of the real, clear value of the property of said John J. Cooley, and entitled the plaintiffs to some recovery; and the circuit judge erred, therefore, in dismissing the complaint.

"(6) His honor erred in not holding and adjudging that the findings of fact on the part of the master were based upon the clear preponderance of the testimony, that his conclusions of law were sound, and in therefore not sustaining the said report."

The following additional grounds of appeal were offered by defendants:

"(1) The master erred in finding that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the entire excess over one-fourth of the real, clear value of the estate of said John J. Cooley, deceased, real and personal, devised to said Anna Prudence Cooley, Sanford Cooley, and Olliday. He having found that said John J. Cooley and Stacy Cooley were married, he erred in not finding that she was entitled to one-third of such excess, and, not seeking to avoid said will or any part thereof, the recovery of plaintiffs should have been reduced by deducting one-third of such excess therefrom, and he erred in not so doing; and this exception having been duly taken to the said report of the master, and the circuit judge having failed to pass thereon (it being unnecessary, as he dismissed the complaint), the defendants (respondents) ask the supreme court to pass thereon and sustain this ground in case it shall find itself unable to sustain the decree of the circuit judge.

"(2) The master erred in holding that the plaintiff Chantey King was entitled to recover any part of said excess under the assignment to her from Hiram Cooley. He erred in not holding that the right to avoid the devise and bequest under said will to said illegitimate children, in so far as they exceed one-fourth of the real, clear value of his estate, was personal to the lawful wife and children of said John J. Cooley, and could not be assigned; and it being admitted that said John J. Cooley has five lawful children, and that only four of them are suing in this action, their recovery should have been limited to four-fifths of said excess, after deducting therefrom the one-third to which said Stacy Cooley, his wife, is entitled, and he erred in not so doing; and this exception having been duly taken to the said report of the master, and the circuit judge having failed to pass thereon (it being unnecessary, as he dismissed the complaint), the defendants ask the supreme court to pass thereon and sustain this ground in case it shall find itself unable to sustain the decree of the circuit judge.

"(3) The master having found that the said excess and interest is $314.61, he should have first deducted therefrom one-third thereof, to wit, $104.87, the share to which Stacy Cooley, the lawful wife, is entitled, thus leaving $209.74, and he should have deducted from this latter amount one-fifth thereof, the share of said Hiram Cooley, thus reducing the recovery of plaintiffs to $167.80, and he erred in not so doing; and this exception having been duly taken to said report of the master, and the circuit judge having failed to pass thereon (it being unnecessary, as he dismissed the complaint), the defendants (respondents) ask the supreme court to pass thereon and sustain this ground in case the court shall find itself unable to sustain the decree of the circuit judge.

"(4) The master erred in not holding said excess should be distributed, under the statute of distributions of intestate property, among the lawful wife and children of said John J. Cooley, and in the proportions prescribed by said statute, and that the plaintiffs could recover no greater proportion thereof than is prescribed by said statute if said excess were intestate property; and this exception having been duly taken to the report of said master, and the circuit judge having failed to pass thereon (it being unnecessary, as he dismissed the complaint), the defendants (respondents) ask the supreme court to pass thereon and sustain this ground in case the court shall find itself unable to sustain the decree of the circuit judge."

McCollough & Martin, for appellants.
Shuman & Dean, for respondents.

POPE, J. J. J. Cooley departed this life on the 13th day of December, 1896, leaving of force his last will and testament. Mr. Cooley's first wife died a short while before the war between the states, having borne him six children, viz. James, Hiram, Lewis, William C., Chantey King, and Mary Hall, all of whom are now alive, except James, who died in the year 1879. The said J. J. Cooley, several years after his first wife's death, became infatuated with Stacy Chastain, and so intimate were their relations that she bore him seven children, namely, John T. Cooley, Ella Alverson, Thomas O. Cooley, Esther Cothran, Sanford Cooley, Anna Prudence Cooley, and Olliday Cooley. All of these children were confessedly born out of the bonds of wedlock, except Olliday Cooley. The said J. J. Cooley provided for his putative children, John T. Cooley, Ella Averson, Thomas O. Cooley, and Esther Cothran, before his death. About the fall of the year 1883, it is alleged, the said John T. Cooley married the said Stacy Chastain, and she ever after lived with him as his dutiful wife; bearing him a daughter, Olliday, in June, 1884. The said John J. Cooley conveyed to his wife a tract of land, containing 35 acres of land, which she returned for taxation in the year 1884 in her newly-wedded name of Stacy Cooley. In the last will and testament of John J. Cooley he devised "unto his beloved wife, Stacy Cooley," his homestead lot of land, containing 40½ acres; unto his putative son Sanford Cooley a lot of land containing 31½ acres; unto his putative daughter Anna Prudence Cooley a lot of land containing 30½ acres; and "unto my youngest daughter, Olliday Cooley," a tract of land of 30¼ acres. After the death of J. J. Cooley his legitimate children by his first wife (the plaintiffs here) brought an action against the putative children to take from them the lands which had been conveyed to them by J. J. Cooley in his lifetime, but in the action the defendants triumphed over said plaintiffs. So this action now pending was brought by the four children named as plaintiffs (the said Chantey King having purchased all the estate of her brother Hiram Cooley, by which result it was not necessary to make Hiram a party, only suggesting the reason for his absence on the record, which was duly performed), against Stacy Cooley, John T. Cooley, Thomas O. Cooley, Sanford Cooley, Ella Alverson, Esther Cothran, Anna Prudence Cooley, and Olliday Cooley, to set aside the devises in the will named, and to have an account of the property of the estate by the executors; alleging as the ground to set aside the said devises that they were a larger or greater proportion of the real, clear value of J. J. Cooley's estate, real or personal, after payment of his debts, than one-fourth part thereof, and were therefore in violation of the statute law of this state, so far as the excess over the one-fourth part is concerned. The answer denied these things. It seems that, while the son James J. Cooley was alive, he was alleged to have had assigned to him some judgment or judgments against his father, J. J. Cooley, and that after the death of the said James J. Cooley his administrator, Lewis J. Cooley, as plaintiff, had brought an action against the executors of the last will of J. J. Cooley, deceased, to revive said judgment or judgments, and that the action was pending in the court of common pleas against said executors during the year 1899. So that about July, 1899, the following agreement in writing was entered into touching said pending lawsuit: "Counsel agree that the question of the liability of the estate of J. J. Cooley, deceased, and the devisees under his will, upon the judgment sued on in the case of Lewis J. Cooley, as administrator, v. John T. Cooley et al., as executors, be determined in this action, all the necessary parties being before the court, and that the said case on Cal. 1, common pleas docket, be discontinued, and that the devisees and legatees be permitted to adopt the answer of the executors in that case, in so far as it is applicable to their interests, as of this date. Case continued." The case at bar was referred to the master of Greenville county to hear and determine all the issues involved. By his report he found as a fact that J. J. Cooley and Stacy Chastain were married, but not until after the birth of the defendant Olliday Cooley, thus making all the children borne by Stacy Chastain to J. J. Cooley born out of wedlock; also, that the net clear estate, real or personal, of J. J. Cooley, deceased, amounted to $1,993, and that one-fourth thereof was $498.25; also, that the devise to Anna Prudence Cooley was worth $213.50, that to Sanford Cooley was worth $252, and that to Olliday Cooley was worth $300, aggregating $765.50, which would be $267.25 more than the one-fourth clear value of the estate of J. J. Cooley, deceased, and that by adding interest from the 13th December, 1896, to the date of the report, the $267.25 would amount to $314.61, for which last amount plaintiffs were entitled to judgment against the three devisees, Anna, Sanford, and Olliday Cooley. The master also found that the judgment sued on in the case of Lewis J. Cooley, as administrator, against John T. Cooley et al., executors, is paid by lapse of time, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover anything thereon. There were no exceptions taken to the finding by the master that J. J. Cooley had married Stacy Chastain; that the net value of J. J. Cooley's estate was $1,993; that the devises to Anna, Sanford, and Olliday Cooley aggregated $765.50, of which Olliday's devise was worth $300; and that the judgment sued on in the case of Lewis J. Cooley, as administrator, against John T. Cooley et al., as executors, had been paid by lapse of time, and that plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything thereon. But exceptions were taken to the finding by the master of the illegitimacy of Olliday Cooley. When the circuit judge passed upon this exception, he found that the master was in error as to his finding touching the bastardy of Olliday Cooley; holding that the marriage of J. J. Cooley and Stacy Chastain took place in the fall of the year 1883, and that Olliday Cooley, as the issue of that marriage, was born in June, 1884. The circuit judge ordered the complaint to be dismissed. From this decree the plaintiffs have appealed. The reporter will set out in the report of the case the grounds of appeal.

We may remark at the outset that we think that the circuit judge erred in dismissing the complaint; for it seems to us that the action ought to be retained, in order that the circuit judge may formulate a decree giving affirmative relief to the defendants against the judgment sued on by Lewis Cooley as administrator, which the master found was paid, and from which finding by the master no exception was taken.

It remains for us to consider plaintiffs' exceptions touching the alleged error of the circuit judge in holding Olliday Cooley a legitimate daughter of J. J. Cooley. It is apparent that, if Olliday Cooley is held to be a legitimate daughter of J. J. Cooley, the devises to Anna Prudence and Sanford Cooley are not null and void under the statute law of our state (section 1999, Rev. St.; and cases of Bradley v. Lowery, 1 Speer, Eq. 188; Massey v. Wallace, 32 S. C. 154, 10 S. E. 937; and Gore v. Clark, 37 S. C. 537, 16 S. E. 614, 20 L. R. A. 465); for the whole net estate being only $1,993, of which $498.25 is the one-fourth part, and as the devises to Anna Prudence Cooley and Sanford Cooley amounted to $465.50, not the one-fourth part of the net estate of J. J. Cooley, deceased, was received by them.

In disposing of the questions raised by the appellants, we will not undertake to dispose of them seriatim, but in the views we may suggest a full and complete consideration of each exception is involved. Although the master found as a fact that J. J. Cooley and Stacy Chastain were husband and wife, he does not state, as a fact, the date of their marriage. It seems to us that, if there was sufficient testimony before the master for him to determine that J. J. Cooley and Stacy Chastain were husband and wife, there ought to have been found sufficient testimony to determine when the marriage itself was solemnized. Certain it is that there were four witnesses who testified that they were present and witnessed the marriage ceremony performed by Rev. Mr. Tribble while he was pastor at Washington Church, and these witnesses say this occurred in the fall of 1883. That very intelligent witness for the plaintiffs, John T. Chapman, testified that in the fall of 1882, and up to the spring of 1883, he knew that the parties were not married, although they occupied a compromising attitude to each other. This witness threatened to report these parties, for the way in which they lived. Mrs. Stacy Cooley, as she afterwards became, was living at the time spoken of by the witness Mr. Chapman in what was known as the "Pat Henry House," and not in the homestead of J. J. Cooley. This is exactly what all the defendants testify. None of them speak of Stacy occupying the homestead, or J. J. Cooley dwelling house, until about the time the marriage occurred. Witnesses for the plaintiff, when they speak of the marriage of Stacy Chastain to J. J. Cooley, speak of "rumors in the neighborhood," "it was the understanding of the family that they were not married," or "it was the understanding of the family that Olliday Cooley was born in the Pat Henry house." Such testimony as this, when contrasted with the direct, explicit, circumstantial, and natural testimony of Stacy Cooley, John T. Cooley, G. W. Vincent, and W. T. Bruce that this marriage occurred in the fall of 1883, in the family dwelling house of John J. Cooley, will not stand for a moment. And so, too, as to the birth of Olliday Cooley. Several of the defendants' witnesses swear that she was born in the month of June, 1884. Nearly all of the witnesses who spoke of Olliday's age said she was 14 or 15 years in 1899. If she was born in 1884, in June, she would have been 15 years of age when the testimony was given. If she was only 14 years old, she must have been born in 1885. When the witnesses speak from actual knowledge, the birth is alleged to have occurred in June, 1884. When, however, "the understanding in the family" or rumor is relied upon, it is quite easy to understand how the date is made to vary. We are not sure but that the very best antidote against reliance upon these "family understandings" and "local rumors," in establishing the date of the marriage or the date of a birth, when contrasted with direct testimony, would be furnished by the testimony in the cause. We are, like the circuit judge, unable to feel a doubt in this matter so far as this testimony is concerned.

So far as the first exception is concerned, it seems to us that it makes no difference whether we ascribe error to the master in using the language that he found the clear preponderance of the testimony in favor of the contention of the plaintiffs that Olliday Cooley was born out of lawful wedlock, "rejecting altogether the testimony of disinterested witnesses"; for an examination of the testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiffs shows that it was made up of "hearsay" in part, "rumor" in part, and "family understandings" in part, while the testimony of the defendants was direct and positive. Still we must hold that the master had no right to disregard testimony simply because such testimony was given by parties to the cause. It is only in certain enumerated classes of cases that testimony of this nature becomes incompetent. In the case at bar it was competent. The appellants are in error in stating in subdivision "a," under the first ground of appeal, that no objection was offered by the defendants to the introduction of at least some of this testimony. So far as "b" is concerned, the law does not restrict the master in the exercise of his judgment in determining upon what testimony he can rely; but the law, in its wisdom, does lay its hand upon a master who confessedly rejects direct testimony to facts merely because the witnesses who detail such testimony happen to have some interest in the event of the suit. The foregoing disposes of "c" and "d."

So far as the second ground of appeal is concerned, it does appear, as found by the circuit judge, that the testimony of Mrs. Stacy Cooley, John T. Cooley, and others, was competent, and the master should not have rejected it. This testimony should have been placed in the scales when the master was determining the preponderance of the testimony. The number of the witnesses is not of the essence of belief, for one or two reliable witnesses may outweigh the doubtful testimony of a dozen witnesses. This ground of appeal is dismissed.

So far as the third ground of appeal is concerned, as we before remarked, there is no necessity to consider it, as it is rendered unavailing because of the superior weight of the direct testimony of defendants, and, even if admitted, could exercise no force,—certainly to overcome the positive and direct testimony of the defendants. This ground of appeal is dismissed.

So far as the fourth, fifth, and sixth grounds of appeal are concerned, they become mere abstractions, in the light of our holding as to the force and effect of the direct and positive testimony of the defendants. They are overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court should be so modified that the action shall be retained in order that the circuit court may formulate a judgment giving the defendants affirmative relief against the judgment sued upon by Lewis J. Cooley as administrator, but that so much of said circuit judgment as denies the plaintiffs any claim against the defendants growing out of the devises in the will of J. J. Cooley, deceased, be affirmed.

Ex parte MURDAUGH.

MAYFIELD v. MURDAUGH.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 20, 1900.)

EQUITY—SALE OF PROPERTY—AMENDMENT TO DECREE—PAYMENT OF PROCEEDS—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

Where petitioner was owner of one-sixth interest in land which had been ordered sold under a decree in a suit to which he was not a party, and after the order of the sale the decree was amended by ordering one-sixth of the proceeds to be paid to petitioner, but the amendment was not placed on the file books or common pleas journal in the county clerk's office, or called to the attention of the master until five months after he had paid out the proceeds of the sale to the parties entitled thereto under the original decree, the master was liable to petitioner for one-sixth of the proceeds.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Barnwell county; W. C. Benet, Judge.

Action by S. G. Mayfield against N. P. Murdaugh. From an order dismissing the petition of J. A. Murdaugh, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Izlar Bros., for appellant. Robert Aldrich, for appellee Patterson.

POPE, J. In the action of Mayfield against Murdaugh, Judge Benet passed a decree on the 1st day of August, 1896, providing for the sale of a tract of land in Barnwell county, S. C., and that the master of that court, A. Howard Patterson, Esq., should make such sale, and pay out the proceeds thereof to certain parties named in the decree; but on the 5th day of August, 1896, Judge Benet, on the petition of J. A. Murdaugh, who was the owner of one-sixth part of the tract of land, and who, through some mistake, had not been made a party to the action of Mayfield against Murdaugh, amended his decree so as to allow the petitioner, J. A. Murdaugh, his one-sixth part of the proceeds of sale of the tract of land. This amended decree was marked "Filed" by the deputy clerk in the office of the clerk of common pleas for Barnwell county, and was thereafter placed in the record of the case of Mayfield against Murdaugh, but no reference thereto appears on the file book and common pleas journal in the clerk's office of the court of common pleas for Barnwell county, and was never called directly to the attention of A. Howard Patterson, Esq., as master of Barnwell county, until after the sale by him, and the payment by him of the proceeds of such sale to the parties entitled thereto under the original decree of Judge Benet of August 1, 1896. The share of the petitioner, J. A. Murdaugh, in the proceeds of sales was $140.43. Under this state of facts J. A. Murdaugh applied to Mr. Patterson as master to pay him $140.43, but to this Mr. Patterson insisted that the money had been paid away, and without any fault of his, and also that said master offered to assist J. A. Murdaugh in any way he could to recover from the parties to whom this money had been paid this $140.43. The result was that J. A. Murdaugh, by petition setting out all the facts, prayed the court to issue a rule against Mr. Patterson as master requiring him to show cause why he does not pay this $140.43 to J. A. Murdaugh. Judge Benet issued this rule, and Mr. Patterson, as master, made his return, by which, among other things, he said he did not know of the amended decree until about five months after he had paid out the money; that the payment made by him as master exhausted all the funds in his hands; that the petitioner had no right to demand payment of him, the master. Judge Benet heard the return, and after a little while he dismissed the petition, discharging the rule. The petitioner, J. A. Murdaugh, now appeals to this court.

The third exception cannot be sustained, because there is nothing in the order of Judge Benet, on the case for appeal, which suggests that Judge Benet held that proceedings by petition and order to show cause were not the proper proceedings to collect whatever funds the master ought to have had belonging to J. A. Murdaugh under his own decree.

We will next consider the first and second exceptions together. They are as follows: "(1) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding the return of the master and ordering the rule discharged, when the uncontradicted facts show that he paid out the money in his hands, belonging to the petitioner, in violation of the order of the court. (2) That his honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in not holding the return of the master insufficient, and in not ordering the master to pay over to the petitioner the terms of the supplemental order. (3) That his honor erred in holding that the proceedings by petition and order to show cause were not the proper proceedings to collect the said funds from the master." It cannot be denied that, under the statements contained in the "case for appeal" in the case at bar, J. A. Murdaugh, under the decree pronounced in the case of Mayfield against N. P. Murdaugh, was entitled to $140.43 of the proceeds arising from the sale of land made in pursuance of that decree, and that by law A. Howard Patterson, Esq., as master of Barnwell county, was the legal holder of said funds until the parties entitled thereto under said decree should receive the same from him. It is equally certain that J. A. Murdaugh has not received one cent of such portion to which he was entitled. Until that money is paid, against whom has J. A. Murdaugh a cause of action? Certainly not against persons to whom Mr. Patterson has paid J. A. Murdaugh's money. There is no ligament connecting them. No. It is against the master that the petitioner, J. A. Murdaugh, has his action. The master has his action against all the parties to whom he has accidentally paid J. A. Murdaugh's money. This being our view, we are obliged to sustain these exceptions. The motion to dismiss the appeal in this was heard along with the case, and was dismissed for the reasons orally stated at the hearing. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment, or, rather, the order, of the circuit court here appealed from be reversed, and that the action be remanded to the circuit court, and that an order may be made directing A. Howard Patterson to pay to the petitioner, J. A. Murdaugh, the sum of $140.76.

CITY NAT. BANK OF GREENVILLE v. COBB et ux.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—LAND OF WIFE—MATERIALS TO ENLARGE HOME—JUDGMENT AGAINST HUSBAND.

Husband and wife lived on land belonging to the wife, her title being of record for many years. Husband bought material to enlarge their house from the contractor for whom he worked, agreeing to pay for the same out of his wages. The evidence was conflicting as to whether the contractor had actual notice of the wife's ownership. The husband had no property when he bought the lumber, nor when the action was brought, but gave his note for the material, making payments from wages earned, and renewing from time to time. The contractor failed, the note being then in the hands of plaintiff, a bona fide purchaser, who took judgment against the husband on the note. The evidence showed that the wife knew that the lumber came from the contractor, and that it was not paid for, but had steadily refused to place a mortgage on the land, and that she did nothing to mislead the contractor into making the arrangement with her husband. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to have the wife's land subjected to the payment of their judgment against the husband.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by the City National Bank of Greenville against Abner Cobb and Mrs. S. H. M. Cobb, his wife, seeking to have land of Mrs. Cobb subjected to the lien of judgments in favor of the plaintiff against Abner Cobb. From a decree entered in favor of defendants on a master's report, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Haynsworth, Parker & Patterson, for appellant. Shuman & Dean, for respondents.

POPE, J. Abner Cobb, while in the employ of Osborn Cagle (who was a contractor), was approached by Cagle with a proposition to advance him the material to enlarge the dwelling he occupied, being of two rooms, by adding four other rooms thereto. Cobb assented to the proposition, agreeing to pay money when he could, and pay from his wages when he could. Abner's co-defendant, Mrs. S. H. M. Cobb, is his wife, and the mother of 11 children. She owns the land on which the house in which they reside is located. Her deed was dated in the year 1875, and recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyances in the year 1876. Her parents had lived on the land before it was conveyed to Mrs. Cobb by her mother. Abner Cobb paid, in money and work, to Osborn Cagle, the sum of $275, in part payment of the sum of $500, which was the amount of the account between Abner Cobb and Osborn Cagle for the building material. Some time in 1898, Osborn Cagle induced Abner Cobb to give him his note at 90 days for the balance still due, to wit, $278.20, interest, etc. This note was transferred, for value, before maturity, to the plaintiff, the City National Bank of Greenville. Not being paid at maturity, the plaintiff bank recovered judgment thereon against Abner Cobb; but, such judgment not having been paid, and Abner Cobb being insolvent in property, the City National Bank of Greenville has brought this action against the said Abner Cobb and his wife, Mrs. S. H. M. Cobb, as defendants, wherein, among other things, it recites the transactions of Cagle and Abner Cobb, but insists that Abner Cobb was insolvent when he made the arrangement with Osborn Cagle, who thought that he (Abner Cobb) held title to the one acre of land whereon the improved dwelling house was located, and, besides, that Mrs. Cobb knew of these things; wherefore the bank prayed that it might have judgment against Mrs. Cobb on the note, and also might have the land sold if she failed to pay the note. It should have been stated that it was alleged and proved that the property had been improved by the enlarged building at least to the sum of $400. Both the defendants answered, denying anything in the complaint which would lead to the relief plaintiff sought, alleging that Mrs. Cobb's title had been of record for 25 years before these transactions (of which fact Osborn Cagle was well acquainted), and that he had been informed by Abner Cobb at the time of the agreement that Mrs. Cobb declined to have any mortgage upon her property for this purpose, etc. The issues were referred to Master Verner and he reported squarely against the plaintiff. Upon exceptions to the master's report, and on all the testimony and pleadings, the cause came on to be heard before his honor, Judge Gage, who also decreed in favor of the defendants. This decree is so clear and convincing that it should be set out herein, and it is as follows:

"Decree: This is an action to subject the real estate of the defendant Mrs. S. H. M. Cobb to the payment of a judgment in favor of plaintiff against the defendant Abner Cobb. The cause was referred to the master, and his report and the testimony are in. The master found for the defendants, and the plaintiff excepts thereto upon fourteen grounds. Of these, eight grounds charge error of fact, five charge error of law, and one ground charges error of law and fact. These facts are uncontested, to wit: Mrs. Cobb got the land by deed from her mother in 1875, and the deed was recorded in 1876. The husband and wife have lived on the land about twenty years, and have reared a large family there. Cagle was a contractor and builder, and Cobb was a carpenter and foreman in his employ. During the latter months of 1896 and the first months of 1897, Cagle sold and delivered to the husband building material of the value of about five hundred dollars. Mrs. Cobb 'knew that lumber was [carried to her lot] from Cagle's, and that it had not been paid for.' The lumber and material were constructed into a house on the said land, and such house stands in the front of, but is joined to, and is now parcel of, a small two-room dwelling in which the family had hitherto lived. As much as forty dollars was turned over to the husband by the wife, and was paid by the husband to Cagle, at or before the delivery of the first lumber, and thereafter the husband paid Cagle in small amounts as much as two hundred and thirty-five dollars more. That the judgment of plaintiff is upon a note executed by the husband to Cagle for the unpaid balance due for said lumber and material, transferred by Cagle to plaintiff and by plaintiff sued to judgment. Cagle told the husband 'he could use the note.' 'The lumber and material put in the house have increased the value of the premises four hundred dollars.' The husband had no property when the contract for lumber was made, and he has none now. The house is located on a small parcel or lot of land containing one acre, more or less, in or near the corporate limits of the city of Greenville, and is now the residence of the husband and wife and a large family of children. The master has made some findings of fact which are not sustained by the testimony, to wit: 'It is agreed * * * that Abner Cobb should pay for [the material] by continuing to work for said Cagle as foreman carpenter, and pay from his wages from $5 to $10 and $15 per month.' The testimony of Cobb is this: 'He said he would furnish the material, and I could pay him $5 to $10 or $15 per month.' Again, 'I pay along on the lumber every Saturday night when I worked.' Again, 'I did not continue to work and pay the amount because Cagle failed, and could not get any further.' The testimony of Cagle is this: 'He [Cobb] was to pay in work when he could and in money when he could.' It nowhere appears from Cobb's testimony that Cagle agreed to look exclusively to one source for payment, or that Cobb insisted on that. No such contract between them has been proved. On the other hand, it is not manifest that when the contract was made and the credit given to Abner, Cagle looked to and relied exclusively on Abner's ownership of the property. The categorical question was put to him: 'Had you known the title to be in any one other than himself, would you have given him this credit?' The answer is not correspondent to the question. The testimony of Abner and Cagle is somewhat conflicting. Abner testifies he told Cagle 'the land belonged to my wife.' Cagle testifies, 'Abner always spoke of the property as his place,' and 'he never did tell me that his wife owned the property.' The testimony of Abner Cobb's son, W. T. Cobb, is to the same effect as his father's. The burden is, by the pleadings, on the defendants, to prove that Cagle had knowledge of the fact. Abner Cobb returned the property in his own name, and paid the taxes on it. He was the owner of no other property. In the light of all the circumstances I am of the opinion that Cagle did not have actual knowledge of the fact of the ownership by the wife, but I think he relied primarily for payment from sources available to Abner Cobb, and it is likely he looked in the last event to the property for payment. But how does this avail him if he had constructive notice from a record of the deed? Had he loaned Abner $500, and taken a mortgage on the land from him, what would have been his plight? His present position is no better in the aspect now under consideration. The matter would be seriously changed if the testimony tended to show that Mrs. Cobb connived at what was done, but I am satisfied she is without moral wrong in the matter. She did nothing to mislead Cagle. The most serious question involved is this: If Cagle in good faith added $400 to the value of the property, for which he has not been paid, and which Mrs. Cobb permitted, and which she enjoys, ought not her property to pay therefor? On the other hand, it may be asked: Ought a creditor to be granted relief which may seriously affect the interests of a person who has taken no active steps to bring about a status, and when diligent inquiry could have protected him from loss? The small two-room house was turned around; the four-room house was built to and in front of it; the whole occupies one acre of land, and is inhabited by the family; the new cannot be severed from the old, and leave matters as they were before; and a part of the new has been paid for. It is a case where equity even is powerless to do, under the forms of the law, with a sword, what a Hebrew mother volunteered to do. My judgment is, the complaint must be dismissed, and it is so ordered. G. W. Gage, Circuit Judge."

From this decree of Judge Gage the plaintiff now appeals on six grounds, to wit: "(1) The judge erred in holding that the house built by Abner Cobb out of the lumber purchased from Cagle could not be severed from the old house; whereas the testimony shows that they were not connected together. (2) He erred in holding that equity is powerless to grant relief to the plaintiff in the present case; whereas he should have held that the land of Mrs. S. H. M. Cobb was liable to the plaintiff's debt to the extent that it had been enhanced in value by the erection of the improvements made with the lumber purchased from Cagle. (3) He erred in holding that the plaintiff was in no better position than if Cagle had taken a note and mortgage for the lumber sold Abner Cobb. (4) He erred in not holding that the use by Abner Cobb of the material purchased from Cagle to erect a dwelling house on his wife's land was, in effect, a gift to her of property which was liable in his hands to the payment of plaintiff's debt, and that, Cobb being insolvent, the plaintiff was entitled to subject this property or building in the erection of which it was used to the payment of its debt. (5) The circuit judge should have held that, where an insolvent debtor employs property which would be liable in his own hands to the payment of his debts in the erection of buildings upon his wife's land, the creditors are entitled to relief as against the wife to the extent that the said lands have been enhanced in value by reason of said improvements, and that the court in such case should either direct the land to be sold, and out of the proceeds the debt to the extent of this enhanced value be paid, or else that the improvements should themselves be sold, and the proceeds of sale be applied to the payment of said debt. (6) He erred in not holding that the lumber which Cobb purchased of Cagle would have been liable in his hands to the payment of the debt, and that this having been used by him in erecting a building on his wife's land, and he being insolvent, the plaintiff was entitled to subject the said land to the payment of its debt to the extend that the said land had been enhanced in value."

The first exception is as to the fact found by the circuit judge that the old two-room house was now connected with the new four-room house. This depends on what effect the testimony has on the mind. It impresses us, as it has the circuit judge, but it is of no great moment, one way or the other. The exception is overruled.

The next five exceptions, in one form or the other, appeal to the conscience of the court in upholding the great principles of equity. We find as a fact that the title to this lot of land is in the defendant Mrs. Cobb alone, was placed upon the records of the county for 21 years before the agreement between Osborn Cagle and the defendant Abner Cobb was made, and, therefore, that the said Osborn Cagle was bound to take notice of this as a fact. Besides, three witnesses testify that he was told of the title being in Mrs. Cobb at the time of the agreement. We find as a fact that Mrs. Cobb was free from any fraudulent collusion with her husband, if any such thing as fraud existed in the heart of any one connected with this whole affair, which we do not admit. We find as a fact that, although her land was heightened in value, no blame or responsibility can attach to Mrs. Cobb therefor. We find as law that the husband is allowed to work honestly for his wife in the state of South Carolina without incurring any blame in the eyes of the law or in equity, and thereby make a gift to her of his labor. We cannot agree that law or equity will view with approval any endangering of the wife's estate, when she acted with perfect bona fides, as she did in these transactions, by anything the husband did, especially as the person with whom the husband dealt had perfect knowledge, in law, at least, of her title to the land and of the insolvency of the husband. All the exceptions must be overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

MILAM v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 16, 1900.)

CARRIERS — INJURY TO HORSES — VALUE — PROOF—WITNESS—COMPETENCY — EVIDENCE —NONSUIT—REQUEST FOR INSTRUCTION—NECESSITY—CONNECTING LINES—PRESUMPTION OF LAW—QUESTION FOR JURY—LIABILITY OF CARRIER—DUTY TO FEED STOCK.

1. A keeper of a livery and sale stable, who had examined horses before shipment, may testify as to whether he sold them for less than their value because of injuries sustained in shipment.

2. An agent of a connecting line, who had collected bills for defendant railway company for feeding plaintiff's horses during shipment, may testify as to such bills, in an action for damages for improper care and injury to them while on defendant's line.

3. Where, on plaintiff's examination, defendant was allowed to introduce a contract for a pass, signed by plaintiff, which was on the back of a waybill for shipment of plaintiff's stock, the refusal to allow defendant to offer the waybill itself in evidence before it had been proven, for the purpose of moving for a nonsuit, was proper.

4. Where, in an action for damages to horses in shipment, there was evidence that they appeared lean and gaunt on arrival, and several of them died a few days after, and defendant had fed them every 28 hours during shipment and rested them 5 hours after each feeding, a motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled, since the question of their improper care was for the jury.

5. Where there was no evidence that horses shipped by plaintiff on defendant's road were unruly, an instruction that defendant was not liable for any injury occasioned during their shipment, caused by their unruly disposition, was properly refused.

6. No error can be based on the failure of the trial court to give an instruction, where no request for such an instruction was made.

7. Where horses transported by successive carriers were injured in shipment, and the court charged that, before plaintiff can recover of the defendant line, the jury must be satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence that they were injured while in defendant's possession, the objection that the court made the defendant an insurer beyond its own line was not well taken.

8. Where horses shipped over several connecting lines were injured in shipment, an instruction that, if they were shipped under special contract, plaintiff could not recover by proving that they were in good condition when loaded or at any intermediate point, and not in good condition when received, but must also show that such injury did not arise from their unruly disposition, or weakness from their long journey, or from the crowded condition of the car, or from concussion incident to running a freight train, was not objectionable as placing too great a liability on defendant.

9. Where horses shipped over several connecting lines were injured, an instruction that where horses were transported by successive carriers, and the proof only shows that they were in good condition when received, and damaged when they reached their destination, the law presumes that such damages were caused while they were in the hands of the last railway company, was properly refused.

10. Where horses were injured in shipment over several connecting lines of railway, an instruction that the question on which line of railway the injury occurred was for the jury, and that if shipped under special contract defendant was not liable unless they were injured while in its possession and because of its negligence, was proper.

11. Where horses were injured in shipment, an instruction that, if the shipper failed to feed and rest them during shipment according to his contract, he could not recover, was properly refused, since, if the shipper failed to feed and rest them, it was the duty of the railroad company to do so, and charge the expenses to the shipper.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Newberry county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by Robert R. Milam against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

B. L. Abney and Duncan & Sanders, for appellant. Johnstone & Welch, for respondent.

POPE, J. The plaintiff, by his action, sought to recover $1,000 damages by reason of the injuries sustained by a lot of 24 horses which were transported by the defendant from Birmingham, Ala., to Newberry, in the state of South Carolina. Plaintiff, in his complaint, set up three causes of action: One was based upon the common-law doctrine that the defendant was an insurer of the freight received by it as a common carrier; the second charged the same facts as were set forth in the first cause of action, except that the defendant was charged with negligence by which injuries to the 24 head of horses resulted; and the third charged wanton negligence. By the answer of the defendant, it admitted that it was a common carrier, but denied all other allegations of the complaint; alleging, in addition thereto, that the plaintiff was responsible for all injuries which resulted to his car load of horses from a failure to feed, water, and rest them as was required by law; that any injuries done the said car load of horses happened upon some other line of railway, in their transportation to Clinton, S. C., than on the defendant railway. The cause came on for trial before Judge Watts and a jury. During said trial the defendant objected to certain testimony offered by plaintiff. Also, it made two motions for nonsuit, both of which were overruled. Also, it made certain requests to charge, which were declined by the circuit judge. Verdict was for plaintiff in the sum of $300. After judgment thereon, defendant appealed upon the grounds previously indicated, and also upon the ground that the circuit judge erred in some of his charges to the jury.

The first ground of appeal suggests error in the circuit judge in allowing the plaintiff to testify in answer to the questions: "From your experience as a horse dealer, and from your knowledge of the valuation of horses, did you, or did you not, sell your horses at a price less than their real value by reason of these injuries?" "Did you, by reason of these injuries, sell your horses for less than they were worth?" The testimony offered here showed that these 24 horses, when taken from the car in which they had been transported from the city of Birmingham, in the state of Alabama, to the village of Clinton, in the state of South Carolina, were scarred, bruised, gaunt, stiff in limbs, with high fever, and that two were down on the floor in the car, and had to be struck with a whip to get them up, and that the day after arrival a handsome gray died, having passed blood before death, and a little later than the next day after arrival two other of the horses died. But, soon after arrival,—in a few days,—plaintiff sold some of the horses. The plaintiff was the owner and keeper of a livery and sales stable. Hence the circuit judge allowed him to answer these questions. Before going further, it should be stated that the plaintiff had inspected the horses when he bought them. Therefore he knew how they looked at the date of shipment, how they looked on their arrival at Clinton, and how they looked several days thereafter, when he sold them. We cannot see anything speculative in the testimony in question. It was based upon facts within the knowledge of this witness. In 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 477, the doctrine is thus stated: "Farmers, dealers in horses, and liverymen, who know the value of horses generally, may testify thereto." See, also, page 460, Id., which says: "On damages, as on other subjects of expert-opinion evidence, the opinions of witnesses must not be speculative or conjectural, but must be based on facts and conditions existing and proved." Who is there who has not been astonished at the accuracy of dealers in stock and hogs in their estimate of the weight of each one of them? It is this accuracy of judgment, derived from the experience of dealers in stock, which gives their opinions as to the value of horses, mules, etc., such great weight. This exception is overruled.

Again, appellant suggests that the circuit judge erred when he allowed Mr. Horton, as the agent of the Newberry & Laurens Railroad, which railroad had received the car load of horses from the defendant at Newberry, to testify as to the three waybills on which he had receipted for the charges of the defendant itself for feeding the horses at Birmingham, Atlanta, Ga., and Hodges Depot, S. C. We believe the defendant withdrew this exception. But, in the abundance of caution, we pass on it; and in doing so we remark that the service of Mr. Horton in collecting these bills entered as waybills was as the quasi agent of said defendant in its collection of charges from the plaintiff, which service of Mr. Horton the defendant has ratified. This exception is overruled.

In its second exception the defendant suggests that the circuit judge erred in not allowing it to introduce in evidence, while one of the plaintiff's witnesses was being examined, and before the defendant introduced any testimony, a bill of lading, after the plaintiff had admitted that he had signed some writing on the back of said bill of lading. When Mr. Milam, the plaintiff, was on the witness stand, the defendant asked him, on cross-examination, if he had not signed such a paper, a copy of which was exhibited to him. The witness replied that he did not know whether he had signed such a paper or not, but he said he would know his signature when he saw it. It was at this point when defendant's counsel proposed to open the commission it had issued to examine some witnesses at Kansas City, state of Missouri; claiming that the original papers, which had been signed by Mr. Milam, and a copy of which he had exhibited to Mr. Milam, would be found attached to the bill of lading. After a while the court allowed the package containing the depositions of witnesses taken in Missouri to be opened, and the papers referred to taken out, while Mr. Milam, as plaintiff's witness, was on the stand; and the counsel for defendant then exhibited the paper, of which the following is a copy, signed by Mr. Milam, to wit:

"Form 45. Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis R. R. Live-Stock Contract. Duplicate. Station, Kansas City. Date, Oct. 28, 1896. In consideration of the free transportation granted us by Kansas City, Fort Scott & Memphis Railroad Company, to accompany the live stock described in the within contract, on its road, and to return therefrom, and of the agreements contained in said contract to be performed by said railroad company, we, the persons in charge of said live stock, agree to be bound by all the terms and conditions of said contract which refer to the persons in charge of said live stock, especially those in regard to how and where we shall ride, and the risks we assume, contained in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh paragraphs thereof; and, for the same consideration, we further agree that while attending to said live stock, as provided in the third paragraph thereof, we shall be deemed employés of the railroad company, of the rank of brakemen, for the purpose of determining its liability to us, and we assume all risks incident to such employment. R. R. Milam.

"Pass, on freight trains only, R. R. Milam. F. D. Leeds, Agent."

When the witness was shown his signature to the paper copied above, he promptly admitted that it was his signature, and that the free pass to the city of Birmingham, Ala., was given to him. But the witness said that he did not read the paper he had signed, but that he was told, "Sign this, to get your pass." This he signed at Kansas City, Mo. But he swore that he knew nothing of a contract such as the bill of lading; that he never signed it, nor did he authorize any one to sign the same in his name or as his agent. So, when the attorney for the defendant asked the court to admit it in evidence just then, the court declined to do so. This paper, known as a "bill of lading," was subsequently introduced by the defendant, after (by commission) it had examined the railroad authorities and Tough & Son, at Kansas City, Mo. The reason that defendant was so eager to have the paper introduced while plaintiff's witness was on the stand was to enable it to move for a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's testimony. The circuit judge refused to admit the bill of lading at that time. While the paper admitted by Mr. Milam to have been signed by him was admitted, and this was on the back of the bill of lading itself, this did not entitle the bill of lading itself to be admitted. The bill of lading was not yet proved, if ever it was. So there was no error on the part of the circuit judge. Under Wallingford v. Railroad Co., 26 S. C. 258, 2 S. E. 19, the defendant would have failed to have this bill of lading considered as the basis of a nonsuit, it being admitted while plaintiff's witness was on the stand. This exception is overruled, and we see no harm to the defendant, especially as the defendant had the benefit of the admission of this bill of lading afterwards.

The appellant next alleged error in the refusal of the circuit judge to grant a nonsuit:

"Third. In not granting the motion of the defendant for a nonsuit on the grounds: (1) That as the defendant had delivered the car containing the horses of the plaintiff to the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company, which road had delivered them to the plaintiff at Laurens, the presumption was that any injury that may have occurred to them occurred on the line of the last-named road; (2) because there was no sufficient evidence to go to the jury of any injury done the horses of the defendant while they were in defendant's charge; (3) because there was a total failure of evidence to sustain the allegations of the complaint." (a) The rule of law granting nonsuits is too firmly established by the decisions of the court of last resort in this state to need a restatement, and yet the question is again raised, and we must pass upon it. Whenever the plaintiff fails to introduce any competent testimony to support the material allegations of his complaint which set up his cause or causes of action against the defendant, the circuit judge is authorized to grant a nonsuit. Was it the circuit judge's duty to nonsuit on a presumption of fact, if any other facts were in testimony? We do not think so, for it is the place of the jury, and not that of the judge, to weigh testimony. (b) The testimony of all the witnesses who spoke of the appearance of the horses on their arrival at Clinton, S. C., was emphatic as to the leanness, the lankness, and the gauntness of the horses. There was testimony that the defendant had complied with the law, in having fed the horses every 28 hours, and rested them for 5 hours after they were fed and watered. But it was no part of the duty of the circuit judge to weigh this testimony. That was the province of the jury. After an examination of the testimony, we cannot agree with the appellant that there was a total lack of testimony. These exceptions are all overruled.

"Fifth. In charging: 'Now I charge you that if the defendant railroad, here, received the stock as a common carrier, then they become insurers. Whenever a railroad gets a charter and becomes a common carrier for the purpose of transporting freight and passengers, and such matter as that, when they receive any freight as a common carrier they become insurers of the freight, and they thereby agree to deliver in good condition to the parties that it is consigned to. If the railroad here received this property of Milam in Birmingham, Alabama, as common carriers, then they became insurers of that property, and it was their duty to deliver it to Milam in Clinton, South Carolina, in good order; and if it was not in good order, and it was injured while in their possession, then the road would be liable.' It being respectfully submitted that his honor overlooked the following principles or rules of law: (1) That, where a common carrier in the performance of its duties delivers freight to a connecting road for transportation to its destination, it does not insure the safe delivery by such connecting road; (2) that a common carrier does not insure the safe delivery of live stock against the injuries inflicted upon such stock by their own unruly dispositions, or by the ordinary jars or concussions incident to the usual and ordinary managing and running of a train." Not in every case does a railroad, when it delivers property to a connecting road for transportation to its destination, insure the delivery of said property at its destination to the consignee in safety, but sometimes it does, and this must depend on its contract. In Kyle v. Railroad Co., 10 Rich. Law, 382, the court of last resort in this state held that the contract of the carrier required it to bear the responsibility of safe delivery at destination, to the exoneration, as between the consignee and the common carrier, of the connecting road. There were two points of view as to the contract in the case of Milam, the plaintiff, and the Southern Railway Company. One might follow from the terms of the bill of lading signed by Tough & Son and the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Railroad Company at Kansas City, state of Missouri; and the other was what might be construed by the waybill issued by the Southern Railway Company at Birmingham, together with the circuitous route it adopted in delivering the car load of horses, for it is an undoubted fact that the Southern Railway Company brought this car load of horses to Atlanta, Ga. At that point the nearest way to Clinton, S. C., was by the Georgia & Northern Railroad, by which in at least 12 hours the car load of horses could have been carried from Atlanta, Ga., to Clinton, S. C., whereas in fact the Southern Railway Company carried this car load of horses from Atlanta, Ga., to Greenville, S. C., and then from there to Newberry, S. C., at which latter point the car load of horses were sent to Clinton by the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company. There was no contract evidenced by the bill of lading issued by the Southern Railway Company, with the plaintiff. The waybill was not a contract in itself, and yet it may be taken as a circumstance, along with others, to determine what this contract between the parties actually was. All these are matters for the jury to solve. Inasmuch as the circuit judge, in his charge, left it to the jury to determine defendant's liability, limited by the requirement that the injury to the horses should have occurred while they were in the custody of the Southern Railway Company itself, we can see no harm in the charge of the judge. So, also, we may say that it was not reversible error in the circuit judge to fail to call the attention of the jury to any results from the unruly disposition of the stock, or by the ordinary jars or concussions incident to the usual and ordinary managing and running of a train; for certainly there was no testimony on either of such matters, nor was any request made to the judge for any charge on these lines. The exceptions are overruled.

We will consider the sixth, seventh, and eighth exceptions together: "(6) In instructing the jury: 'That, if the stock was received by the Southern Railroad as a common carrier, then they became and would be liable for any damage that might be done to the stock. In other words, they would be then required to deliver it to Milam at Clinton, South Carolina, in good order;' thereby overlooking the principle or rule of law which makes a common carrier an insurer only over its own line. (7) Because his honor, by his charge, erred in instructing the jury that a common carrier of freight was an insurer of freight which it had delivered to a connecting carrier to be transported to its destination, whereas, it is respectfully submitted, a common carrier of freight is not an insurer of freight which in the performance of its duty it delivers to a connecting carrier to be transported to its destination, beyond the line of such common carrier. (8) In leading the jury to think that a common carrier, to which live stock is delivered to be transported over its own line and connecting lines to their destination, becomes an insurer of safe delivery of such stock at their destination, whereas, it is respectfully submitted, a common carrier of live stock does not insure—First, against injuries which are caused by the unruly dispositions of the animals themselves; or, second, against injuries caused by the ordinary jars or concussions in the ordinary management of a train; or, third, against injuries inflicted while in the hands of a connecting line to which the common carrier, in the performance of its duties, had delivered such stock to be transported to their destination." In justice to the circuit judge, it would be no bad idea to adopt from the argument of Mr. Welch, for the respondent, under the heads of "a" and "b," respectively, under parallel columns, what the judge said by detached portions, and what he said connectedly, in regard to defendant's liability as a common carrier.

Pages 106, 109, middle of folio 431:

"Now, I charge you that, if the defendant railroad here received the stock as a common carrier, then they became insurers. Whenever a railroad gets a charter and becomes a common carrier for the purpose of transporting freight and passengers and such matters as that, when they receive any freight as a common carrier they become insurers of that freight, and they agree thereby to deliver it in good condition to the parties whom it is consigned to. If the railroad here received this property of Milam's in Birmingham, Ala., as a common carrier, then they become insurers of that property, and it was their duty to deliver it to Milam, in Clinton, South Carolina, in good order; and if it was not in good order, and it was injured while in their possession, then the road would be liable."

"Now, you will understand that, before the plaintiff can recover here, the jury must be satisfied from a preponderance of the testimony in the case that the injury, if any at all, to the stock, occurred while it was in the possession of the Southern Railway Company. If the stock were all right and in good order when they were delivered at Newberry, here, to Columbia, Newberry & Laurens road, and they were injured while in the possession of the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens road, then the plaintiff could not recover against this defendant. His remedy, if any, then, would be against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens road. If, however, the testimony satisfies you that the defendant company was negligent; that they were guilty of negligence in not observing due care and due caution in the handling of that stock, or if they failed to feed or water it or rest it as required by law, and the stock was injured by their negligence,—then the defendant here (the railroad) would be liable."

"If the testimony satisfies you that the Southern Railway received the stock at Birmingham, Ala., and it was not injured while in their possession, that they complied with the law, and fed and watered and rested the stock as the law requires, and then delivered it to another road here at Newberry in good order, and it afterwards got injured while in the possession of another road, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. In other words, before you can give a verdict for the plaintiff in this case, you have got to be satisfied that there was negligence on the part of the railroad, if they received it under this contract, and that negligence was the cause of the stock being injured, and the injury occurred while the stock was in the possession of the Southern Railway, and it was on their account that the injury occurred. Then, if you are satisfied that the railroad was negligent, and the stock was injured while in its possession, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover whatever damages, in your opinion, he has sustained, under the testimony in the case; that being entirely a matter for you. If this stock was injured after it left the possession of the Southern Railway, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. Before the plaintiff can recover here, you must be satisfied that it was injured while in the possession of the Southern Railway, and they were negligent, if you believe there was this contract."

Page 119, requests 16 and 17:

"'Even if the evidence shows that the plaintiff's horses were injured when they arrived at Clinton, this fact does not entitle him to damages against the Southern Railway Company, but, before he can recover against it, the jury must be satisfied from the evidence that such injuries were inflicted while the horses were in charge of the Southern Railway Company; and, unless the evidence does satisfy the jury of this fact, then the verdict must be for the defendant.' I charge you that. 'Even if plaintiff's horses were injured when they arrived at Clinton, and it was uncertain whether those injuries occurred on the Southern Railway Company, or Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railway, then the verdict must be for the defendant.' I charge you that."

"As I told you before, before you can hold this railroad responsible, you must be satisfied by a preponderance of the testimony that the injury, if any, occurred while the stock was in their possession."

As remarked by Mr. Welch in his argument: "Can there be any doubt, therefore, after reading these two parallel sections of his honor's charge, what his meaning was? Column 'a' shows that the isolated portions of the charge may be taken, when considered alone, to hold that a common carrier is liable beyond its terminus. Column 'b' shows that his honor meant to charge nothing like that. He expressly says, again and again, both in his general charge and in charging defendant's requests, that the injury, if any, for which the defendant is held liable, must have occurred on the defendant's road and while in defendant's possession. Now, we confess we do not see how it could be made plainer."

We have thus reproduced what the circuit judge did say, and in what connection he said it. Finding, as we do, that the circuit judge exercised very great care in limiting, by easy and just terms, the liability, if any, of the defendant railroad, we are not inclined to view his remarks, in his charge as complained of, as erroneous. Now, when a circuit judge indulges in some general remarks upon the law, without any possibility of affecting thereby the issues actually on trial before him, we can see no reversible error. Somewhat akin to this is what was said by the late Chief Justice Simpson in Wallingford v. Railroad Co., 26 S. C. 264, 2 S. E. 21: "Before discussing these exceptions, it would be well to state some of the principles of law applicable to common carriers, about which there is little or no doubt. At common law there is no exemption to the liability of common carriers for goods, etc., intrusted to them, except for an act of God or of the king's enemies. They are regarded as insurers as to all else. In England, however, and in several of the states of this Union, including our own [South Carolina] the common-law doctrine was modified to the extent of allowing a common carrier to exempt himself from this broad liability by special contract as to certain specified causes of injury. See, in this state, Swindler v. Hilliard, 2 Rich. Law, 286; Baker v. Brinson, 9 Rich. Law, 202, and other cases that need not be cited. It was, however, held in all these cases: That he could not shield himself from the consequences of negligence by a contract. That his character as a common carrier could not be changed by contract. Only his liability to the extent of the specified exemptions was diminished. In all things else the general doctrine of common carriers applied, and especially as to negligence. And, further, that the onus was upon him to bring himself, by the testimony, within the exemptions mentioned in the contract. [Here follows, in the opinion, a quotation from the case of Swindler v. Hilliard, supra.] It was held in that case that common carriers could not by any special contract or agreement exempt themselves from liability for negligence, and that, when a contract was made, the onus of showing, not only that the cause of the loss was within the terms of the exemption, but also that there was no negligence, lies on the carrier." As will be seen by considering the charge, as a whole, the circuit judge was exceedingly careful to limit the liability only for injuries, if any, to the 24 hours while they were in charge of the Southern Railway Company.

The defendant insisted that the contract between the plaintiff and itself was embodied in the bill of lading signed by the Kansas City, Ft. Scott & Memphis Railway Company and Tough & Son. If so, the defendant had to agree to the thirteenth article of said contract, to wit: "* * * It is also agreed that the conditions of this contract shall inure to the benefit of all carriers transporting the live stock shipped hereunder, unless they otherwise stipulate, and that in no case shall one carrier be liable for the negligence of another." So far as the sixth exception is concerned, it must be overruled, for it is clear from an examination of the whole charge that the circuit judge limited the liability of the defendant to its own acts of commission and omission. And so as to the seventh exception; his honor was very careful in his charge. And so as to the eighth exception; his honor was, if anything, too lenient in his charge to the defendant. Hear his charge: "'(5) If the jury are satisfied that the bill of lading purporting to have been issued on October 28, 1896, by the Ft. Scott, Kansas City & Memphis Railroad Company to John S. Tough & Sons, in the contract for the transportation of the horses described in the complaint from Kansas City, Missouri, to Clinton, S. C., and that this contract was made under circumstances similar to those stated in request No. 1, then the plaintiff cannot recover for any alleged injuries to said horses by simply proving that said horses were in good order when they were first delivered to the railroad company, or that they were in good order at any intermediate point, and then by proving that they were damaged when they arrived at their destination; but he must go further, and prove that such injuries were not caused by their being weak, unruly, or exhausted from their long journey, or from the cramped and crowded condition of the horses in the car, or from the ordinary jars or concussions incident to the ordinary managing and running of a freight train.' I charge you that." For, notwithstanding all these advantages conceded to the carrier, it may be that some proviso as to negligence by the carrier should have been included in the charge; but no complaint comes to us on this matter, and we only mention it to show that appellant has not been injured by the charge. This exception is overruled.

Next we will consider the ninth ground of appeal, which complains that the judge charged the jury that "if you [the jury] believe they took it [the car load of horses] as common carriers at Birmingham, Alabama, they are insurers of the goods, and it was their duty to deliver it in good order at its destination, in Clinton." The error in this charge is alleged by appellant to be that by this charge his honor caused the jury to believe that a common carrier of live stock is an insurer "(1) against injuries inflicted by the unruly dispositions of the animals themselves; (2) against injuries inflicted by the ordinary jars and concussions caused by the ordinary running and managing of a train; (3) against injuries inflicted by a connecting line to which, in the performance of its duty, the first carrier had delivered the stock to be transported to their destination." We have just seen that the circuit judge charges the law as to first subdivision as requested by appellant, and so, also, as to the second subdivision; and, so far as the third subdivision is concerned, the charge of the judge is its own vindication, as to the error here suggested. This exception is overruled.

We will next consider the tenth exception: "(10) In instructing the jury that defendant's fifth request, to wit: 'If the jury are satisfied that the bill of lading purporting to have been issued on October 28, 1896, by the Ft. Scott, Kansas City & Memphis Railroad Company to John S. Tough & Sons is the contract for the transportation of the horses described in the complaint from Kansas City, Missouri, to Clinton, S. C., and that this contract was made under circumstances similar to those stated in request No. 1, then the plaintiff cannot recover for any alleged injuries to said horses by simply proving that said horses were in good condition when they were first delivered to the railroad company, or that they were in good order at any intermediate point, and then proving that they were damaged when they arrived at their destination; but he must go further, and prove that such injuries were not caused by their being weak, unruly, or exhausted from their long journey, or from the cramped and crowded condition of the horses in the car, or from the ordinary jars or concussions incident to the ordinary managing and running of a freight train,'—was only applicable to this case provided the stock were shipped under the contract as expressed in the bill of lading, and that it was not applicable if the defendant received the stock as a common carrier, whereas it is respectfully submitted that the request was applicable even though the defendant did receive such horses as a common carrier." There was a contest betwixt the parties litigant as to what contract governed the defendant in the performance of its duty as a common carrier, to wit, whether under the common-law liability, without any special exemption limiting this liability, which, of course, would follow a contract under the common law for the transportation of the 24 head of stock from Birmingham, Ala., to Clinton, S. C., by the Southern Railway Company itself, or whether the contract of the Ft. Scott, Kansas City & Memphis Railroad Company governed. This being the contest here, it would have been improper for the circuit judge to have made the charge as requested, without adding his own closing words, if our statute (section 1720, Rev. St.) applies to the case at bar; and we may remark that we have some serious doubts as to whether the defendant has brought itself under the protection of that section, for this reason: That section says that the initial road shall continue liable for the articles received by it for shipment, unless it is able to produce a receipt in writing from a connecting road for the articles or article so shipped. Now, is the Southern Railway Company the initial road, and has it produced a receipt in writing from a connecting road for the articles so shipped? The articles shipped were 24 horses. Has the Southern Railway Company produced a receipt in writing therefor? Here is the paper they produce:

SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO., SO DIVISION.

※ This space for sup't car service.

Now, remembering that the section 1720 requires a receipt in writing for the article or articles, it may be asked where in the paper tendered by the defendant is there any receipt in writing for 24 horses? We see the letters "S," "L," which are interpreted to mean "Stock," "Loaded," yet no character to show the stock shipped, or number thereof, here appears. Besides, the very headlines say, "Daily Report of All Cars," and the receipt is "for the above cars." (Italics ours.) Might it not be stated that the very aim of this section of our law was to fasten upon some common carrier the receipt of the specific article or articles shipped, by the production of a receipt in writing of such article or articles? But, be this as it may, we find no error in this tenth exception pointed out, and it is overruled.

We will next consider the 11th exception: "(11) In refusing to charge the defendant's request to charge, to wit, 'Where horses have been transported by successive carriers, and the proof only shows that they were in good order when first delivered, and were damaged when they reached their destination, then the law presumes that such damage was caused while such horses were in the hands of the last railroad company,' and in instructing the jury that 'the whole matter is a question of fact for you. As I told you before, before you can hold this railroad liable you must be satisfied by a preponderance of the testimony that the injury, if any, occurred while the stock was in their possession, and on account of their negligence, provided you conclude they are shipped under a special contract.' The error being, as it is respectfully submitted, in instructing the jury: First. That this is a question of fact for them, whereas, it is respectfully submitted, it was a question of law for the court to instruct the jury what is or is not a presumption of law. Second. That, before the defendant could be held liable, they must be satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence that the injury, if any, occurred while the stock was in the possession of the defendant, and on account of its negligence, provided the stock was shipped under a special contract; thus overlooking the principle or rule of law which requires the plaintiff to prove by the preponderance of the evidence that any injuries which might have been inflicted upon the horses were caused by the negligence of the defendant, whether it receives the stock under special contract or as a common carrier." As to the first subdivision, we might ask what are juries provided for, unless it is to try questions of fact? It seems to us that whenever direct evidence of witnesses is introduced, bearing upon a disputed question of fact, presumptions, like the Arabs, "fold their tents and steal away." As to the second subdivision, we think the circuit judge in his charge has more than done his duty to the defendant on this line of thought. This exception is overruled. "(12) In refusing defendant's eleventh request to charge; it being respectfully submitted that such request embodied a sound rule of law, which is directly applicable to this case." Here is the eleventh request, and what the circuit judge said thereon: "'(11) Where horses have been transported by successive carriers, and the proof only shows that they were in good order when first delivered, and were damaged when they reached their destination, then the law presumes that such damage was caused while such horses were in the hands of the last railroad company.' I refuse to charge you that. The whole matter is a question of fact before you. As I told you before, before you can hold this road liable you must be satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence that the injury, if any, occurred while the stock was in their possession, and on account of their negligence, provided you conclude they are shipped under a special contract." The circuit judge was right. Presumptions cease when facts are proved. It was a matter for the jury. Let the exception be overruled.

"(13) In refusing to charge the defendant's second request, to wit: 'If the jury are satisfied that the bill of lading purporting to have been issued on October 28, 1896, by the Ft. Scott, Kansas City & Memphis Railroad Company to John S. Tough & Sons is the contract made, as above stated, for the transportation from Kansas City to Clinton, S. C., of the horses described in the complaint, then it was the duty of Tough & Sons, at their own risk and expense, to take care of, feed and water, and attend to said stock while the same were in the stock yards of the said railroad company awaiting shipment, and while they were being loaded, transported, unloaded, and reloaded, and to unload and reload the same at feeding and transfer points, and wherever the same might have been unloaded and reloaded for any purpose whatever; and the plaintiff cannot recover any damages from defendant in this case without proving to the satisfaction of the jury—First, that the horses in question were injured while in the possession of the defendant; secondly, by proving that the injuries were not caused by the negligence of John Tough & Sons to take care of said horses as they had contracted to do. In other words, under such circumstances, if they exist, the plaintiff cannot recover any damages of the defendant simply by proving that the horses were in good order in Kansas City, before they were delivered to defendant, and then by proving that they were damaged when they were received at Clinton, S. C.; but, before he could recover, he must go further, and prove that these injuries were not attributable to the negligence on the part of Tough & Sons to take care of said horses as they had contracted to do.' It being respectfully submitted that the defendant had the right to have this request charged, because—First, it was applicable on the question of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff or of his agent; and, second, if the bill of lading was the contract, then the burden of proving that the stock were not injured by the negligence of the plaintiff or his agent was, by the contract, upon the plaintiff, and the defendant was entitled to have the jury properly instructed as to the force and effect of such contract." This exception raises practically two questions: (1) The request to charge was proper, because it was applicable to the question of contributory negligence. In Comer v. Railroad Co., 52 S. C. 51, 29 S. E. 637, this court held that even if a plaintiff fails to feed, water, and rest his stock at the end of every 28 hours such stock is in a car for transportation, and during transportation, it is the duty, under the law, of the railroad company in charge of the same to so feed, water, and rest stock on board its cars. (2) The next question is that by the bill of lading signed in Kansas City, Mo., it devolved upon the plaintiff to point out by his proof that the 24 horses were not injured by his acts. The judge's charge clearly limits the liability of the defendant to such injuries as it inflicted. This exception is overruled.

"(14) Because, in refusing the defendant's third request to charge, to wit: 'Where one ships live stock over a railroad, and contracts to go along and take care of said stock while it is being transported, loaded, unloaded, and fed and watered, then, under such contract, it is the duty of such person to perform his part; and if he neglects to do so, and injuries occur to said stock on account of such negligence, the railroad company cannot be held liable for any damages occasioned thereby,'—his honor did not instruct the jury as to the force and effect of the bill of lading, and as to its bearing upon the contributory negligence of the plaintiff." The case of Comer v. Railroad Co., supra, disposes of this ground of appeal. It is dismissed.

"(15) Because the charge of his honor was calculated to mislead the jury and cause them to think, under the law, (1) that a railroad company could not by special contract shift the burden of proof from itself to a plaintiff, so as to make such plaintiff, who had bound himself by special contract, to go along and take care of live stock; (2) that it was plaintiff who did take upon himself the burden of showing that any injuries which were inflicted upon such stock while en route were not caused by his own negligence failing to comply with such contract; (3) that a railroad company, which, as a common carrier, received live stock to be transported to a point beyond its line, was an insurer against any damage which might be inflicted on said stock by the unruly dispositions of said stock, or by the ordinary jars and concussions incident to the ordinary running and management of a train, or through the negligence of a connecting line to which railroad company had, in the performance of its duty, delivered such stock for transportation to their destination." We have reproduced, in effect, the last exception of the defendant. We must say that in the light of the decision of the court in Comer v. Railroad Co., supra, the defendant is quite persistent in making the same question which was passed upon in that case. The positive testimony of the plaintiff was that no ticket was furnished him upon the trains of the Southern Railway Company. But why should we refer to testimony that is for the jury? As to the third subdivision, the circuit judge has left us no ground to criticise his charge. It covered the case admirably well. This exception is overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

LONG v. HUNTER et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 9, 1900.)

CONTRACT—MODIFICATION—MORTGAGE TO SECURE PERFORMANCE — PAYMENT — SUBSEQUENT ADVERTISEMENT OF SECURITY — WRONGFUL SEIZURE AND SALE — SPECIAL DAMAGE—JOINDER OF ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF COMPLAINT—DEMURRER—PRIOR RULING—REQUESTS TO CHARGE.

1. Where a demurrer to a complaint for want of facts was once overruled, such ruling was binding, when it was renewed on the subsequent trial before another judge.

2. Where plaintiff contracted to ship a stated amount of merchandise to defendants, and to pay a stipulated sum per barrel for shortage, he was not liable for such shortage as was caused by following defendants' subsequent instructions to discontinue an unprofitable portion of the contract.

3. Defendants seized and sold plaintiff's property on account of indebtedness, and thereafter advertised a sale of other property given to secure the debt. Held, that defendants were liable for advertising the sale of the security, if the amount due them had been paid prior thereto, on the other sale, to a party entitled to receive it, since payment to an agent is payment to the principal.

4. On an issue whether plaintiff was liable for failure to ship an agreed amount of merchandise, the court construed a letter written by defendants as a modification of the agreement. Held, that a request to charge that plaintiff would be liable for the shortage unless defendants made use of power over him to prevent his fulfilling the contract, or unless there was a modification of the contract, was properly refused, since the court's construction of the letter made the question raised merely speculative.

5. A request to charge that special damage could not be recovered unless the facts causing such damage were plainly shown was properly refused, since defendants should have moved to require plaintiff to make his complaint definite and certain if it was defective in that respect.

6. Where a request for instruction contained an abstract proposition of law, not relevant under the pleadings, it was properly refused.

7. In an action for damages for advertising a sale of mortgaged property after the indebtedness was satisfied, failure to charge, at defendant's request, that he had a right to make the sale if any part of the debt, however small, remained unpaid, was not error, where the proposition requested was covered by the general charge.

8. Plaintiff mortgaged property to defendant to secure an advance, and contracted therein to ship defendants a specified amount of merchandise, and to pay a stipulated sum per barrel for any shortage. Thereafter defendant wrote plaintiff to discontinue certain work. A shortage resulted, which plaintiff claimed was caused by following the order. Upon his refusal to pay for the shortage, defendant seized and sold property consigned to other parties, and advertised a sale of the security also. Plaintiff sued, joining four causes of action: First, praying an injunction preventing a sale of the security; second, asking damages for breach of contract in ordering discontinuance of part of the work; third, asking damages for seizing and selling his property; fourth, asking damages for advertising the sale of the security. Held, on demurrer, that the causes of action were properly joined.

9. A cause of action alleging that defendants, under a pretended lien, voluntarily seized and sold certain merchandise shipped by plaintiff to other parties, and thereby damaged plaintiff's reputation and credit, stated sufficient facts, without showing the value of the property.

10. A cause of action alleged that defendants advertised a sale of property mortgaged as security, after the indebtedness was overpaid, and thereby forced plaintiff to raise and pay the balance claimed, at great inconvenience. Held, that a demurrer for want of facts was too general, and was properly overruled.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Hampton county; W. C. Benet, Judge.

Action by M. K. Long against John H. Hunter and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the order of Judge Aldrich overruling defendants' demurrer to the complaint: "The defendants, Hunter, Pearce & Battey, demurred to the amended complaint and amended supplemental complaint herein on several grounds. After hearing counsel, ordered, that the demurrer be overruled. The first ground of demurrer (that several causes of action have been improperly united) is not well taken, because it appears on the face of the complaint that the alleged causes of action (certainly two of them) arose out of the same transaction between the same parties, and all the causes of action as set forth in the complaint on their face state facts sufficient to constitute causes of action. I don't think a defendant can demur on antagonistic grounds; that is, on the grounds that the causes of action have been improperly united, and also raise the question that the same alleged causes of action do not state facts sufficient to constitute causes of action. The demurrer to the second cause of action is not well taken. It fails to state or point out the ground of objection. It states a conclusion of law, and plaintiff's second cause of action does, on its face, state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer to the third cause of action is not well taken. The first ground taken may show a cause for election, but is not a ground of demurrer. The second ground cannot be sustained, as the relief is no part of the cause of action. An allegation of value may be essential in cases of conversion, but not in this alleged cause of action. To take a man's property under certain circumstances may be injurious to his credit and reputation, so as to give him an action for damages, and here we have on its face a good cause of action stated. The fourth ground of demurrer is too general to be considered. It fails to point out in what particular the alleged cause of action is insufficient, as required by the Code and rule of court. The demurrer to the second cause of action in the amended supplemental complaint is open to the same objection,—too general. The court has no guide as to the matters contested, and also states a conclusion of law,—as to the omission by defendants' counsel in his certificate to the demurrer. I think, to warrant or sustain an objection thereto, the counsel of plaintiff should have either returned demurrer or given notice of omission. The demurrer by the defendants being hereby overruled on all the grounds, it is ordered that defendants have leave to serve their answer herein within twenty days from date of this order."

I. L. Tobin, for appellants. A. McIver Bostick and W. S. Tillinghast, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The complaint herein contains four causes of action, the first of which is as follows: Paragraph 1 of the complaint alleges the partnership of the defendants. Paragraph 2 alleges that the plaintiff and J. C. Smith, then doing business under the firm name of Long & Smith, on the 13th of January, 1898, executed a mortgage in favor of the defendants on certain real and personal property therein mentioned, to secure the payment of $1,055.86, to be advanced to the said Long & Smith by the defendants during that year. The other paragraphs are as follows: "(3) That the said Smith subsequently, and during the season of 1893, withdrew from the partnership of the said Long & Smith; transferred and delivered all his interest and ownership in the said business and property of the partnership to plaintiff, the said M. K. Long. (4) That the said Long & Smith, by their obligations above referred to, agreed to ship said defendants all turpentine and rosin manufactured by them during the said season of 1893, for sale on commission, and to pay ten cents per barrel on rosin short of nine hundred barrels by them, and fifty cents per barrel on spirits of turpentine short of three hundred barrels. (5) That plaintiff above named shipped defendants above named all turpentine and rosin manufactured by him and by the said Long & Smith during the year of 1893, in accordance with contract above referred to; said shipment falling short of number agreed to be shipped as aforesaid by one hundred and thirty-seven barrels spirits of turpentine, and three hundred and eighty-seven barrels of rosin. That the failure on the part of plaintiff to ship the number of barrels, both of spirits of turpentine and rosin, required by the contract aforesaid, was not due to any default on his part, but was at the express order and direction of defendants aforesaid, subsequently delivered to him in the midst of the season of 1893, requiring him to curtail his manufacture and shipments, in compliance with which order and direction plaintiff greatly reduced, and to a large extent discontinued, the manufacture of and shipment of turpentine and rosin. (6) That notwithstanding the said plaintiff's failure to ship the said promised number, or more than he actually shipped, of barrels of turpentine and rosin, was the direct result of the said direction on the part of the defendants aforesaid, with which plaintiff was forced and compelled to comply, as he was dependent on them for advances to run the business, the defendants have unjustly, wrongfully, unlawfully, and without right, charged the account of said Long & Smith with one hundred and seven and $^{20}/_{100}$ dollars shortage. (7) That payments were made from time to time during the season of 1893, from the proceeds of sales of shipments as aforesaid, by said plaintiff, and applied to said indebtedness; leaving a balance due on said indebtedness by said plaintiff to defendants aforesaid at that time, to wit, the close of the season of 1893, of only seventy-two and $^{83}/_{100}$ dollars, not including the charge of one hundred and seven and $^{20}/_{100}$ dollars shortage unjustly, wrongfully, and unlawfully charged as aforesaid, as shown by the within statements of account furnished by defendants to plaintiff, and by their acknowledgments and admissions to him. (8) That afterwards, and some time during the year of 1894, the defendants aforesaid seized and caused to be sold in the city of Savannah, Georgia, seven barrels of spirits turpentine and eight barrels of rosin, of the value, respectively, of ninety-six dollars and sixteen dollars, the property of plaintiff, and have failed and refused to account in any way to plaintiff for proceeds or value of the said seizure and sale, and have not even credited the same, or any part thereof, on the balance claimed by them on the mortgage deed aforesaid, although plaintiff owed defendants no other debt than as aforesaid. (9) That said plaintiff, from the proceeds of his shipments of turpentine and rosin as aforesaid, and for the value of the turpentine and rosin seized and sold by the defendants as aforesaid in Savannah, Georgia, has overpaid the aforesaid mortgage indebtedness to the defendants by the sum of thirty-six dollars, and defendants are justly indebted to him in the sum of thirty-six dollars, with interest on same. (10) That notwithstanding said mortgage has been paid in full and overpaid as aforesaid, and subsequent to the seizure and sale of plaintiff's property, set forth in paragraph 8, above, during the month of November, 1894, defendants, by virtue of a power of sale contained in the mortgage herein set forth, advertised and are advertising for sale at public outcry at Hampton court house, in said county and state of South Carolina, on the first Monday in December, the same being sales day of the present year (1894), the above-described property of plaintiff, covered by the said mortgage, to satisfy balance claimed by them on the debt secured thereby. (11) That a sale of plaintiff's property, under power as aforesaid, before an adjudication and judicial determination of their accounts and claims between plaintiff and defendants, would greatly embarrass and would work an irreparable injury and loss to him in the event that anything at all should be adjudged due on said mortgage. (12) That plaintiff is ready and willing, in the event that any amount at all should be adjudged to defendants, to pay the same, and redeem his property, which is worth considerable more than the amount claimed by defendants, and not less than seven hundred dollars."

Second Cause of Action. After alleging the facts hereinbefore mentioned as to the partnership of the plaintiff with J. C. Smith, and the withdrawal of Smith therefrom; also, the facts as to the partnership between the defendants, and the facts relative to the execution of the mortgage hereinbefore mentioned,—the plaintiff makes the following allegations in his second cause of action: "(3) That, subsequent to the withdrawal of said Smith as aforesaid, the plaintiff herein was notified, directed, and ordered by the said defendants, in the midst of the season of 1893, to cease working any but first or virgin boxes in this business as a manufacturer and shipper of turpentine and rosin, which plaintiff did, to his great loss and damage, as a large number, to wit, about forty thousand, of his boxes were of the prohibited class, and plaintiff's manufacture of both turpentine and rosin was greatly curtailed thereby. (4) That plaintiff was forced and compelled to comply with the said order of defendants at all costs; he being absolutely dependent upon them for the advances in money and supplies agreed to be advanced by defendants and necessary to carry on his said business, and bound by the contract aforesaid to make all shipments for the year to the said defendants, which contract rendered it impossible for plaintiff to transfer his business at the time to other commission merchants, or elsewhere obtain the necessary advances to run the business. (5) That this order on the part of the defendants was never authorized or willingly acquiesced in by plaintiff, but was simply obeyed by him through necessity, as aforesaid, thereby inflicting upon him, wrongfully, unjustly, unlawfully, loss and damage in money, labor, and crude turpentine abandoned and wasted, to the value or amount of four hundred dollars."

Third Cause of Action. The first paragraph of this cause of action alleges the partnership of the defendants. The other allegations are as follows: "(2) That during the year of 1894, in the city of Savannah, Georgia, the defendants above named unjustly, unlawfully, and without right or authority whatsoever, seized and caused to be sold seven barrels spirits of turpentine and eight barrels of rosin, the property of plaintiffs, shipped by him to other parties for sale on plaintiff's account, under a pretended lien or claim over the same on the part of the said defendants. (3) That plaintiff was damaged by said seizure and sale, in the diversion of the proceeds thereof from his business, and in the injury to his reputation for honesty and fair dealing, and consequently to his credit, which made it impossible for him to continue to obtain the necessary advances to run his business as a manufacturer and shipper of turpentine and rosin (the said seizure and sale being a matter of public and general notoriety), to the amount of three hundred dollars."

Fourth Cause of Action. Paragraph 1 is the same as that mentioned in the preceding cause of action. The other allegations are as follows: "(2) That in the month of November, 1894, defendants above named unjustly, wrongfully, and unlawfully, and without right or authority, by virtue of a power of sale contained in mortgage previously, to wit, in the year 1893, executed to defendants by the firm of Long & Smith, of which firm plaintiff was at the time a member (the said mortgage having been satisfied and paid in full), advertised and are advertising for sale at public outcry at Hampton C. H., South Carolina, on the first Monday in December of said year of 1894 (the same being sales day), real and personal property of plaintiff to satisfy a pretended balance claimed by said defendants on said mortgage debt. (3) That plaintiff has been damaged, by the aforesaid unauthorized and unlawful act of defendants, in his reputation and credit, and thereby hampered and damaged in his business as a manufacturer and shipper of turpentine and rosin, in the amount of three hundred dollars."

The amended supplemental complaint, omitting the first cause of action, to which the defendants did not interpose a demurrer, is as follows: "The plaintiff above named, for an amended supplemental complaint, herein alleges: * * * For a second cause of action: (1) That subsequent to the commencement of this action, and the various transactions set forth in the original complaint herein, the defendants named also in said complaint, to wit, John H. Hunter, Wm. K. Pearce, and Frank C. Battey, co-partners doing business under the firm name of Hunter, Pearce & Battey, proceeded to advertise, and were about to sell, pursuant to advertisement mentioned in the original complaint herein, the property of the plaintiff described in said complaint, which is hereby referred to and made a part of this amended supplemental complaint, and thereby forced plaintiff herein (the injunction prayed for in the original complaint having been refused) to raise and pay over the balance claimed by them upon the mortgage set out in the original complaint, to wit, a mortgage executed by the firm of Long & Smith, of which plaintiff was at the time of execution thereof a member, although the said mortgage had been paid in full and overpaid, as shown in the original complaint, to which said payment, made under protest, plaintiff was compelled in order to preserve the status of his property pending a judicial determination in this action of the state of accounts between parties hereto. (2) That the plaintiff was unjustly, wrongfully, unlawfully compelled by the aforesaid unjust and unauthorized act and attempt on the part of the defendants aforesaid, in the manner aforesaid, to raise a considerable sum of money to stop said sale, at great inconvenience, trouble, and expense to himself, to wit, loss of time from his business, worry of mind, trouble and expense of executing securities and borrowing money, loss of capital necessary to his business, and consequent embarrassment thereto, to his damage of one hundred dollars."

The jury rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff of $611.44. The defendants appealed upon the following exceptions: "The presiding judge committed error of law: Ex. 1. In overruling defendants' demurrer to the second cause of action in the complaint, on the grounds stated therein,—that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Ex. 2. In overruling defendants' demurrer to the fourth cause of action stated in the complaint, on the ground stated therein,—that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Ex. 3. In charging the jury that 'if the shortage of three hundred and eighty-seven barrels of rosin, and the one hundred and thirty-seven barrels of turpentine, was caused because Long did not work the old boxes, he could not be held responsible for any loss to the other side, because he and the other side had agreed not to work the old boxes'; there being nothing in the letter referred to from the defendants to the plaintiff, containing the alleged agreement between the parties, which could be construed into anything more than a recommendation from a factor in the market to his customer to ship a better, a different quality of material, for the customer's advantage alone. Ex. 4. In charging the jury, 'If when Long's property was advertised in Hampton, and this two hundred and forty-three dollars was collected, if at that time the money was paid by knocking off of this account, and paid by collection in Hampton [Savannah], the defendant Hunter had no right to collect anything more, and, if thereby Long has been damaged, he is liable,' whereas it is submitted, as matter of law, that the defendants had the right at any time after the debt became due, and prior to receipt by him of the amount due thereon from the court in Savannah, and the plaintiff in Hampton, which occurred about the same time, to wit, sales day in December, 1894, to advertise the land for sale under the mortgage. Ex. 5. In allowing proof of special and speculative damage to go to the jury under the allegations of the fourth cause of action on the amended complaint and the last cause of action in the supplemental complaint, over the objection of the defendants' attorney. Ex. 6. In refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the defendants, as follows, in the third request to charge: 'That the letter of the defendants does not change or modify the contract as to quantity of turpentine and rosin the plaintiff agreed to ship to the defendants, but simply expresses the wishes of the defendants, considering the welfare of the plaintiff, that the plaintiff would stop chipping old boxes, and chip no other but virgin timber, and the scrape from the old boxes.' Ex. 7. In refusing to charge the jury as requested by the defendants in their fourth request to charge: 'That unless the plaintiff was so under the influence or control of the defendants that he was not possessed of free agency in the matter, and the defendants made use of their power in such a way as to prevent him from shipping the number of barrels of turpentine agreed on, or unless there was some change in the contract, in whole or in part, with reference to payment for nonshipments, the plaintiff is bound by his contract, and the defendants have the right to make the charge against him for nonshipment provided in the agreement.' Ex. 8. In refusing to charge the jury as requested by the defendants in their fifth request to charge: 'That, where an attempt is made to prove special damages, the facts evidencing such damage must be so described and pointed out that the defendants may have such information in regard to the same as to enable them to intelligently investigate and inquire into the truth or falsity thereof; and, unless the proof of such damage is sufficiently specific as to furnish the information for such inquiry or information, the jury cannot consider such testimony.' Ex. 9. In refusing to charge the jury as requested by the defendants in the seventh request to charge: 'The proof of mere advertisement, without seizure, of another's property, under a power contained in a mortgage, in good faith, for the purpose of enforcing the collection of a debt which the mortgagee honestly believes to be due and secured by the same, will not sustain an action for damages for injury to reputation and credit.' Ex. 10. In refusing to charge the jury as requested by the defendants in the eighth request to charge: 'That if any amount, however small, was due on the mortgage debt, which the plaintiff refused to pay, the mortgagee had the right to advertise and sell the property to enforce collection of the same.' Ex. 11. In allowing plaintiff to testify, against the objection of the defendants, that in consequence of not receiving that one hundred dollars from Gregg, Jones & Wood, he was injured in his reputation and credit. Ex. 12. Defendants except to the order of Judge Aldrich in overruling the demurrer of the defendants that several causes of action are improperly united in the complaint. Ex. 13. Defendants except to the order of Judge Aldrich overruling defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's second cause of action. Ex. 14. Defendants except to order of Judge Aldrich overruling defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's third cause of action. Ex. 15. Defendants except to order of Judge Aldrich in overruling defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's second cause of action stated in amended supplemental complaint. Ex. 16. Defendants except to order of Judge Aldrich, in that, if the ruling of the court was correct, that the demurrers were inconsistent and would not stand together, the defendants should have been allowed to elect which they should rely upon, and the court should not have passed upon said demurrers until after such election or refusal to elect."

The respondent's attorneys served the following notice: "Please take notice that upon appeal herein plaintiff (respondent) will urge that the judgment of the court below, and the rulings of his honor, Judge Gage, especially as to the demurrers to the various causes of action, be sustained, not only upon the grounds mentioned in the proceedings herein by his honor, but also upon the additional grounds that said demurrers had already been passed upon and overruled by Judge Aldrich, and the same are res judicata."

The appellants' attorney argued only four of the foregoing exceptions. We will discuss the exceptions in regular order:

Exceptions 1 and 2. This case was first heard by Judge Aldrich, who ruled that the demurrer to the fourth cause of action was too general to be considered, and that the demurrer to the second cause of action in the supplemental complaint was open to the same objection, as they failed to point out in what particulars the alleged causes of action were insufficient. This ruling was binding on Judge Gage, and he did not err in overruling the said demurrers. Turner v. Association, 51 S. C. 33, 27 S. E. 947; Cartin v. Railroad Co., 43 S. C. 221, 20 S. E. 979; Kerchner v. Singletary, 15 S. C. 535.

Exception 3. The record contains the following, in the presiding judge's charge to the jury, to wit: "Long says that on the 22d day of August, 1893, he wrote this letter. Here it is: 'We received a notice from a meeting of the Naval Stores Association, through you, urging all operators to stop work on all turpentine boxes, except virgin, on or before the 26th of August. You will please let me know by return mail what you want me to do in regard to the matter, as I am at a loss to know what to do.' Long wrote that letter to Hunter. It is dated the 22d day of August. On the 24th day of August, Hunter writes back this letter to Long: 'Replying to your favor of the 22nd instant, beg to say, as there is no money to you in working old boxes at the price that spirits and rosin are now bringing, we want you to stop chipping your old boxes and commence at once to take off your scrape.' Now, gentlemen, as I told you in the start, the relationship between these two parties was fixed and covered by this contract. When two parties meet and enter into a contract, it takes two parties to change that contract. If one undertakes to change it, he breaks the contract. Now, what do these letters mean? Long and Hunter made the contract, and Long and Hunter have the right to modify the contract or add anything to it. Now, I charge you— I can charge you this, because these letters are in writing, and I can see it in black and white; and the law says I can charge you on what's in writing,—can explain it to you and construe it. They mean, as I construe it, that Long and Hunter undertook to modify, or, more properly, to add to, the contract they had made, and they agreed this between themselves,—that, at least, no more old boxes should be worked in 1893; and they agreed that only virgin boxes should be worked after the 26th of August. Now, I charge you, this shortage of rosin and turpentine, to wit, if the three hundred and eighty-seven barrels of rosin, and the hundred and thirty-seven barrels of spirits of turpentine, of 1893, was caused because Long did not work the old boxes,—if it was caused because he didn't work the old boxes— I told you he had a right not to work the old boxes, because he and the other side agreed, and he can't be held responsible for any loss to the other side, because he and the other side agreed not to work the old boxes. So much for these two items (sixty-eight dollars and fifty cents and thirty-eight dollars and seventy cents) charged against Long." This court sees no error in the presiding judge's construction of said letters.

Exception 4. If the amount due by the plaintiff to the defendants had been paid to a person having the right to receive it for the defendants, they did not have the right to advertise his property for sale. Payment of money to an agent authorized to receive it is equivalent to payment to the principal, even if it never reaches his hands.

Exception 5. Waiving the objection to this exception as being too general for consideration, we have failed to find in the record any facts upon which it can be properly predicated.

Exception 6. This exception is disposed of by what has already been said in considering the third exception.

Exception 7. The circuit judge construed the letter to be a modification of the original contract, and this rendered merely speculative the question raised by said exception.

Exception 8. If the pleadings were defective and insufficient, the defendants' remedy was by motion to require the plaintiff to make his allegations definite and certain, but not by a request to charge.

Exception 9. The request contained an abstract proposition of law, as it was not responsive to the issues made by the pleadings.

Exception 10. Although the circuit judge did not specifically charge as requested, the proposition contained therein was nevertheless embraced in his general charge.

Exception 11. We fail to find in the record any facts to which the exception could properly be referred.

Exception 12. This court is satisfied with the reasons assigned by Judge Aldrich in overruling the demurrer.

Exceptions 13, 14, and 15. Waiving the objection to these exceptions that they are too general to be considered, we fail to discover any error on the part of Judge Aldrich in overruling the demurrers.

Exception 16. There were other grounds upon which Judge Aldrich overruled the demurrers, and, as they are satisfactory to us, the exception cannot be sustained, even conceding that one of the reasons assigned by him was erroneous. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

Ex parte NEAL LOAN & BANKING CO. LANAHAN et al. v. BAILEY LIQUOR CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 20, 1900.)

APPEAL AND ERROR—APPELLANT NOT PARTY IN INTEREST—INTOXICATING LIQUORS—DISPENSARY LAW—SALE—WHO MAY QUESTION—ASSIGNMENT FOR THE BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

1. An exception to instructions will not be considered when it appears that the objecting party has no interest in the property in controversy.

2. The question of the validity of a sale of intoxicating liquors situated in South Carolina, on the ground of their contraband nature, can be raised only by the state.

3. A bill of sale of all of one's property in the state of South Carolina, made on valid consideration, is not, in effect, an assignment for the benefit of creditors.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Abbeville county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Attachment by William Lanahan & Son against the Bailey Liquor Company. The Neal Loan & Banking Company claimed part of the attached property, as owner. From a judgment for claimant on an issue framed to determine the ownership of the property, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Ansel, Cothran & Cothran, for appellants. Jos. A. McCollough, for respondent.

POPE, J. The Bailey Liquor Company, whose domicile is in the state of Georgia, became indebted to William Lanahan & Son (a firm doing business in the city of Baltimore, Md.) for about $1,575; and, having failed to pay that debt or any part thereof, said Lanahan & Son began suit against the said the Bailey Liquor Company to recover the said $1,575, in the court of common pleas for Abbeville county, in the state of South Carolina, in which county the said Bailey Liquor Company had some liquors, of value; and, as incident to said suit, the said Lanahan & Son sued out a writ of attachment on the 10th day of November, 1897, under which F. W. R. Nance, Esq., as the sheriff of said Abbeville county, seized the liquor belonging to the Bailey Liquor Company. But on the 11th day of November, 1897, the Neal Loan & Banking Company, of Atlanta, Ga., gave a notice in writing to said F. W. R. Nance, Esq., as said sheriff, that all the interest and estate of the Bailey Liquor Company in the liquors, etc., attached by him in Abbeville had been conveyed, for full value, to the said Neal Loan & Banking Company, which said company was the legal owner thereof. A motion was made by the Bailey Liquor Company to dissolve the attachment sued out by Lanahan & Son. This motion was finally granted by the supreme court of this state. See Lanahan v. Bailey, 53 S. C. 489, 31 S. E. 332. After the remittitur reached the circuit court for Abbeville, S. C., the Neal Loan & Banking Company applied to the presiding judge of the court of common pleas for Abbeville county, S. C., for an order framing an issue as to the ownership of these liquors. William Lanahan & Son alone contested this ownership. On the 3d October, 1899, Judge Ernest Gary directed the following issue to be tried by a jury: "Was the Neal Loan & Banking Company the owner of and entitled to the property attached in this case, at the time of attachment?" On the 6th day of April, 1900, this issue came on for trial before his honor, Judge Watts, and a jury. Testimony was submitted by the Neal Loan & Banking Company, through several witnesses, showing that, for a bona fide indebtedness, the Bailey Liquor Company conveyed to the loan and banking company the liquors in question, which sale was evidenced by an instrument in writing executed in the presence of witnesses in the city of Atlanta, in the state of Georgia. At the conclusion of the testimony it was agreed by counsel on both sides that the verdict of the jury should be made under the direction of the court. Then Judge Watts said to the jury, "Well, I instruct you, gentlemen, to write the word 'Yes' to that question now." It was thus determined that such liquors were the property of the Neal Loan & Banking Company. William Lanahan & Son were not satisfied with this result. They have appealed on the following grounds: "Exceptions: The defendants except to the ruling and charge of the presiding judge on the trial of this case upon the following grounds: (1) Because his honor erred in holding that the bill of sale introduced in evidence carried the title to the property to the Neal Loan & Banking Company, and instructing the jury to answer the issue, 'Yes.' (2) Because, the liquors alleged to have been conveyed being within the limits of this state, and this court having held in the case of Lanahan v. Bailey, 53 S. C. 489, 31 S. E. 332, that liquors shipped into this state to be sold in original packages cannot be attached and sold by the sheriff in satisfaction of a debt (the dispensary law not allowing any one to sell but a county dispenser), his honor erred in holding that the title to the liquor attached in this case passed to the Neal Loan & Banking Company by the bill of sale introduced. (3) Because, this court having held in the case of Lanahan v. Bailey, supra, that when liquors were shipped into this state, as in this case, it was unlawful, and the liquor contraband and subject to seizure by the state, his honor erred in charging the jury to answer in the affirmative. (4) Because, the bill of sale put in evidence being a conveyance of all the property of the Bailey Liquor Company, it was, in effect, an assignment with a preference in favor of the Neal Loan & Banking Company, and therefore void; and his honor erred in holding that it passed the title to the liquors to said Neal Loan & Banking Company, and hence erred in directing the jury to answer the issue in the affirmative. (5) Because, this court having held in the case of Lanahan v. Bailey, supra, that 'the statute, in its efforts to prevent the mischief arising from the illegal use and possession as aforesaid, had even gone to the extent of declaring null and void all obligations contracted in sale thereof,' his honor erred in ruling that the title under the bill of sale put in evidence passed the title to the Neal Loan & Banking Company, and also erred in directing the jury to find the issue in the affirmative."

As to the first exception, we do not see that the circuit judge was guilty of any error. In the first place, what concern is it of Lanahan & Son to protect the property of the Bailey Liquor Company? Certainly, although the Bailey Liquor Company is a party to this action, we have yet to learn that any objection to the claim of the Neal Loan & Banking Company has been made by it. Certain it is that Lanahan & Son are not the owners of this property, for their attempted lien was upset by this court. See 53 S. C. 489, 31 S. E. 332.

As to the second exception, we do not see how the purposes of the Neal Loan & Banking Company as to these liquors can here be brought in question by Lanahan & Son. They do not represent the state of South Carolina, or any of its municipalities. They are citizens of Maryland. And this view disposes of the third exception, also.

As to the fourth exception, we will say that we do not regard the instrument executed by the Bailey Liquor Company to the Neal Loan & Banking Company as an assignment, in the light of our South Carolina laws governing assignments. It was a sale outright.

Lastly, as to the fifth exception, we must say that we cannot view with approval the solicitude manifested by Lanahan & Son, who are liquor dealers themselves, as to a violation of the dispensary law of the state of South Carolina rendering null and void any obligations contracted in the sale of liquors. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

ALLEN v. PETTY et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 16, 1900.)

BILLS AND NOTES—USURIOUS INTEREST—PENALTY—SURVIVAL OF RIGHT TO RECOVER—REFEREE — EXCEPTIONS TO FINDING — APPEAL AND ERROR.

1. In an action on a note, where defendants set up a counterclaim for the amount of usurious interest paid on the note, the error, if any, of the referee in allowing limitations to be interposed as an amendment to the reply was rendered harmless by a finding of the referee that limitations had no application to the case.

2. Under Rev. St. § 1391, giving a person who has paid usurious interest the right to recover, as a forfeiture, a sum double the amount which exceeds the interest allowed by section 1390, either by separate action or counterclaim, the right to set up the counterclaim does not survive to the legal representatives or heirs of the promisor, since it is an action for a statutory penalty.

3. An exception, in an action on a note, that the circuit judge erred in sustaining the finding of the referee that a counterclaim setting up a payment should not be allowed, is unavailable unless the error is established by a preponderance of the evidence.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Cherokee county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by Mrs. A. G. Allen against Harriet V. Petty and others on a note. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. C. Jefferies, for appellants. Simpson & Bomar, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. That part of the special master's report which states the facts of the case is as follows: "This is an action brought by Mrs. A. G. Allen against the administrator of the estate of C. C. Petty, deceased, as well as against his heirs at law, to foreclose a mortgage given her by the said intestate. The note given by C. C. Petty to Mrs. Allen is as follows: '$600.00. Twelve months after date I promise to pay to Mrs. A. G. Allen or order the sum of six hundred dollars, for value received, with interest from date until paid at the rate of eight per cent. per annum; interest to be paid annually, or to be added to principal annually and bear interest at same rate as principal till paid. [Signed] C. C. Petty. Dec. 31st, 1891.' A mortgage was also executed and delivered to Mrs. Allen, or to her agent, covering some land in Cherokee county, to secure the payment of the said note. The following paper was also given to the agent of Mrs. Allen at this time: 'Whereas, C. C. Petty has this day borrowed from Mrs. Annie G. Allen the sum of six hundred dollars, and agreed to pay her interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum: Now, therefore, I personally guaranty that the said interest shall be paid annually, without any plea of usury, by the said C. C. Petty. [Signed] W. S. Thomason. Dec. 31st, 1891.' All these papers were in the handwriting of W. S. Thomason, who seemed to have represented both parties in these dealings with each other, and in collecting interest for Mrs. Allen for several years. The paper last above copied, signed by W. S. Thomason, was kept with the note herein sued on, and seems to have been considered practically a part of the same; and, in pursuance of the agreement evidenced by said paper, C. C. Petty paid interest on the note, not as stipulated therein, but at the rate of ten per cent., namely, sixty dollars a year, as shown by the credits on the note in handwriting of Judge Thomason, the receipts, also in his handwriting, and the testimony of Mrs. Allen, and her declarations to C. A. Petty. In addition to these payments of interest, defendant claims that C. C. Petty paid to W. S. Thomason, former attorney of Mrs. Allen, the sum of one hundred dollars, which he claims should be credited on the note. No receipt was produced on the trial for this payment, although receipts were shown for the payments of interest, and no effort was made on the part of defendant to fix the time and place of the alleged payment. The testimony on this point is indirect and rather vague, and it is unfortunate, if this payment was really made, that the reference was not brought on in the lifetime of Judge Thomason, who could have furnished direct evidence on this point, and that it should have been left in its present unsatisfactory shape. In the light of the above testimony, I find as follows: (1) That the note sued on herein was usurious in its inception, but, if not usurious, payments of interest were made upon it from the date of its maturity up to and including the payment of January, 1897; (2) that Judge Thomason was the agent and attorney of plaintiff throughout these transactions; (3) that the evidence is not sufficient to show the payment of one hundred dollars, and hence same is disallowed. The questions of law involved herein are new, and rather difficult to solve. The plaintiff demurred to the answer on two grounds: (1) That the counterclaim is based upon a statutory remedy in the nature of a penalty, the right of action on which does not survive; and, (2) if it does survive, it does not survive on behalf of the parties who are now claiming its benefits." The special master concluded his report as follows: "From these conclusions it follows that the plaintiff must recover of the defendant merely the face of the note, without interest or costs. * * *" The circuit judge confirmed the said report, and rendered judgment of foreclosure.

The appellants' first exception assigned error on the part of the circuit judge as follows: "(1) Because he did not sustain the defendants' first exception to the report of the said referee, which was as follows: '(1) The referee erred in allowing the statutes of limitation to be interposed by the plaintiff as an amendment to their reply;' the error complained of being that the said referee allowed an amendment to plaintiff's reply by allowing the statutes of limitation to be placed in the said reply after the testimony had closed." The defendants alleged in their answer that the said agreement was usurious, and set up as a counterclaim the yearly payments of $60 for five years, aggregating $300, and double the amount of alleged usurious interest, to wit, 6 per cent. on $600 for five years, amounting to $180. The special master in his report states correctly the doctrine that the statute of limitations has no application to a case like this, citing Agency Co. v. Gillam, 49 S. C. 369, 26 S. E. 990, 29 S. E. 203. So that, even if there was error, it was harmless, especially in view of the conclusions hereinafter announced.

The second exception imputes error as follows: "In not sustaining defendants' second exception to the report of the referee, which was as follows: '(2) The referee erred in sustaining the first ground of demurrer: (a) In holding that a counterclaim based upon a statutory remedy in the nature of a penalty does not survive; (b) in holding that the counterclaim based upon a statutory remedy in the nature of a penalty does not survive to the administrators, heirs at law, and distributees of the deceased.' Also, 'in sustaining the first ground of plaintiff's demurrer.' Wherein it is respectfully submitted that the circuit judge erred: (a) In sustaining the referee, and in holding that a counterclaim based upon a statutory remedy is in the nature of a penalty, and does not survive. (b) In sustaining the referee, and in holding that it does not survive to the administrators, heirs at law, and distributees of the deceased. (c) In sustaining the referee, and in holding that the counterclaim set up herein is in the nature of a penalty, or is a penalty. (d) In sustaining the referee, and in considering the oral demurrer of the plaintiff as to defect of parties defendant at the hearing before him after answer."

Sections 1390, 1391, Rev. St., are as follows:

"Sec. 1390. No greater rate of interest than seven (7) per cent. per annum shall be charged, taken, agreed upon or allowed upon any contract arising in this state for the hiring, lending or use of money or other commodity, except upon written contracts, wherein, by express agreement, a rate of interest, not exceeding eight per cent., may be charged. No person or corporation lending or advancing money or other commodity upon a greater rate of interest shall be allowed to recover in any court in this state any portion of the interest unlawfully charged; and the principal sum, amount or value so lent or advanced, without any interest, shall be deemed and taken by the courts of this state to be the true legal debt or measure of damages to all intents and purposes whatsoever, to be recovered without costs. * * *

"Sec. 1391. Any person or corporation who shall receive, as interest, any greater amount than is provided for in the preceding section, shall, in addition to the forfeiture therein provided for, forfeit also double the sum so received, to be collected by a separate action, or allowed as a counterclaim to any action brought to recover the principal sum."

This case is to be decided by the law in force when the act of 1898 was passed regulating the rate of interest, for there is an express provision in said act that it should not apply to contracts made before it went into effect. There are two distinct penalties provided by sections 1390, 1391, Rev. St The penalty for a violation of section 1390 is that neither interest nor costs shall be allowed the plaintiff, but he is restricted to a recovery of the principal. The penalty for a violation of section 1391 is that the person or corporation receiving usurious interest shall, in addition to the forfeiture mentioned in section 1390, forfeit double the interest received in excess of the rate allowed by law. We will first consider whether there was error on the part of the circuit judge "in sustaining the special master, and in holding that a counterclaim based upon a statutory remedy is in the nature of a penalty, and does not survive." A counterclaim cannot be set up when usurious interest is "taken," under section 1390. That is not one of the penalties provided by that section. The court cannot allow a penalty which is not to be found in the statute. McBroom v. Investment Co., 153 U. S. 318, 14 Sup. Ct. 852, 38 L. Ed. 729. We are therefore restricted to a consideration of section 1391, in determining this question. The counterclaim can in no sense be said to arise ex contractu. On the contrary, it must be classed with those actions arising ex delicto. In the case of Middleton v. Robinson, 1 Bay, 58, the court says: "The common law gives no remedy to or against executors for torts or trespasses," etc. In order to mitigate the hardship of the common law, St. 4 Edw. III. c. 7 (Rev. St. § 2319), was enacted, and is as follows: "Executors, in cases of trespass done to their testators, as of the goods and chattels of the same testators carried away in their life, shall have an action against the trespasser, and recover their damages, in like manner as they whose executors they are, should have had if they were in life." It will seen at a glance that this section is not applicable to the present case. In 5 Enc. Pl. & Prac. p. 811, the doctrine is thus stated: "At common law the death of the plaintiff in an action to recover a penalty abated the action, and such is still the general rule in the United States." See, also, Jenkins v. Bennett, 40 S. C. 393, 18 S. E. 929; Huff v. Watkins, 20 S. C. 477; and Ford v. Caldwell, 3 Hill, Law, 248. In the case of Zeigler v. Railroad Co., 53 S. C. 115, 32 S. E. 526, it was decided that the purchaser of property affected by a usurious contract did not have the right to interpose the plea of usury on the ground that such plea is personal to the debtor. If a purchaser of such property cannot set up the defense of usury, even when he paid value for the property, it would seem, for a stronger reason, that mere volunteers would not have the right to avail themselves of that defense. As we have reached the conclusion that the right to set up the counterclaim did not survive, the other questions presented by this exception become merely speculative, and need not be considered.

The third, fourth, and fifth exceptions are as follows: "(3) In not sustaining defendants' third exception to the report of the referee, which was as follows: '(3) The referee erred in holding that the five payments of usurious interest, of sixty dollars each, should not be credited on the note, or reduce the amount from six hundred dollars to three hundred dollars.' Wherein it is respectfully submitted that the circuit judge erred in sustaining the referee, and in not allowing the counterclaim; the error complained of being that, defendants' intestate having made five payments of usurious interest, of sixty dollars each, these defendants, under a proper construction of section 1390, Rev. St., would be entitled to have credited on the note and mortgage the sum of three hundred dollars, as a counterclaim for usurious interest paid plaintiff. (4) In refusing to sustain defendants' fourth exception to the report of the referee, which was as follows: '(4) The referee erred in failing to sustain defendants' counterclaim of double the amount of usurious interest collected.' Wherein it is respectfully submitted the circuit judge erred in not holding that under a proper construction of section 1391, Rev. St., the defendants were entitled to their counterclaim of double the amount of usurious interest collected; the circuit judge thereby disallowing defendants' counterclaim of ninety dollars. (5) In not sustaining the defendants' fifth exception to the report of the referee, which was as follows: '(5) The referee erred in holding that there should be a foreclosure of the mortgage herein for the amount of six hundred dollars when he should have held that it should be for one hundred and eighty dollars, if not allowing the credit of one hundred dollars paid to the attorney and agent of Mrs. Allen.' Wherein it is respectfully submitted the circuit judge erred in sustaining the referee, and in holding that there should be a foreclosure of the mortgage for six hundred dollars, whereas, it is respectfully submitted, he should have held that the foreclosure should be for one hundred and eighty dollars, if not allowing the credit for one hundred dollars paid to the attorney or agent of Mrs. Allen, thereby disallowing defendants' counterclaim for four hundred and twenty dollars." The questions raised by these exceptions are disposed of by what was said in considering the second exception.

The sixth exception is as follows: "(6) In not sustaining defendants' sixth exception to the report of the referee, which was as follows: '(6) The referee erred in not sustaining the counterclaim of one hundred dollars set up by the defendants as having been paid to W. S. Thomason, agent and attorney to Mrs. Allen.' Wherein it is respectfully submitted that the circuit judge erred in sustaining the referee, and in not allowing defendants credit for one hundred dollars paid by defendants' intestate to W. S. Thomason, agent and attorney for plaintiff; thereby disallowing defendants' counterclaim of one hundred dollars." It was incumbent on the appellants to satisfy this court by the preponderance of evidence that the circuit judge erred as alleged in the exceptions, but they have failed to do so. This exception must likewise be overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

FINLEY v. LAURENS COUNTY.

COUNTIES—COMPENSATION OF AUDITOR.

18 St. at Large, pp. 581, 582, § 252, provided that L. county auditor should receive, in addition to his salary, such sums as might be necessary to defray the expense of the assessment of property, not to exceed $400. Rev. St. 1893, § 274, declared that such auditor should "receive $400 additional compensation," without stating the purpose. Held, that where the auditor of L. county held over, after his term of office had expired, from January 1st to February 26th, and the returns of taxpayers were required to be filed between January 1st and February 20th, he was entitled only to his proportion of the $400 for the time in office after January 1st, and not to the entire sum.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by John R. Finley against the county of Laurens. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ball, Simpkins & Ball and Irby & Babb, for appellant. Ferguson & Featherstone, for respondent.

POPE, J. John R. Finley presented a claim to the county board of commissioners for Laurens county, S. C., for $400, for making assessments for the fiscal year 1899, as auditor for Laurens county. The fiscal year began January 1, 1899, and John R. Finley surrendered the office of auditor to his successor, W. L. Ferguson, on the 26th of February, 1899. The said board of commissioners refused to allow the said Finley the sum of $400, but did allow him the sum of $64.28, as the proportion of said $400 for 1 month and 26 days of the 12 months comprising the fiscal year. An appeal was taken by Finley to the circuit court, which came on to be heard before Judge Watts, who, in a short order, dismissed the appeal. He now appeals to this court on the following grounds: "(1) Because it is respectfully submitted that his honor erred in adjudging that the appeal of the plaintiff from the finding of the county board of commissioners herein be dismissed, and their judgment affirmed; (2) that he erred in not finding and adjudging that John R. Finley, as the county auditor of the county of Laurens, was entitled to four hundred dollars for compensation for making such assessments for the fiscal year 1899; (3) that he erred in not finding and adjudging that the auditor, J. R. Finley, appellant, was not entitled to four hundred dollars, as a specific appropriation and allowance for making the assessments for the fiscal year 1899."

Both parties to this contention admit that the law fixing salaries for county auditors in this state is set out in section 274 of volume 1 of the Revised Statutes of this state, which is but the reproduction of an act to amend section 252 and section 274 of the General Statutes (adopted in 1882) in relation to the compensation of county auditors and county treasurers. 18 St. at Large, pp. 581, 582. Section 252, before being amended, read as follows: "Sec. 252. The county auditors of the several counties shall receive the annual salaries hereinafter mentioned, respectively: * * * The county auditors of Abbeville, * * * Laurens, * * * six hundred dollars; * * *; provided, that the comptroller general shall not issue to any county auditor any warrant for salary until said auditor shall file in the office of the comptroller general all abstracts and reports due by such auditor. And, in addition to the salaries as hereinbefore provided, the county auditors shall receive, to defray the expenses of assessment of property, such sums as may be necessary, but not to exceed the following, to wit: * * * The auditor of * * * Laurens * * * four hundred dollars each. And the county commissioners of the several counties as aforesaid shall, upon the application of the county auditors, draw their checks on the county treasurers for the several amounts to which the auditors may be entitled under this section, and the county treasurers shall pay said checks from the first collection of the county funds of the fiscal year in which the work shall be performed. * * *" But the act of 1883, which is now section 274 of the Revised Statutes of 1893, omits from the law theretofore governing the salaries and compensation of county auditors certain words, where provision is being made for the payment of additional compensation from the respective counties of the auditors, so that it now reads: "Sec. 274. * * * And, in addition to the salaries of the auditors as is hereinbefore provided, the county auditors shall receive from the funds of their respective counties additional compensation as follows: * * * Laurens * * * four hundred dollars. * * * And the county commissioners as aforesaid shall, upon the application of the county auditors, draw their checks upon the county treasurers for the several amounts to which the auditors may be entitled from the funds of their respective counties as hereinbefore provided, and the county treasurers shall pay the said checks from the first collection of county funds of the current fiscal year. * * *" Now, it must be apparent that in the short interval of one year the legislature of this state had changed its mind, so to speak, in relation to the salary and compensation of county auditors. It no longer required the county auditor to be allowed such additional compensation, not to exceed, in the case of the county auditor of Laurens, such sums as may be necessary, but not to exceed the sum of $400, to defray the expenses of the assessment of property, for all these words are stricken from the section; and, besides, the county auditor is no longer required to file in the office of the county commissioners "an itemized statement of the services rendered by his assistant, the number of days each of said assistants was employed, and the compensation they were severally to receive, which statement shall be examined and approved by the board of county commissioners," which he was bound to do under the act of 1882. It seems to us, the legislature has applied its ax to the old tree, and has converted it, by lopping limbs here and there, into an entirely different one. By the last legislative action, it seems to us, a salary is provided to be paid annually from the state treasury to the county auditors, and, in addition to the salary to be paid by the state, auditors shall receive an additional salary (or compensation) to be paid by the county. Appellant lays great stress upon the use of the words "compensation to defray the expenses of assessment," and then seems to rely upon the words that the returns of taxpayers must be filed between the 1st of January of each year and the 20th of February of each year as fixing the duty of auditors. But this view is not broad enough, for a careful study of the tax acts of our state affecting auditors (see sections 272 to 305 of volume 1 of the General Statutes) will show that the assessment of taxes is not finished by the 20th of February of each year, when individual taxpayers finish making their returns of property for taxation. The county auditor's duty as to assessments of property has, so to speak, just begun on the 20th day of February of each year. This is our view of the law here involved. Hence we do not think his honor erred as alleged in the first exception. Under our views, John R. Finley was dealt with as required by law when he was denied the $400 which he sought, and was only allowed his proportionate share of that year's salary. We do not conceive that the matter of simply taking the returns of individual taxpayers makes up what was in the legislature's mind as to additional compensation to be paid by the county. We must overrule the exception. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BOWEN v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

RAILROADS—NEGLIGENCE—INJURY AT CROSSINGS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action for injuries, under Rev. St. §§ 1685, 1692, requiring railway companies to blow a whistle or ring a bell at crossings, and fixing their liability for injuries on failure so to do, an instruction that, if the company conformed to the statute as to ringing the bell and blowing the whistle, it would not be liable, did not impose the duty of both blowing the whistle and ringing the bell, where the statute itself was also read to the jury.

2. Where the complaint alleged negligence in failing to comply with statutory requirements as to signals, and in causing a train to approach plaintiff without warning and at a high speed, an instruction that if the company conformed to the statute as to blowing a whistle and ringing a bell it would not be liable, if there was no want of ordinary care, did not require the company to disprove the negligence alleged and show it was guilty of no other acts of negligence.

3. An instruction that, if defendant company did not conform to the statute in blowing the whistle and ringing the bell, then it was liable, did not impose absolute liability on defendant on failure to comply with statutory requirements as to signals, where the statute naming the conditions under which the company would be liable was read to the jury.

4. An instruction misstating the issues made by the pleadings, to which the court's attention was not called at the trial, cannot be considered on appeal.

5. A railway company's failure to comply with Rev. St. §§ 1685, 1692, requiring the blowing of a whistle or ringing a bell at crossings, is negligence per se.

6. Where appellant presented no request for a more comprehensive charge, he cannot complain on appeal that the charge given was not comprehensive enough.

7. Contributory negligence must be the direct and proximate cause of an injury, and an instruction was properly refused that plaintiff could not recover if there was any negligence on his part contributing to the accident in question.

8. A party cannot complain of a modification of an instruction, though the same be good law, which was not prejudicial to him.

9. An instruction that negligence was a fact for the jury was not error, where the court also defined what negligence was.

10. An instruction that if plaintiff, injured at a railway crossing, could have observed the approach of a train by the exercise of ordinary prudence and foresight, he could not recover, was properly refused, since it deprived plaintiff of his right to recover, under Rev. St. § 1692, where no signals were given, unless guilty of gross negligence.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Pickens county; Ernest Gary, Judge.

Action by G. W. Bowen against the Southern Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. P. Cothran, for appellant. Morgan & Blassingame, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The record contains the following statement of facts: "Action for damages to person and property, $1,950, alleged to have been sustained by G. W. Bowen, plaintiff, in a collision with defendant's train at a highway crossing on November 2, 1898, near Easley, in Pickens county. The action is brought under the statute requiring certain signals to be given by railroad companies as their trains approach a crossing, the negligence alleged being a failure on the defendant's part to observe said requirements. The defendant answered, denying the said injury and pleading contributory negligence. The cause was tried before Judge Ernest Gary and a jury at Pickens on October 26, 1899. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,925. Upon motion for a new trial the circuit judge granted an order allowing a new trial unless the plaintiff within ten days remitted all of said verdict in excess of $1,200. Plaintiff duly remitted said excess, and entered up judgment for $1,200 and costs. Within ten days after the rising of the court the defendant gave notice of intention to appeal, and within due time served the exceptions."

The first exception is as follows: "The presiding judge charged the jury as follows: 'But, if it [railroad company] did conform to the statute as to blowing the whistle and ringing the bell, then they would not be liable, if there was no want of ordinary care.' Such charges being erroneous in the following particulars: (a) In imposing upon the defendant the duty of both blowing the whistle and ringing the bell, whereas the statute exculpates it if either signal is given. (b) The action was brought under the statute (Rev. St. §§ 1685, 1692), and the only negligence alleged was the failure to give the statutory signals. The plaintiff was not entitled to recover upon proof of any other negligence. The judge's charge required the defendant to disprove the negligence alleged, and to show, also, that it was guilty of no other act of negligence, or allowed the plaintiff to recover upon some act of negligence not alleged." We will first consider subdivision "a." The presiding judge read to the jury the section of the Revised Statutes mentioned in the exception. In the case of Smith v. Railway Co., 53 S. C. 121, 30 S. E. 697, the court uses this language: "This court has frequently declared the rule to be that, when a judge has once laid down the law correctly, he will not be held to a stern responsibility if he failed thereafter to charge requests embodying the law which he has already charged. It seems to us not to be reversible error, if a judge has read the statute itself in the presence of the jury, and should thereafter, in commenting upon the law, drop the disjunctive conjunction 'or,' using instead the copulative conjunction 'and,' unless he was doing more than running over the statutory proviso. If, however, the circuit judge was subjecting the language employed in the statute to a critical analysis, whereby and wherein it became important that the difference in meaning and effect between the word 'and' and 'or' should be carefully noted, then in such instance it would be error; but, as in case at bar, and under its surrounding facts, for the circuit judge to ignore the distinction, if error at all, would be harmless error." This ruling shows that said subdivision cannot be sustained. Subdivision "b" will next be considered. The defendant's negligence is thus alleged in paragraph 8 of the complaint: "(3) That the defendant, by its servants, agents, and employés having in their care, control, and management a certain locomotive engine and train of cars thereto attached, forming train number 2, and south bound, carelessly, negligently, and wrongfully failed to sound the whistle of said locomotive or ring the bell thereon as was required by the law of the said state, appearing as section 1685 of the Revised Statutes of 1893 of said state, and caused the said locomotive and train of cars to approach the plaintiff without warning, and unexpectedly to him and at a rapid and high rate of speed, while he was attempting to go over said crossing as aforesaid, and, without his fault, caused said locomotive to strike him, severely cutting and bruising various parts of his body, causing great suffering and pain, and permanently injuring him." The acts of negligence alleged are (1) failure to comply with the statutory requirements as to signals; (2) "causing the said locomotive and train of cars to approach the plaintiff without warning, and unexpectedly to him, and at a rapid and high rate of speed." The plaintiff, under the act of 1898 entitled "An act to regulate the practice in the courts of this state in actions ex delicto for damages," had the right to submit to the jury both acts of alleged negligence.

The second exception is as follows: "The presiding judge charged the jury as follows: 'If the railroad did not conform to the statute in blowing the whistle and ringing the bell, then the law says that it is liable;' such charge being erroneous in the following particulars: (a) In imposing upon the defendant the duty of both blowing the whistle and ringing the bell, whereas the statute exculpates it if either signal is given. (b) The statute does not impose an absolute liability upon the defendant for a failure to comply with the requirements as to signals, but such liability attaches only under these circumstances: (1) An injury to person or property by collision with the train must have occurred; (2) the collision must have taken place at a highway crossing; (3) the neglect to give the signals must have contributed to the injury; (4) the injured must not have been guilty of gross negligence contributing to the injury." Subdivision "a" is disposed of by what was said in considering the first exception. We will next consider subdivision "b." The exception sets out only a portion of the sentence in which the presiding judge charged the jury as therein stated. He also read the statute, as explanatory of his words. The charge must be considered in its entirety, and when thus considered it will be seen that subdivision "b" cannot be sustained.

The third exception is as follows: "The presiding judge charged the jury as follows: 'The defendant railroad company says that he [the plaintiff] has not been injured, and, if he has been injured, it was through his own carelessness in not observing the train, and that they were not at fault because they did not ring the bell or blow the whistle.' The defendant contended that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, under all circumstances detailed, in driving upon the track in an empty wagon, between two other empty wagons, making a great deal of noise, without looking out for the train; that the signals were given, and the plaintiff must have heard them, but recklessly drove upon the track in attempting to cross in front of an approaching train. It was error, therefore, to limit the plaintiff's negligence, as the circuit judge did, to his 'carelessness in not observing the train.'" The foregoing words were used by the circuit judge in stating the issues made by the pleadings, and, if he made a mistake, it was the duty of the defendant to call his attention to the mistake, if it intended to rely upon it as a ground of appeal. Westbury v. Simmons (S. C.) 35 S. E. 764.

The fourth exception is as follows: "The presiding judge charged the jury as follows: 'If the railroad company failed to blow the whistle or ring the bell in accordance with the requirements, that would be negligence on the part of the railroad company; and if, as a result of that negligence, it came into collision with the defendant [plaintiff?] and injured him, the railroad would be liable, and should compensate him for such damages as he has sustained, unless he was negligent in being upon the railroad track.' Error is imputed for the following reasons: (a) The statute makes the railroad company liable only in case it omits both the signals required. This charge makes it liable for failure to give either signal. (b) Said portion of the judge's remarks is a charge upon the facts, and a statement of the testimony, in violation of the constitution. (c) It limits the contributory negligence of the plaintiff to his negligence 'in being upon the track.'" Subdivision "a" has already been disposed of. The case of Smith v. Railway Co., hereinabove mentioned, shows that subdivision "b" cannot be sustained, as it is negligence per se to fail to comply with the said statutory requirements. We will next consider subdivision "c." The acts of contributory negligence relied upon by the defendant are not specified in the answer. The proposition of law embodied in the charge was sound. If the defendant desired a more comprehensive charge, it could have accomplished it by presenting requests to that effect.

The fifth exception is as follows: "The presiding judge erred in refusing to charge the defendant's second request, which was as follows: 'It may have been possible that the disaster would have occurred even if there had been no gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and yet, if there was such negligence on his part, and it contributed to the disaster, the plaintiff cannot recover.' Said request contains a correct proposition of law, and was intended to convey the idea that the gross negligence of the plaintiff need not be the proximate cause of the disaster, but that, if it contributed in any way to it, the plaintiff could not recover." When the law speaks of an act of negligence as contributory to an injury, it means as a direct and proximate cause thereof. Contributory negligence is thus defined in 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 371: "Contributory negligence is a want of ordinary care upon the part of a person injured by the actionable negligence of another combining and concurring with that negligence, and contributing to the injury, as a proximate cause thereof, without which the injury would not have occurred." This definition is approved in Cooper v. Railway Co. (S. C.) 34 S. E. 16. Subdivision "b" must therefore be overruled.

The sixth exception is as follows: "The defendant's third request to charge was as follows: 'Gross negligence is equivalent to the absence of slight care. If, therefore, at the time of the collision the plaintiff did not exercise slight care to avoid the collision, and such negligence contributed to the disaster, the plaintiff cannot recover.' The presiding judge modified it as follows: 'I charge you that, with this qualification: If the failure to exercise ordinary care [existed], and that failure amounted to gross negligence, then he could not recover, and negligence is a question of fact for you.' Error is imputed to such modification for the following reasons: (a) The request states a correct principle of law applicable to the case, and defendant was entitled to have the jury so instructed. (b) The presiding judge substituted 'ordinary' for 'slight' care, which totally changed the meaning of the request. (c) The modification was erroneous and confusing, for it is impossible that the failure to exercise ordinary care can ever constitute gross negligence. (d) Negligence is not a question of fact for the jury, but a mixed question of law and fact. (e) The rule stated in 'd' did not prevent the presiding judge from charging said request." The request contained a sound proposition of law, and should have been charged without modification; but the defendant has no ground of complaint by reason of the modification, as it was too favorable to it. After the presiding judge had defined negligence, it was not reversible error to tell the jury that negligence was a fact for them. It is the duty of the presiding judge to instruct the jury as to what constitutes negligence, and it is the duty of the jury to decide whether it exists in a particular case.

The seventh exception is as follows: "The defendant's fourth request to charge was as follows: 'If the plaintiff at the time of the alleged collision did not exercise that kind of care which even the careless and indifferent would be expected to exercise under the circumstances, and such want of care contributed to the disaster, he cannot recover a verdict.' The presiding judge modified it as follows: 'I charge you that, with this qualification that, if that care which a careless or indifferent person would be expected under ordinary circumstances to observe would amount to gross negligence, then he cannot recover.' Error is imputed to such modification for the following reasons: (a) In omitting the words 'in want of,' immediately preceding the words 'that care,' in the second sentence in said modification. (b) The request states a correct principle of law applicable to the case, which the defendant was entitled to have submitted to the jury. (c) Defendant was entitled to the charge that the absence of that care which even the careless and indifferent would be expected to exercise under the circumstances, as matter of law, amounted to gross negligence, and it was error to submit that question to the jury." We proceed to a consideration of subdivision "a." The language of the circuit judge modifying the request shows upon its face that words were accidentally omitted. It, however, appears that the only modification intended was to substitute the word "ordinary" in the place of the word "the," immediately preceding the word "circumstances." Even conceding that the request was free from error, the modification was not prejudicial to the defendant, and enabled the jury more clearly to comprehend the proposition of law embodied in the request. As the circuit judge only modified the request in the particular hereinbefore mentioned, he did not submit to the jury whether the absence of that care which even the careless would be expected to exercise amounted to gross negligence. When the charge is considered as a whole, it will be seen that it was not erroneous in the particular just mentioned.

The eighth exception is as follows: "The seventh request of defendant was as follows: 'If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary prudence and foresight, could have observed the approach of the train, then he cannot recover, and their verdict must be for the defendant.' No reference is made in the charge to said request, and it is submitted that the presiding judge erred in not charging said request." This request was obnoxious to the law in two particulars: (1) It contained a charge upon the facts; and (2) it deprived the plaintiff of the right he had to recover damages unless he was guilty of gross negligence, as provided by the statute hereinbefore mentioned. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

REYNOLDS v. WOOD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 14, 1900.)

TAX LIENS—PROPERTY SUBJECT AS BETWEEN CREDITORS.

This case, upon its facts, is controlled by the rule laid down in Brooks v. Matledge, 28 S. E. 119, 100 Ga. 367, and is distinguishable from Bank v. McWilliams, 33 S. E. 860, 107 Ga. 532, for the reason that in the latter the tax liens were in existence before the party owing the taxes had made the first conveyance of property, while in the former, as in the present case, the tax liens arose after the tax debtor had executed a security deed conveying one of the parcels of realty involved.

SOUTH CAROLINA & G. R. CO. v. AUGUSTA SOUTHERN R. CO.

EQUITABLE PETITION — DEMURRER — REDUNDANCY — LEASE OF RAILROAD — CONSTRUCTION—DEFAULT BY LESSEE—FORFEITURE—PLEADING.

1. A petition, though mainly in the form of an equitable petition, is, under the uniform procedure act of 1887 (now embodied in Civ. Code, § 4937), maintainable as an action at law if it sets forth a legal cause of action. If it does this in substance, it is good against a general demurrer, or a motion to dismiss in the nature of such a demurrer. In case such a petition is unnecessarily voluminous, or contains redundant, superfluous, or irrelevant matter, or is not properly paragraphed, or is in any respects not sufficiently clear and distinct, its defects in these respects may and should be reached by an appropriate and timely special demurrer.

2. Where two railroad companies entered into a contract for the lease by one of them of all the property of the other for the entire period of its corporate existence under its charter and all renewals thereof, the main consideration of the contract operating beneficially for the lessor being, "The rents and covenants hereinafter contained to be paid and performed by" the lessee, and where the contract stipulated that the latter was "to have and to hold," during the stipulated term, the property of the lessor, the lessee "paying the rents, keeping and performing the covenants herein contained, to be kept and performed on its part, as hereinafter stipulated," then all of the agreements, promises, and stipulations on the part of the lessee preceding the words last quoted, the keeping of which was essential to a just, fair, and reasonable performance by it of the contract as a whole, should be treated as covenants, whether in the parts of the contracts setting forth these agreements, promises, and stipulations they were expressly so designated or not.

3. When, in a contract of the nature above indicated, it was expressly provided that in case the lessee should at any time fail to pay to the lessor such sums of money as may be due under the contract, "or shall fail to perform any other covenant herein, and such default or failure to perform shall continue for thirty days after written notice requiring such performance, then and in every such case it shall be lawful for the [lessor], at its option, to re-enter into and upon its said line of railway and other property hereby leased, and every part thereof, and take possession thereof, and have and hold such property, together with all additions and improvements which shall have been made to the same; and all the right, title, and interest whatsoever of the [lessee] in and to said property shall, upon such re-entry, thereupon wholly cease and determine." Held, that upon a breach by the lessee of any one or more of such agreements, promises, and stipulations as are indicated in the preceding note, it became the right of the lessor to institute an action for the forfeiture of the lease.

4. When, among the covenants contained in such a contract, there was one for the payment of interest on certain bonds, mere failure to promptly pay such interest would not constitute a ground of forfeiture, if the lessor did not elect to do so when the default occurred, and if, before the filing of its petition, the interest had in fact been paid.

5. The petition in the present case sufficiently set forth the covenants made by the defendant company, and sufficiently alleged breaches of several of them by the defendant to entitle the plaintiff to institute its action, and the same was in substance good against the motion to dismiss made at the trial term.

Error from superior court, Richmond county; E. L. Brinson, Judge.

Action by the Augusta Southern Railroad Company against the South Carolina & Georgia Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. B. Cumming, for plaintiff in error. Boykin Wright, J. R. Lamar, and E. H. Callaway, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. 1-3. This case was before this court at the October term, 1898, and is reported in 107 Ga. 164, 33 S. E. 36. The contract upon which the plaintiff's action was based is set forth fully in that volume, which renders it unnecessary to copy the same again in the report of the case now before us. After that decision, when the case came on again to be heard before the court below, a motion was made by defendant's counsel, orally, to dismiss the petition ("the supreme court of Georgia having held that said petition did not present any grounds for equitable relief"), on the following grounds: First, because there were no proper pleadings to support an action at law; second, because a legal cause of action is not set out. The court, after argument for and against the motion, took the same under advisement, and on January 16, 1900, rendered judgment refusing said motion to dismiss. On this judgment of the court, error is assigned in the bill of exceptions.

It was simply decided in this case, when it was first here, that the contract entered into by these railway corporations was one of lease, and not of partnership, and did not establish any trust relations between the parties thereto. The petition seems to be mainly in the form of an equitable proceeding. It was evidently filed under the uniform procedure act of 1887 (now embodied in Civ. Code, § 4937). The petition prayed for a decree declaring the lease forfeited, for damages, for a receiver pending the litigation, for an accounting, and for general relief. At the first preliminary hearing had in the case, the trial judge appointed receivers to take charge of the road and operate it until final decree. The lessee excepted to that decision, and the case was brought here for review. In order to obtain the equitable relief sought in the petition, it was contended that, under the contract between the parties, a partnership was created, or at least a trust relation existed between them, and therefore equity had jurisdiction. This court held that that was not a correct construction of the contract, and therefore equity had no jurisdiction to grant the relief sought, and, inasmuch as the judgment excepted to granted equitable relief purely, it was reversed. This court, however, did not decide, nor is there any such intimation in the opinion written by Chief Justice Simmons, that the petition set forth no valid cause of action at law. On the contrary, at the conclusion of the opinion, it was recognized that, under our system, legal and equitable causes may be joined in one action, yet, if the petition contain no equity, the court cannot award equitable relief. The further idea is conveyed, in the decision in that case, that the plaintiff's petition was predicated solely upon matters over which courts of law have jurisdiction. This court has not held, therefore, that no cause of action whatever was set forth in this case, but simply that the facts alleged did not entitle plaintiff to the equitable relief sought. The decision was to the effect that plaintiff made a case at law only, and was not entitled to the extraordinary remedy of a receiver. We think it a well-established doctrine by the decisions of this court that a petition brought under the uniform procedure act of 1887 may embrace both equitable and legal causes of action; but, because the equitable rights prayed for are denied, it does not follow that the legal rights set forth will not be enforced. We will therefore consider briefly the main question involved in the present issue before us, as to whether or not a legal cause of action is set forth in plaintiff's petition, upon which the court can grant adequate relief in law.

We call attention to that provision in the contract which is set forth in the petition, to the following effect: "In case the South Carolina Company shall at any time fail to pay such sums of money as may be payable by it to the Augusta Company, when the same shall have become payable according to the terms hereof, and such default shall continue thirty days after written demand for payment of the same, or shall fail to perform any other covenant herein, and such default or failure to perform shall continue for thirty days after written notice requiring such performance, then and in every such case it shall be lawful for the Augusta Company, at its option, to re-enter into and upon its said line of railway and other property hereby leased, and every part thereof, and take possession thereof, and have and hold such property, together with all additions and improvements which shall have been made to the same; and all the right, title, and interest whatsoever of the South Carolina Company in and to said property shall, upon such re-entry, thereupon wholly cease and determine." Among the charges in the petition it was alleged that the covenant under article 2 of the contract was violated by the defendant, in that the rolling stock and engines of the company had been allowed to get out of repair and run down without renewing the same, and are in such condition that the business handled has to be done at greatly increased cost and risk to the company; and, in addition to this, good engines and coaches from the Augusta Southern have been taken and put on the main line of the South Carolina & Georgia Railroad, and inferior engines and coaches substituted for them, which were unfit for hauling and handling the business of the Augusta Southern to advantage and with economy and safety, etc. The petition also alleges that the agreement under article 3 of the contract has been violated, in that the defendant failed to keep said accounts therein mentioned in the manner required, and has failed to keep the same open at all times to the inspection of the officers of the Augusta Company, and has failed and refused them the privilege of taking copies and memoranda of them, though so requested to do by petitioner and its officers duly appointed for that purpose; that defendant failed to furnish to the president of the Augusta Company on the 15th day of September, 1897, and 15th day of March, 1898, a complete statement, as stipulated for, of all the receipts and disbursements received and paid out for the Augusta Company during the preceding current half years ending June 30th and December 31st, respectively; that defendant has failed to furnish such a statement at other times, when the same was called for by resolution of the board of directors of the Augusta Company, and failed, in compliance with such resolution, to submit to the inspection of persons designated by said board vouchers which said board asked to be inspected, in connection with the statement of accounts in the traffic department, and failed and refused to allow said persons so designated to take memoranda and copies thereof, to the injury and damage of petitioner, —— dollars. There were a number of other breaches of the contract alleged against the defendant just as specifically as we have pointed out in the above cases,—for instance, in charging a higher rate of interest than was agreed upon for carrying the floating indebtedness of plaintiff company, as provided for in articles 4, 5, 6, and 7 of the contract, and by charging interest not paid on bonds; and, again, for violating the agreement in article 8 to make fair and just division of freight and passenger rates; and also by violating a provision in the same article by charging expenses of agents working for both roads, and by allowing plaintiff to have no voice in fixing insurance upon its property. Following the article containing the above stipulation is the clause in the contract hereinabove quoted from article 10, which, in effect, stipulates that if the South Carolina Company shall fail to pay any sums of money that may be payable to the Augusta Company, or shall fail to perform any covenant therein, and such default or failure to perform shall continue for 30 days after written notice requiring such performance, then the South Carolina Company forfeits its rights under the lease, and plaintiff has a right to the possession of the property. We think the term "covenants," used in this article, clearly refers to those agreements just preceding in the contract, alleged in the petition to have been violated as above specified; for the keeping of these stipulations, and a compliance with the obligations imposed upon the defendant thereby, we think, is essential to a fair and reasonable performance of the contract as a whole, and they should be treated as covenants, whether the parts of the contract setting forth these agreements and stipulations were expressly so designated or not. A material and serious violation of any of these undertakings and obligations on the part of the defendant company would, by virtue of the terms of the contract itself, work a forfeiture of the property leased, and would give the right to plaintiff to recover possession thereof. Upon this point the contract itself is the law of the case. While the petition in this case may contain irrelevant matter, and may not properly be paragraphed, yet it does set forth a legal cause of action in substance, and we think, after a careful reading of it, that it is good against a general demurrer, or a motion to dismiss in the nature of such demurrer. If the first ground of the motion to dismiss means anything more than that a legal cause of action is not set out, the purpose is to attack the form of pleading for some defect which is amendable, and this cannot be done by a motion nor by a demurrer after the appearance term. Ward v. Frick Co., 95 Ga. 804, 22 S. E. 899; City of Augusta v. Lombard, 101 Ga. 724, 28 S. E. 994. In Telegraph Co. v. Jenkins, 92 Ga. 398, 17 S. E. 620, the principle is announced that if the declaration is defective in matter of form, in failing to make proper or full allegations with reference to the defendant company's negligence, that was a matter for special demurrer. The declaration being good in substance, the court did not err in overruling a general demurrer thereto. In Printup v. Land Co., 90 Ga. 180, 15 S. E. 764, it was decided: "Want of certainty and definiteness in setting forth the defense, being a defect of form, would not vitiate the pleas, unless pointed out by special demurrer." See, also, James v. Railroad Co., 90 Ga. 695, 16 S. E. 642, where it was held that, though a petition was defective in form at the first term, it should not, at the trial term, be dismissed on defendant's motion, made on the ground that the allegations as to the nature and extent of the injuries were too vague, uncertain, and indefinite to put defendant on notice as to the nature of the case to be proved. We think, therefore, the special objections urged by learned counsel for plaintiff in error in this case, as to defects in the petition, while many of them might have been taken advantage of by special demurrer, are not, under repeated rulings of this court, good in a motion to dismiss a case at the trial term.

4. Among the covenants contained in the contract in this case there was one for the payment of interest on certain bonds, which plaintiff alleges to have been violated. It seems that, under article 1 of the contract, defendant obligated itself to pay the principal and interest, as they became due, upon a certain series of bonds; and it was charged in the petition that it failed and refused to perform said covenant and agreement by refusing payment of certain coupons on said bonds, although they were duly presented to defendant for payment by the lawful owners and holders thereof under the terms of the contract of lease, to the injury and damage of petitioner. It further alleged that this failure and refusal continued for many months, to the annoyance and damage of plaintiff. Construing this under the rule that pleadings should be construed most strongly against the pleader, as there is no allegation that these bonds had not been paid before the suit, while the failure and refusal continued for many months, the inference is that defendant finally paid them before any action was taken against it by the plaintiff. If the plaintiff then did not elect to avail itself of its rights growing out of this default while it was in existence, we do not think such a failure to promptly pay this interest would constitute a good ground of forfeiture.

5. We conclude, therefore, that the petition in the present case sufficiently sets forth the covenants made by the defendant company, and sufficiently alleges breaches of several of them to entitle the plaintiff to proceed with this action for the purpose of having adjudicated its rights at law; and there was therefore no error in the court overruling the motion to dismiss, made at the trial term. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

GARLAND v. SOUTHERN RY. CO.

CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—COMPLAINT.

Where a petition, in an action against a railway company for personal injuries, alleged, in substance, that the plaintiff was a passenger upon a freight train of the defendant; that, at the request of the conductor, he occupied a seat in the upper part of the cab, and remained there until the train reached the outskirts of the town to which he was going, when, the train coming to a full stop, which the plaintiff thought was for the purpose of allowing him to get off, he, in order to get his effects together, preparatory to leaving the train, followed the conductor to the lower part of the cab, where the conductor left him standing, saying to him, "Stay here until we pull up to the depot, and you can then get out;" that the train then moved forward rapidly, and plaintiff, for the purpose of seeing when he reached the depot, stood by a window of the cab, holding firmly to the window, in such a position as to protect himself against all ordinary and usual jerks and jars incident to a freight train; that while he was in this position the train, by reason of the negligence of the defendant's employés in charge thereof, was suddenly, and without warning, stopped, with such a tremendous, unusual, and unnecessary shock as to jerk plaintiff's hands loose from the widow, so violently wrenching them from their hold upon the window as to tear a ring and the flesh from one of his fingers; that the shock overturned buckets of water in the car, moved several inches an iron stove, which was fastened to the floor, and threw the plaintiff violently against some obstacle in the car and to the floor, rendering him for a time unconscious; that he sustained very serious injuries, the nature and extent of which, his sufferings therefrom, his earning capacity before, and for a stated period after, the injury, and the pecuniary amount of his damages, being all set forth,—held, that the petition set forth a cause of action, and should not have been dismissed upon demurrer.

WILLS—TRUST—ACTION—NECESSARY PARTIES.

1. Where a testator directly devised and bequeathed to two minor grandsons described realty and personalty, "to be equally divided between them," and in his will directed that, "if either of them should die without children or the descendants of children, then his part shall go to the survivor or his children or descendants of children, but, if neither of them should leave any child or descendants of children, then said property" to revert to the testator's estate, and where two named persons were by the will "appointed guardians and trustees of the property hereby bequeathed to" the grandsons, the will, however, not imposing upon them any duties, the intention was to make these persons trustees of the estate which the grandsons took under the will, and the trust thus created became executed on the arrival of both grandsons at majority. This being so, the trustees so appointed were not necessary parties to an action subsequently instituted by one of the grandsons against the legal representative of the other, who had died, for the recovery of property which the latter in his lifetime had received under this provision of the will.

2. The court erred in dismissing the action for want of proper parties.

COUNTIES—TORT OF CHAIN-GANG SUPERINTENDENT.

A county is not liable for a tort committed by a chain-gang superintendent in unlawfully imprisoning one and compelling him to work, although the same was done in obedience to instructions from the county authorities.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by Henry Bailey against Fulton county. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Daley & Hall, for plaintiff in error. L. Z. Rosser, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The petition of Henry Bailey set forth that for some alleged violation of the municipal ordinances of the city of College Park he was sentenced by the mayor to serve a term of six months in the county chain gang of Fulton county; that after the imposition of this sentence, which was wholly unauthorized by law, the marshal of that city delivered the plaintiff into the custody of the superintendent of the chain gang, who confined and kept the plaintiff at work thereon for a period of more than five months; and that "the acts and doings of said superintendent in thus confining this petitioner at hard labor in said chain gang was done in obedience to instructions issued to him by the county authorities of said county." The petition was dismissed on demurrer, and the plaintiff excepted.

The only question for decision is whether or not a county is liable in damages for a tort of the character committed upon the plaintiff in error. We are quite clear that it is not. That "a municipal corporation is not liable for the torts of policemen or other officers engaged in the discharge of the duties imposed on them by law" is now a part of our statute law, codified from decisions of this court. Pol. Code, § 744. The principle upon which the cases referred to were based is obviously applicable to like torts committed by county officials. Aside from this, it is also in the Code expressly provided that "a county is not liable to suit for any cause of action unless made so by statute" (Id., § 341); and there is in this state no statute rendering a county liable for any such cause of action as that set forth in the present petition. The question of the liability of a county for torts committed by its officers was fully discussed in the case of Millwood v. Dekalb Co., 106 Ga. 743, 32 S. E. 577. See the opinion of Mr. Justice Cobb and the authorities therein cited. Counsel for the plaintiff in error sought to bring this case within the ruling announced in Barfield v. Macon Co. (Ga.) 34 S. E. 596, following the decision in Smith v. Floyd Co., 85 Ga. 420, 11 S. E. 850, in which it was held that, "construing the constitution of 1877 and the Code together, a right of action exists against a county for damaging private property for public uses in constructing the approaches to a county bridge, thereby elevating the roadway above an adjacent lot, so as to hinder access to the lot from the road." These cases, however, turned upon the constitutional right of persons whose property is taken or damaged for public uses to have just and adequate compensation for the same, and the corresponding liability which would necessarily attach when the taking or damaging was done by a county in its capacity as a public corporation. Manifestly, the framers of the constitution contemplated that counties, in making public improvements, would take or damage private property, and accordingly the constitutional provision above referred to was held to create a right, irrespective of express legislative enactment, to bring an action against a county in such cases. The whole subject is fully discussed by Chief Justice Bleckley in the case cited from 85 Ga. and 11 S. E., and therefore need not now be further elaborated. The present case is of an altogether different character. While it is true that the constitution declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property except by due process of law," there is nothing in that instrument which either expressly or by implication imposes upon counties a liability for the tortious acts of any officer committed in violation of this provision of our fundamental law. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

ADAMS v. CARNES.

EXECUTION—CLAIM OF THIRD PARTY—WITHDRAWAL—DAMAGES—FRIVOLOUS APPEAL—NEW TRIAL.

1. The privilege given by the statute to a claimant to withdraw his claim one time without the consent of the plaintiff in fi. fa. must be exercised before a judgment has been rendered finding the property subject, and assessing damages because the claim was interposed for delay only; and when, after such a judgment has been rendered in a justice's court, an appeal therefrom is taken to the superior court, the claimant has no right in the latter court to withdraw his claim without the consent of the plaintiff.

2. There being in this case no finding by the jury as to the value of the property levied upon, the court erred in adjudging that the 10 per cent. damages which they found against the claimant because, in their opinion, the claim was filed for delay only, should be assessed upon the full amount of the execution; for, under section 4627 of the Civil Code, this cannot be done unless the value of the property in dispute exceeds that amount, and, in the absence of any finding that such is the fact, there is no lawful basis for making such an assessment.

3. Inasmuch as the provisions of the Code in relation to the assessment of damages for entering a frivolous appeal are necessarily applicable to those cases only in which money verdicts are rendered, and cannot be enforced in claim cases, the court committed further error in giving judgment against the claimant for 20 per cent. of the amount of the execution as damages for entering an appeal which the jury found was frivolous.

4. Since, however, the commission of errors in entering a judgment affords no cause for granting a new trial, but should be made the subject-matter of a direct bill of exceptions, the grounds of the motion for a new trial now under review, complaining of the errors pointed out in the two preceding notes, were entirely without legal merit.

5. The evidence in this case demanded the verdict returned by the jury. This being so, the general grounds of the motion for a new trial afforded no reason for setting the verdict aside; and as the only special ground of that motion, other than those relating to the errors committed in rendering the judgment, is based upon the refusal to allow the claim to be withdrawn, which ruling was right, there was no cause whatever for granting a new trial, and the court erred in so doing.

Error from superior court, Bartow county; A. W. Fite, Judge.

Action by J. J. Adams against one Carnes. On levy of execution, Emma J. Carnes, defendant's wife, interposed a claim. The property was found subject in the justice court, and, on appeal to superior court, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff in execution, and a new trial was granted. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Jas. B. Conyers, for plaintiff in error. Thos. W. Milner, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. An execution issued from a justice's court in favor of Adams against Carnes for the principal sum of $100, besides interest and costs of suit, and was levied on two mules, as the property of the defendant; and a claim was interposed by Emma J. Carnes, his wife. On the trial of the issue in the justice's court the property was found subject, with a judgment for damages, the justice having found that the claim was interposed for delay only. An appeal was entered to the superior court, and the jury there returned a verdict that the property levied on and claimed was subject, and that the claim was frivolous and intended for delay only, and assessed 10 per cent. damages against the claimant. The jury also found that the appeal was frivolous. On this verdict a judgment was rendered in the superior court that the execution do proceed, and that the plaintiff in fi. fa. recover of the claimant $14.99 as damages, because the claim was frivolous and intended for delay only, this sum being 10 per cent. of the principal and interest appearing to be due on the fi. fa. It was also further adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the claimant the further sum of $29.98 as damages because the appeal was found to be frivolous and intended for delay only, this last sum being 20 per cent. of the amount of the execution. The claimant made a motion for a new trial on the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and evidence, and because the court erred in refusing to permit the claimant to withdraw her claim on the trial of the appeal in the superior court, it being the first withdrawal insisted on by the claimant. The motion also contained two other grounds, which will be noticed below. A new trial was granted, and the plaintiff sued out a bill of exceptions, alleging that the court erred in granting a new trial. No cross bill of exceptions, alleging error in entering the judgment, was sued out by the claimant.

1. There was no merit in the special ground of the motion for a new trial alleging error in the refusal of the court to allow the withdrawal of the claim. We are of the opinion that after the case had reached the superior court on appeal from a judgment in the justice's court, which had determined the property to be subject to the execution, and assessed damages because, in the opinion of the justice, the claim was interposed for delay only, the claimant had no right to withdraw her claim. It is true that section 4625 of the Civil Code negatively grants the right to a claimant to withdraw or discontinue a claim one time without the consent of the plaintiff in execution. Explanations have been attempted to be made of this provision of our statute, from time to time, which are not altogether satisfactory; but, without regard to the wisdom or justice of granting this privilege, this court is committed to the doctrine that it must be exercised before a judgment has been rendered assessing damages in favor of the plaintiff in execution. Attaway v. Dyer, 8 Ga. 184. That case was tried when the laws providing for an appeal from one jury to another in the superior court were in force. On the first jury trial the property was found subject, together with 50 per cent. damages for delay. From this verdict the claimant appealed, and, after the appeal, moved to withdraw his claim. The court ruled that it could not be done after such a verdict. It is true that the appeal in that case was not made from a justice's court, but the principle ruled in the case is that this privilege of withdrawal must be exercised before a judgment has been rendered which awarded damages to the plaintiff in fi. fa. The ruling there made covers this case, because, undoubtedly, by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction the property in the case at bar had been found subject, and damages for delay only awarded, and it was that very judgment which the claimant sought to have set aside by an appeal to the superior court. Clearly, she could, within the restrictions imposed by law, have dismissed her appeal; but after an adjudication on the merits of the claim case, on a verdict finding damages against her for delay, and an appeal taken from the judgment rendered, there is not, as we understand the law, any privilege on the part of the claimant to withdraw her claim. See Strickland v. Maddox, 9 Ga. 196; Parker v. Beeman, 28 Ga. 475; Renneker v. McMichael, 33 Ga. 94.

2. One of the grounds of the motion for a new trial above referred to alleged that the judge erred in including in the judgment an award of the 10 per cent. damages which the jury found against the claimant because, in their opinion, the claim was filed for delay only. We are of the opinion that in this respect the court did commit error, for there was no finding as to the value of the property levied upon. Indeed, there was no evidence on this subject. Section 4627 of the Civil Code provides that, on the trial of claims to property which are pending in the superior court, when damages shall be found by the jury they shall be assessed upon the whole amount then due upon the execution, provided the value of the property in dispute exceeds the amount of the execution, and upon the value of the property when it is less than the amount of the execution which had been levied. In this case the damages which were found by the jury were assessed upon the whole amount of the execution, without any proof of the value of the property on which the execution was levied, or any finding by the jury as to this matter. In the absence of such a finding, no legal assessment of the damages could have been made, and the court therefore erred in assessing the damages on the amount of the execution.

3. In their verdict the jury declared that the appeal was frivolous and intended for delay, and the court thereupon entered a judgment, also, for 20 per cent. on the amount of the plaintiff's execution against the claimant. This, we think, was also error. By section 4473 of the Civil Code it is provided that if on the trial of any appeal, except from a justice's court, it appears to the jury that the appeal was frivolous and intended for delay only, they shall assess damages against the appellant, in favor of the respondent, for such delay, not exceeding 25 per cent. on the principal sum which they shall find due, and, if the judgment of the superior court should be that an appeal from a justice's court is frivolous and intended for delay only, said court shall, in addition to the final judgment in the case, enter judgment against the appellant for 20 per cent. damages on said frivolous appeal. Evidently the presiding judge applied these provisions to the case at bar, but, in our opinion, they cannot be made applicable to a claim case, but only to cases of appeal, wherein the jury returns a verdict for a sum of money. This is undoubtedly correct, because the provisions of the section are intended to impose a penalty on litigants who enter an appeal to the superior court on grounds which are frivolous, for the purpose of delaying the processes of the courts. In claim cases a separate provision to accomplish the same purpose is made by statute. In the trial of all claim cases the jury is invested with full power to fix such penalty on the claimant, in the nature of damages, as they think proper, not less than 10 per cent., where it is determined that the claim is interposed for delay. The section which authorizes damages to be assessed for a frivolous appeal contemplates two classes of cases: The first is a case where the appeal is entered from a court other than a justice's court, where a verdict for money is rendered on the appeal. In such a case, if the jury are of the opinion that the appeal was frivolous and intended for delay, they shall assess damages against the appellant, not exceeding 25 per cent. on the amount they shall find to be due. The second is that if, on the trial of an appeal from a justice's court, the judge of the superior court determines that the appeal was frivolous and intended for delay only, he shall, in addition to the final judgment, enter a judgment against the appellant for 20 per cent. damages. In each case a final money judgment must express a sum on which a given per cent. shall be assessed.

4. While it is clear that the court erred in the particulars pointed out in the two preceding divisions of this opinion, it was not permissible to attempt to review these errors by motion for a new trial. If anything is well settled, it is that the commission of errors in entering a judgment affords no cause for granting a new trial, but the same should be made the subject-matter of a direct bill of exceptions. It follows, without doubt, that the two grounds of the motion for a new trial now under consideration were entirely without legal merit, and that it was improper to set the verdict aside and grant a new trial for the reasons set forth in these grounds.

5. The verdict which the jury rendered in this case was absolutely demanded by the evidence. This being so, the general grounds of the motion for a new trial afforded no reason whatever for setting the verdict aside; and having shown that the one special ground of that motion, other than those relating to the errors committed in rendering the judgment, is based upon the refusal to allow the withdrawal of the claim, which ruling, we have undertaken to show, was correct, it follows that the motion for a new trial had not in it a single meritorious ground. The court therefore erred in setting aside the verdict, and this is so although this was the first grant of a new trial in this case. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

QUIROUET v. ALABAMA G. S. R. CO.

INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. An employé of a railroad company, who was injured in undertaking to mount a rapidly moving flat car by placing his foot upon the lid of the journal box, and seizing a standard which had been inserted in an opening in the side of the car in order to prevent the freight thereon from falling off, was not, either under the general rules of law or any Alabama statute, entitled to a recovery on the ground that the standard slipped in the socket and caused him to fall, when there was no testimony tending to show that the standard was placed on the car as a means of mounting the same, but, on the contrary, positive testimony that it was not placed there or intended to be used for that purpose.

2. When an employé has his choice of two ways in which to perform a duty, the one safe, though inconvenient, and the other dangerous, he is bound to select the safe method; and if, instead of so doing, he elects to pursue the dangerous way, and is, in consequence, injured, he is guilty of such negligence as will bar an action for damages against the master. The principle here announced is recognized law in the state of Alabama.

3. If there was, in the present case, any evidence tending to show that the plaintiff acted in an emergency, it was one of his own making, and the defendant company could not be held responsible on the theory that it had by its negligence placed him in such a position as to relieve him of the duty of exercising ordinary care for his own safety.

4. The evidence demanded a verdict for the defendant, and there was no error in directing the jury to find accordingly.

Error from city court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by A. J. Quirouet against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Westmoreland Bros., for plaintiff in error. Dorsey, Brewster & Howell and A. Heymans, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Quirouet brought suit in the city court of Atlanta against the Alabama Great Southern Railroad Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Alabama, for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been brought about by the negligence of the defendant. At the trial the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted.

The case, taken in its most favorable light for the plaintiff, will appear from the following summary of the evidence: The plaintiff testified that he was employed by the defendant as a flagman on one of its freight trains, and that, on the occasion on which he was injured, the train had entered a side track to let a passenger train pass. After the latter train had gone by, the freight train backed out from the side track onto the main line. "He had performed all he was required to do when he turned the switch to let the train back out." The train had a caboose attached, with steps to it. The plaintiff sought to mount the fourth car from the caboose. The brakes on this car, which the plaintiff had himself "put on," were causing the wheels to slide and smoke, and his purpose in mounting the car was to release the brakes. When brakes are on so tight as to cause the wheels to slide, there is danger of the wheels bursting, and thus causing the train to be wrecked. The journal box upon which he stepped was sometimes called the "grease box." The wheels of the car are fastened to the axle, and the wheel and the axle both turn. The axle passes through the journal box, which has a lid on it, placed somewhat like the roof of a house,—a little slanting. Grease and waste are put in the journal box to keep it from getting warm. There was no hand hold on the car, or other means provided for mounting this car. The train was running at the rate of five or six miles an hour. When the plaintiff attempted to mount the car, it was necessary for him to take hold of a large standard, which was on the car for the purpose of preventing the pipes with which the car was loaded from rolling off, and place his foot upon the journal box, and in this way mount. The standard was so large that he could not grasp it, but was required to throw his hand and wrist around it, and as he did so, and placed his foot upon the journal box, and threw his weight on the standard, it turned with him, threw him down, and threw his foot off the journal box under the wheels of the car, which passed over his ankle, foot, and leg, and caused him to sustain painful and serious injuries. The socket in which the standard worked was square, and the standard was round, and not properly fitted in it, or it would not have turned. The plaintiff further testified that it was the custom of the employés to mount the car in the way he sought to do, but there was no evidence showing that the company knew of this custom and assented to it. The defendant introduced in evidence a copy of one of its rules in force at the time the plaintiff was injured, which declared that the defendant's employés must not attempt to get on or off trains while in motion, and that, if they did so, it would be at their own peril and risk. Certain statutes of Alabama were introduced in evidence by the plaintiff, the following being so much of the same as are material to the present investigation: "When a personal injury is received by a servant or employé in the service or business of the master or employer, the master or employer is liable to answer in damage to such servant or employé, as if he were a stranger, and not engaged in such service or employment, in the cases following: When the injury is caused by reason of any defects in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the master or employer. When such injury is caused by reason of the negligence of any person in the service or employment of the master or employer, who has the charge or control of any signal, point, locomotive engine, switch, car, or train upon a railway, or of any part of the track of a railway."

1. It is a general rule of law that a servant cannot recover of the master for injuries resulting from the use of machinery or appliances for a purpose for which they were not intended by the master, and for which it was not necessary that they should be used, however defective such appliances may be. In undertaking to use an appliance for a purpose for which it was not intended by the master, the servant takes upon himself the risk incident to such use. Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 402; Bailey, Mast. Liab. p. 22; 1 Shear. & R. Neg. p. 346, and numerous cases cited in note 4; Hamilton v. Railroad Co., 83 Ga. 346; 9 S. E. 670; Railroad Co. v. Dickey, 90 Ga. 491, 16 S. E. 212; Railway Co. v. Reynolds, 93 Ga. 570, 20 S. E. 70. This rule is not contravened by the statute of Alabama above quoted, or any statute introduced in evidence, and it will be presumed that the general law on the subject is of force in that state. Applying this rule to the facts of the present case, we do not think the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover on the theory that the standard was defective. The standard was not placed on the car for the purpose of being used by employés in mounting the car. It was placed there to prevent the pipes from rolling off, and was suitable for this purpose. The fact that the standard was round, and did not fit the socket, which was square, is not a matter about which the plaintiff can complain, unless there was a necessity for him to use the standard for that purpose at that time in order to properly discharge the duties imposed upon him by the master.

2. There was, however, according to the evidence, no such necessity. The car he attempted to mount was the fourth car from the caboose, and the latter could have been easily and safely mounted by steps. This, therefore, was the safer and less dangerous method of reaching the brake which needed attention. Nor was it necessary for the plaintiff to remain at the switch until the caboose had passed, for he testified that he had performed all he was required to do when he turned the switch to let the train back out. While it was more inconvenient, still he could have reached the car by going first upon the caboose or other cars, which had appropriate appliances for use in going upon them, and it was his duty to have used the more appropriate and less dangerous method. In such a case, the use of the more dangerous method, even though it be the one of greater convenience, would preclude a recovery if injury results. This principle was recognized by the supreme court of Alabama in the case of Railroad Co. v. George, 94 Ala. 200, 10 South. 145, cited in Railway Co. v. Harbin (Ga.) 36 S. E. 218. In the Alabama case it was held: "If there are two apparent ways of discharging the required service, one more dangerous than the other, the employé is bound to select the latter, and is guilty of such negligence as will bar an action for damages if he selects the former, and is thereby injured."

3. If the locking of the wheel and consequent danger to the train, and the failure to mount the caboose or other cars with proper appliances for that purpose, brought about an emergency, it was one of the plaintiff's own creation, and he will not be allowed to take any advantage therefrom. See, in this connection, Briscoe v. Railway Co., 103 Ga. 224, 28 S. E. 638.

4. We think there was no possible view of the case which would have justified a recovery for the plaintiff, but that his injuries were the result of his own gross negligence in the premises. There was therefore no error in directing the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

BOMAR v. EQUITABLE MORTG. CO.

NOTE—ACTION BY PAYEE—TITLE.

The payee of a promissory note, in possession of the same, is presumed to own it, although his indorsement thereon, in full or in blank, may stand uncanceled. He may sue upon such note, and his title to the same cannot be inquired into, unless it be necessary for the protection of the defendant, or to let in the defense which he seeks to make.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Douglas county; C. G. Janes, Judge.

Action by the Equitable Mortgage Company against Parker M. Bomar. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

L. R. Ray, for plaintiff in error. Payne & Tye, J. A. Noyes, and J. S. James, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. The Equitable Mortgage Company brought suit against Parker M. Bomar upon two promissory notes; one being for the principal sum due, and the other being an interest coupon note. Both notes were payable to the order of the plaintiff. When the notes were offered in evidence by the plaintiff upon the trial, the following entry appeared upon the back of the principal note: "American Loan and Trust Company, Trustee for Debenture Holders under Agreement with Equitable Mortgage Company, October 15, 1896. Equitable Mortgage Company, by Chas. B. Hobbs, Assistant Treasurer." The defendant objected to the notes going in evidence "because it appeared from the indorsement upon the principal note that the plaintiff had parted with its title to said notes before the filing of said suit, and that the right of action was in the American Loan & Trust Company, trustee, and not in said plaintiff." The objection was overruled, and the notes admitted in evidence. Defendant excepted and assigned error upon this ruling of the court. We are of opinion that there is no merit in the exception. The note was in possession of the payee, and the presumption was that it was the owner, notwithstanding its indorsement upon the note stood uncanceled, and it had a right to sue thereon in its own name. In Dugan v. U. S., 3 Wheat. 172, 4 L. Ed. 362, it was held "that if any person who indorses a bill of exchange to another, whether for value or for the purpose of collection, shall come to the possession thereof again, he shall be regarded, unless the contrary appear in evidence, as the bona fide holder and proprietor of such bill, and shall be entitled to recover, notwithstanding there may be on it one or more indorsements in full, subsequent to the one to him, without producing any receipt or indorsement back from either of such indorsees, whose names he may strike from the bill, or not, as he may think proper." In Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1198, the rule is stated to be that, "where there appears on the paper the plaintiff's own indorsement, it will be presumed either that he had not perfected his indorsement by delivery, or that the paper has been returned to him as his own property, and in either case he has the right to sue upon it." In 2 Rand. Com. Paper, § 717, the author says: "The payee's possession of a bill or note is prima facie evidence of title in him, notwithstanding his own indorsement is erased, and even, it has been held, notwithstanding his own special indorsement, or indorsement in blank, uncanceled." To the same effect, see 3 Rand. Com. Paper, § 1645, and 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 280. There are numerous adjudicated cases to this effect cited by the authorities above referred to, and there can be no question but that the great weight of judicial opinion sustains the doctrine. It is true that this court held in Southern Bank of Georgia v. Mechanics' Sav. Bank, 27 Ga. 252, that, "where a bill of exchange or draft is indorsed in full by the payee, suit cannot be maintained in the name of the payee while the indorsement stands." The decision, however, was rendered by only two judges, and we are therefore not compelled to follow it. In Leitner v. Miller, 49 Ga. 486, it appeared that Miller sued C. B. Leitner, as principal, and S. A. Leitner, as indorser, on a note made by C. B. Leitner, payable to S. A. Leitner or bearer, and indorsed as follows: "S. A. Leitner. J. V. H. Allen, Treasurer. L. H. Miller. Pay I. C. Plant, or order, for collection." The plaintiff introduced the note and closed, when the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the ground that plaintiff had shown title out of himself by his indorsement on the note sued on. The motion was overruled, and the defendant excepted. This court held that, "although plaintiff's name may be on the back of the note sued on, he may recover against the maker, as the law will presume, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that an indorsement by him was never completed by delivery, or, if he had delivered it so indorsed, that he had taken it up, and was again the legal holder or indorsee."

When the objection of the defendant to the introduction of the notes in the present case was overruled, he tendered what he termed a "plea in abatement," which was, in effect, the same as the objection urged by him to the admission of the notes in evidence, alleging that knowledge of the fact that title to the notes sued on was not in the plaintiff had just come to him, by reason of the indorsement upon the principal note not having been entered upon the copy note attached to the copy declaration served upon him. Upon objection by the plaintiff, this plea was disallowed, and the defendant assigns error upon this ruling. The plea was not verified, and it does not appear upon what ground the court based its order disallowing it. It is clear, however, that there was no error in this ruling of the court. Section 3698 of the Civil Code provides that "the title of the holder of a note cannot be inquired into unless it is necessary for the protection of the defendant, or to let in the defense which he seeks to make." It was not pretended that it was necessary to attack the plaintiff's title to the notes for the protection of the defendant, or to let in any defense which he sought to make. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

FULGHUM v. FULGHUM.

WIDOW'S SUPPORT—JUDGMENT.

The administrator of an estate from which a year's support for the widow of the intestate has been duly and finally set apart in money cannot, when an execution has been issued against him for the collection of the same, go behind the judgment for the purpose of showing that he is entitled to a credit upon the judgment for money advanced by him from the estate to the widow upon her year's support, before it was finally set aside.

Little, J., dissenting.

Error from superior court, Pulaski county; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by M. J. Fulghum against A. R. Fulghum as administrator. Judgment for plaintiff. On levy of execution, administrator files affidavit of liability. Motion to dismiss overruled, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Martin, for plaintiff in error. Jordan & Watson, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. An execution in favor of Mrs. M. J. Fulghum against A. R. Fulghum, as administrator of the estate of R. G. Fulghum, based upon a judgment rendered, upon appeal from the court of ordinary, in the superior court of Pulaski county, on the 10th of August, 1898, was levied upon certain land in that county. To this levy the administrator filed an affidavit of illegality, upon the following grounds: "(1) Because the judgment upon which said fi. fa. is issued against him, as administrator, is founded upon a suit by the plaintiff for her twelve months' support from the estate of her husband, R. G. Fulghum, assessing the amount of said support at six hundred and fifty dollars. (2) That deponent has paid and held, and now holds, the receipt of said Mrs. Fulghum for one hundred and two dollars, as a part of her said twelve months' support, dated the 28th day of January, 1898, which is a part of the allowance for her said twelve months' support, and which is a credit to the amount of the judgment for the amount of said receipt and the interest thereon. (3) That this receipt, and the amount thereof, was never pleaded as a part payment of said support at the trial, and the verdict of the jury in the case, when tried, was intended to cover the whole amount allowed said plaintiff for her said twelve months' support. (4) Deponent further says that he has paid to the sheriff the amount of said fi. fa., less the amount of said receipt and interest, for which amount said fi. fa. is legally proceeding." Plaintiff in fi. fa. moved to dismiss this affidavit of illegality upon the following grounds: "(1) No good and sufficient ground or grounds are set forth in the affidavit of illegality to arrest the fi. fa.; (2) that the affidavit of illegality seeks to go behind the judgment; (3) that neither of the grounds or all of the grounds in the affidavit of illegality combined are sufficient to support the affidavit of illegality." This motion was overruled, and the plaintiff in execution excepted.

The judgment is for $650, and for this amount the execution was proceeding. The administrator, in his affidavit of illegality, claims that he is entitled to have credited upon this judgment the sum of $102, which he alleges he paid to Mrs. Fulghum upon her year's support before the judgment was rendered. It is very evident that, if this were an ordinary judgment, an affidavit of illegality which set up a payment made to the plaintiff in execution prior to the rendition of the judgment would have no standing in court, as it would seek to go behind the judgment. Unless, therefore, the effect of a judgment setting apart a year's support is different from that of other judgments, this affidavit of illegality is without merit. Recognizing the general rule,—that an affidavit of illegality cannot go behind a valid judgment,—the plaintiff in error contends that a judgment setting apart a year's support simply determines the proper amount which should be allowed out of the assets of the estate for such support, and does not preclude the representative of the estate from showing that this amount, or some portion of it, was received by the beneficiary or beneficiaries before the rendition of the judgment. We do not think that this contention is sound. The proposition that any judgment can be paid in advance of its rendition is, to say the least, a novel one. The law provides that, when application is made for a year's support, it shall be the duty of the ordinary, on notice to the representative of the estate, if there be one, and, if none, without notice, to appoint five discreet appraisers, whose duty it shall be to set apart and assign, either in property or money, a sufficiency from the estate for a year's support. Civ. Code, § 3405. The appraisers are required to file their return with the ordinary, and upon the filing thereof he is required to issue citation and publish notice citing all persons concerned to show cause why said application should not be granted. If no objection is made after the publication of the notice once a week for four weeks, or, if made, is disallowed, the ordinary shall record the return so made in a book to be kept for that purpose. Id. § 3467. "Such a record has the binding force and effect of any other judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction." Birt v. Brown, 106 Ga. 23, 31 S. E. 765; Josey v. Gordon, 107 Ga. 110, 32 S. E. 951. That it has the binding force and effect of a judgment is shown by section 3468, which provides that the title to property set apart shall vest in the beneficiary or beneficiaries, and the same shall not be administered as the estate of the decedent; and also by section 3471, which provides that the ordinary may issue execution against the representative of the estate for an amount in money which is set apart as a year's support. "Every presumption is in favor of the judgment of the ordinary setting apart a year's support, and it cannot be collaterally attacked." Tabb v. Collier, 68 Ga. 641; Goss v. Greenaway, 70 Ga. 130. In Wells v. Wilder, 36 Ga. 194, it was held: "Whenever the widow applies for an assignment of the year's support, she must be charged with the value of what she previously consumed." In Tabb v. Collier, supra, the judgment setting aside the year's support was attacked upon the ground that the family had already consumed enough of the property of the estate to amount to a 12 months' support before such support was formally set apart. The court, as we have seen, held that the judgment could not be collaterally attacked; and Crawford, J., delivering the opinion, said: "But it is insisted that this family had a year's support before this was set apart, the husband and father having been dead some years before the application was made; and cases are cited to sustain that view. The principle here invoked is to be applied before, not after, the final judgment of the ordinary has been pronounced. Every presumption is in favor of their judgments, nor are they to be collaterally attacked, except where the record shows a want of jurisdictional facts." The decision rendered in that case was followed in Goss v. Greenaway, supra, where it was held that, "while lapse of time between the death of a husband and the application of his wife for a year's support, during which time she lived upon the land and made use of the personalty of her deceased husband, may furnish a good ground to defeat the application before the ordinary, yet when final judgment of that court has been rendered in the case, it is too late to attack it, especially before another court, except for causes apparent upon the face of the record, showing a want of jurisdiction either of the person or subject-matter." These decisions are directly in point. If, in determining and fixing the amount which is to be allowed and set apart as a year's support, the widow must be charged with the value of what she has previously consumed, it would seem to follow that, when the year's support has been finally set aside, the presumption is that the amount, in value, of the assets of the estate, if any, which she consumed prior to the setting apart of the 12 months' support, was taken into consideration when the judgment for such support was rendered. As the title to specific property set apart vests in the beneficiaries, it is apparent that the representative of the estate cannot, after the title to such property has vested, deprive them of such property, or of any portion of the same, upon the ground that they had received, in whole or in part, their year's support, before the same was formally set aside. If the representative of the estate cannot, either in whole or in part, question the title of the beneficiaries to specific property set apart, how can he, if a definite sum of money is set apart, question the right of the beneficiaries to receive from the estate in his hands the whole of the designated sum? Surely, the right to specific property set apart is no more secure or sacred than the right to money set aside as a year's support. In the present case, if the judgment of court, instead of setting apart $650 in money, had set apart to the widow, as her year's support, a described portion of the land belonging to the estate, of equal value, the title to such land would have vested at once in her, and the administrator could not afterwards have been heard to say: "Mrs. Fulghum is not entitled to receive all of this land, because, before it was set apart, I advanced to her $102, which was to be credited against her year's support when the same should be set aside." A complete answer to such a claim upon his part would be: "You ought to have made this question before the judgment setting apart the year's support was rendered. Not having made it then, you cannot be heard now, because to sustain your contention would be to override the law, which declares that the property set apart as a year's support shall vest in the beneficiary or beneficiaries." He occupies no better position because of the fact that, instead of specific property, a designated sum of money has been set apart. He can no more reduce a sum of money which a judgment setting aside a year's support requires him, as the representative of the estate, to pay to the widow, than he could deprive her of any portion of specific property which had been so set apart. As the title to all the property set apart as a 12 months' support vests in the beneficiary or beneficiaries, so the right to receive all the money so set apart vests. If Mrs. Fulghum was paid the amount stated in the affidavit of illegality, upon her year's support, by the administrator, the time for him to have made this showing was before the judgment in her favor against the estate was rendered. Everything which lies behind that judgment is concluded by it. The motion to dismiss the illegality should have been sustained. The decision now made is entirely consistent with that rendered in King v. Johnson, 94 Ga. 665, 21 S. E. 895. In that case this court distinctly recognized the rule that the return of the appraisers, when duly allowed, became final as to the amount of the year's support, and the effect of the decision simply was that, as against the judgment setting apart the year's support, the widow could be compelled to account for money of the estate actually in her hands, which was received by her as administratrix, and out of which the year's support should have been paid by her. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except LITTLE, J., dissenting.

DEED—CONSTRUCTION—FORFEITURE—RECORD—PAYMENT—CONVEYANCE BY FIRM.

1. An instrument in the form of a deed purported to convey to named grantees, their heirs and assigns, at a specified price per acre, "all the pine timber suitable for sawmill purposes" on described lots of land. It acknowledged receipt of a specified sum, and recited that the grantor agreed "that the amounts left unpaid this day shall be paid as follows: When each lot is entered to cut said timber, the balance due on each lot is one hundred dollars, which will be due as above stated." The instrument also purported to convey to the grantees, their heirs and assigns, "the full right of way for railroads, tramroads, and wagonroads in and through the said lands for the purposes above stated; said right of way to continue as long as said mill operations may require." Held: (a) That the true intent and meaning of this instrument was to convey to the grantees, their heirs and assigns, all the timber suitable at the date of the instrument for the purposes indicated, but that it was incumbent on the grantees, or their successors in title, to cut and remove such timber from the lots within a reasonable time from the date of the conveyance, and that on failure so to do their interest in the timber ceased and determined; (b) that what would be a reasonable time for so doing was a question of fact to be passed upon and decided in the light of all the facts and circumstances surrounding the transaction; (c) that inasmuch as the instrument in question conveyed an interest in realty, though the estate was determinable, it was entitled to be recorded, and, if duly recorded, it was admissible in evidence without proof of execution; (d) that, under such an instrument, payment of the balance of the purchase money due on each lot was not a condition precedent to the right to enter and cut the timber.

2. Where a grant was made to a partnership composed of two persons, even if a conveyance by them of the property therein described was not properly executed if only signed by the partnership, yet where such conveyance purported to be to another partnership, composed of these two persons and another, if the latter partnership conveyed the property by a deed executed by each of the three partners, and also signed in the firm name, the title to the property passed to the grantee named in that conveyance.

3. As the trial judge did not properly construe the instrument referred to in the first of the above notes, and as the case was tried under a misapprehension of its true intent and meaning, the judgment directing a verdict for the plaintiffs was erroneous, and there should be another hearing in the light of what is here laid down.

Error from superior court, Montgomery county; C. C. Smith, Judge.

Action by Stillwell, Millen & Co. against John McRae and others. Judgment against defendant McRae, and he brings error. Reversed.

W. G. Brantley and J. H. Martin, for plaintiff in error. A. C. Wright, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Stillwell, Millen & Co. brought suit against McRae and others, alleging in their petition that the defendants had damaged them by cutting large quantities of pine timber, the property of the plaintiffs, which was growing on a described lot of land, and that the defendants were still cutting such timber. The prayer of the petition was that the defendants be enjoined from cutting the timber, and from removing or otherwise interfering with that which had already been cut. The defendant McRae appeared and answered the petition, and assumed responsibility for the acts of the other defendants, and the case proceeded against him alone. At the trial the court directed the jury to find a verdict that the defendant be perpetually enjoined from cutting the timber on the land, and that the plaintiffs recover of the defendant a given sum; it being agreed by counsel that, if the plaintiffs were entitled to recover at all, the amount for which the court directed a verdict was the proper sum. The defendant filed a bill of exceptions, assigning error upon the decision of the court directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, and also upon other rulings made during the progress of the trial.

1. The plaintiffs claimed title to the timber as the successors in title of Peacock & Peterson, who were the grantees in a deed from the defendant McRae. The paper was in form a deed, and, in consideration of 75 cents per acre, purported to convey "all the pine timber suitable for sawmill purposes" on eleven described lots of land, each containing 202½ acres. The paper also contained the following clauses: "I acknowledge the receipt of the sum of five hundred and fifty in cash and note dollars this day paid me by the party of the second part, and do agree that the amounts left unpaid this day shall be paid as follows: When each lot is entered to cut said timber, the balance due on each lot is one hundred dollars, which will be due as above stated. And I also, for the above-stated consideration, give, grant, bargain, sell, alien, and convey to said party of the second part, their heirs and assigns, the full right of way for railroads, tramroads and wagonroads in and through the said lands for the purposes above stated; said right of way to continue as long as said mill operations may require. And I will, for myself, my heirs and assigns, the above-named premises, for said sawmill purposes, to the said Peacock & Peterson, their heirs and assigns, forever warrant and defend." It is contended by the plaintiffs that, as they are the successors in title of the grantees in this deed, they are the owners in fee of the timber described in the deed, and that, while they are not the owners of the fee in the land, they have such an interest in the land itself as is necessary for the support and nurture of the trees, which are their property; that they have the right to enter upon the land whenever they desire to remove these trees for the purposes indicated in the deed, and lapse of time does not at all interfere with this right. On the other hand, the defendant contends that while the effect of the conveyance was to pass to the grantees and their successors in title an absolute interest in the trees, construing the paper as a whole it was not the intention of the parties that the grantees should have a perpetual right to enter and remove the standing timber on the land, and that their estate in the trees was by the very language of the conveyance determinable if the trees were not removed from the land within a reasonable time after the deed was executed. The court gave to the deed the construction contended for by the plaintiffs, and refused to allow the defendant to introduce evidence tending to show that a reasonable time to cut and remove the trees had elapsed. Counsel for defendant (the plaintiff in error here) contended that the estate of the plaintiffs in the trees had determined, and the title to the same become revested in the defendant, and that, this being true, the acts complained of in the petition did not constitute any wrong as against the plaintiffs.

Counsel for plaintiffs (defendants in error here) contend that this case is controlled by the decision in Baxter v. Mattox, 106 Ga. 344, 32 S. E. 94, and it appears from the record that the judge placed his ruling in construing the deed upon that decision. We think, however, there is a clear distinction between the two cases. The deed in that case conveyed the timber and growing trees "suitable for sawmill purposes, and being manufactured into lumber, now upon, or that may hereafter grow upon," the land, and also conveyed to the grantee, his heirs and assigns, the right and privilege "now and at any and all times hereafter" to enter upon the land for the purpose of cutting such timber. The terms of that deed clearly manifested an intention on the part of the grantor to convey to the grantee a perpetual right to enter upon the land and cut and remove the timber and trees,—not only the trees that were growing at the date of the conveyance, but also any trees that might thereafter grow, although not in existence at the time the deed was made. As remarked by Mr. Justice Lewis in that case, "If it be possible to convey such a license in perpetuity, it would be difficult to conceive how such an intention could be more clearly expressed than it is in this deed." In the present case, however, the conveyance, so far as the timber is concerned, is limited to the timber suitable for sawmill purposes on the land at the date of the conveyance. While the conveyance does not in express terms so declare, no other conclusion can be reached from the language therein employed. In addition to this, the deed contains a provision that the grantees shall have the right of way for railroads, tramroads, and wagonroads through the land; "said right of way to continue as long as said mill operations may require"; and the warranty clause of the deed declares that the grantor will forever warrant and defend "the premises, for said sawmill purposes," to the grantees, their heirs and assigns. It would seem that nothing could be clearer than that it was the intention of the parties to this instrument that the grantees should become the owners of the timber suitable for sawmill purposes growing on the land at the date of the execution of the deed, and that such timber was to be removed from the premises within a reasonable time after the execution of the conveyance. The expression, that the right of way through the land was to "continue as long as said sawmill operations may require," strongly indicates that it was not the intention of the parties to this instrument that the right to enter and remove the timber should continue in perpetuity, but was to come to an end at some time in the future. What that time was cannot be declared to be other than what would be a reasonable time to be allowed for the removal of the timber according to the circumstances of the case. In the case of Baxter v. Mattox a perpetual right to enter was absolutely necessary to carry out the purpose of the parties as indicated by the terms of the deed. In the present case, if the right to enter and remove is given for a reasonable time, the purpose of the parties as indicated by the terms of the conveyance can be thoroughly accomplished. It is contended, however, by counsel for the defendants in error, that the rule laid down in Washburn on Real Property, which is quoted in the opinion of Mr. Justice Lewis in Baxter v. Mattox, is decisive of the case in their favor. The rule referred to is as follows: "But if the owner of land grants the trees growing thereon to another and his heirs, with liberty to cut and carry away at his pleasure, forever, the grantee acquires an estate in fee in the trees, with an interest in the soil sufficient for their growth, while the fee in the soil itself remains in the grantor." 1 Washb. Real Prop. 16. The authorities cited by the author to support that proposition are Clap v. Draper, 4 Mass. 266, and Knotts v. Hydrick, 12 Rich. Law, 314. In Clap v. Draper it was held that "grant to one, his heirs and assigns, of all the trees and timber standing and growing on certain lands, forever, with liberty to cut and carry them away, conveys an estate of inheritance in the trees and timber, and the grantee can maintain trespass quare clausum fregit against the owner of the soil for cutting down the trees." There was no question in that case as to whether under such a conveyance, the right to remove the trees was a perpetual right, or one determina-ble after the expiration of a reasonable time. In Knotts v. Hydrick it was held that when growing timber trees are reserved for the grantor, and excepted from a conveyance of the fee, the grantor has not only an estate in the trees, but also an interest in so much of the soil as is necessary to sustain them, and such estate cannot be terminated at the will of the grantee by giving the grantor reasonable notice to remove the trees. Upon a careful examination of this case, it will be found to support the contention of counsel for the defendants in error. The judge in the conclusion of his opinion said: "If his convenience be thwarted and his interests affected, as a tiller of the soil, by the interest therein which he has allowed his grantor to retain, a court can only say to him, 'You have entered into the covenant, and must abide its operation.'" In Heflin v. Bingham, 56 Ala. 566, it was held that, when a conveyance of land contained an express reservation and exception of the growing trees suitable for lumber, the title to the trees did not pass to the grantee, but remained in the grantor with the right to enter upon the land and cut and remove them, and that, if no time was specified in the contract within which the trees were to be cut and removed, it must be done within a reasonable time, and this would be a question to be determined by a jury under all the circumstances of the case. In Boults v. Mitchell, 15 Pa. St. 371, a conveyance of the timber on a tract of land, suitable for rafting and sawing, was held to convey a right which from its nature was determinable, and if the party refuse to exercise his right in a reasonable time, after notice to do so, the right will be terminated, and the privilege of entry gone. In the opinion Bell, J., says: "The grant was in its very nature determinable. The right to cut timber was not to continue forever, at the pleasure of the grantee and his assigns; and if, from the destruction of the trees, the subject of it, or the refusal of the party to exercise his right after a reasonable notice to do so, the right itself is determined, the privilege of entry is gone with it, and the owner of the land may sue for a breach of close, though he may not recover, in damages, the value of trees taken, the property of which is not in him." To the same effect was the ruling in Holt v. Stratton Mills, 54 N. H. 109. See, also, Magnetic Ore Co. v. Marbury Lumber Co. (Ala.) 16 South. 632, 27 L. R. A. 434; Davidson v. Moore (Ky.) 37 S. W. 260. In Rich v. Zeilsdorff, 22 Wis. 544, the right to enter and cut timber was to be exercised within two years; and it was there held that the absolute right of property in the trees was not excepted out of the estate granted, but only a right reserved to enter within two years to cut and remove the trees. To the same effect is Reed v. Merrifield, 10 Metc. (Mass.) 155. While it is possible, as was held in Baxter v. Mattox and Knotts v. Hydrick, supra, for parties to make a contract whereby one would be entitled to a perpetual right to enter upon the land of another and remove timber therefrom, as such an agreement is so unreasonable in its nature no contract will be presumed to have this effect unless it is plainly manifest from the terms of the same that such was the intention of the parties. The language of the deed in the present case not only does not require, but does not authorize, such an interpretation. It is true that the effect of the paper is to pass title to the timber, but the estate in the timber is determinable, and comes to an end after a lapse of time which would be a reasonable time to be allowed to the grantees to enter and remove the timber from the land. Under this construction, after the lapse of a reasonable time the timber again becomes the property of the grantor. Such a construction prevents the anomaly which is apparent in Boults v. Mitchell and Holt v. Stratton Mills, supra, where the instrument under construction in each case was held to authorize an entry for the purpose of removing the timber only for a reasonable time, and that an entry after the lapse of such a time was unlawful, but that, the timber still belonging to the person guilty of making the unlawful entry, the value thereof should not be taken into account in estimating the damages for the trespass.

The court should have allowed the defendant in the court below to introduce evidence from which a jury could find what was a reasonable time to be allowed to the plaintiffs to remove the growing timber from the land, and this question should have been submitted to a jury under instructions that they were to take into consideration all the facts and circumstances of the case, and the conditions surrounding the parties at the time of the execution of the contract, and from this determine what would be a reasonable time to allow the plaintiffs to remove the trees, and, if such a time had elapsed before the defendant commenced cutting the timber, his act would not be wrongful, as against the rights of the plaintiffs. If, on the other hand, the time which elapsed between the execution of the contract and the date at which the defendant commenced to cut the timber on the land was not such as would amount to a reasonable time to be allowed to the plaintiffs to remove the timber from the land, then the defendant would be guilty of a trespass, and would be liable to the plaintiffs for whatever damages they had suffered up to the time of the bringing of the suit, and the plaintiffs would be entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from cutting the timber until after the expiration of such time as the jury should find would be a reasonable time in which the plaintiffs would be allowed to remove the timber from the land. Growing timber is realty. Balkcom v. Lumber Co., 91 Ga. 651, 17 S. E. 1020. And the deed conveying such timber, although the estate therein granted is determinable, conveys land, within the meaning of the registry laws; and therefore such a deed, if duly recorded, was admissible in evidence without proof of execution. Payment of the balance due on the purchase money to the grantor in the deed involved in the present case was not a condition precedent to the entry upon the land by the plaintiffs to cut the timber thereon. The title to the trees passed absolutely upon the execution and delivery of the conveyance. The time when the purchase money was to be paid is fixed in the conveyance, but it does not make payment of the same a condition to be complied with before the title passed. The deed merely fixed the time when the purchase money shall be paid, reciting that a certain part of the same had been paid, and that the amount unpaid was $100 for each lot, and that this amount was to be paid as each lot was entered for the purpose of cutting the timber.

2. Peacock & Peterson sold the timber, title to which was acquired under the deed from McRae, to Peacock, Peterson & Co.; but the deed was not signed by the members of the firm as individuals, but simply in the firm name. It appears that the individuals who composed the firm of Peacock & Peterson subsequently became members of a firm known as Peacock, Peterson & Co., who were the grantees in the deed from Peacock & Peterson. A deed was made by Peacock, Peterson & Co. to the plaintiffs to the timber described in the deed from McRae to Peacock & Peterson; but this deed was signed, not only in the firm name, but also by the individual members of the firm.—Peacock, Peterson, and another. Error is assigned upon the ruling of the judge in allowing the deed from Peacock & Peterson to be introduced in evidence, on the ground that it was improperly executed, not being signed by the individual members of the firm. Even if this ruling was erroneous, it was an immaterial error, for the reason that the question was whether the title had passed out of the individuals composing the firm of Peacock & Peterson into the plaintiffs; and, even if it had not passed out of them by the execution in the firm name of the deed to Peacock, Peterson & Co., when Peacock and Peterson united with their co-partner in the new firm in executing a deed, not only in the firm name, but also in their individual names, then whatever interest they had in the property, either as individuals or as members of the firm of Peacock & Peterson, as between the parties to this transaction, certainly passed to the grantees in the deed executed by the persons composing the firm of Peacock, Peterson & Co.

3. There are other assignments of error, which we do not deem it necessary to deal with in the present case. Under the view that we have taken of the case, the judge erroneously construed the deed, and this error at the outset of the trial resulted in the case having been tried under what appears to us an entire misapprehension of the true intent and meaning of the deed, and many of the questions which were raised at the trial will probably not arise at another hearing. The judgment directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs must be reversed, and a new trial had in the light of what is herein laid down. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., absent on account of sickness.

WILLIAMS v. CITY COUNCIL OF AUGUSTA.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—ILLEGAL SALE—RECORDER'S COURT—JURISDICTION—CERTIORARI.

1. The offense "of retailing spirituous or malt liquors without license," though committed upon the Sabbath day, is a violation of a penal statute of this state. Moran v. City of Atlanta, 30 S. E. 298, 102 Ga. 840.

2. Accordingly, the recorder's court of the city of Augusta has no jurisdiction to try and punish for this offense.

3. Though the plaintiff in error entered in that court a plea of guilty to a charge of the nature above indicated, the recorder had no authority of law to impose a penalty upon him, and it was his right, by petition for certiorari, to correct the error which the recorder committed in so doing.

4. The court erred in refusing to sanction the petition for certiorari.

BAKER v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE—MANSLAUGHTER—INSTRUCTIONS—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. Under the facts disclosed by the record, there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to postpone the trial a second time in order to allow counsel "time for study of case."

2. Neither the evidence nor the statement of the accused would have authorized the trial judge to charge the jury upon the offense of manslaughter. Even if, under the statement, the defense of manslaughter was involved, there was no request to charge upon the subject.

3. The newly-discovered evidence as to the unsoundness of the mind of the accused would, when taken in connection with the counter showing made by the state, not probably produce a different verdict upon another trial.

4. The evidence fully warranted the verdict, and the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to grant a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. S. Candler, Judge.

James L. Baker was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Lee J. Langley, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

SIMMONS, C. J. This case arises upon exceptions taken to the refusal of the court below to grant a motion for a new trial, made by Baker, who had been tried and convicted of murder.

1. The principal ground relied upon here by counsel for the plaintiff in error was the refusal of the judge to continue or postpone the trial of the case upon the facts and circumstances shown in the motion. Counsel had been employed, we infer from the record, at least six days before the trial actually took place. The trial was once postponed for two or three days upon his application, and, when the case was again called, he asked for a further postponement in order that he might study the case. He did not intimate to the court that any of his witnesses were absent, or that he wished time to search for evidence. He simply showed that he had been busy in court with other matters, and wished time for further study of the case. This was a matter entirely within the discretion of the trial judge, who knew the facts and the business in which counsel had been engaged, and who could determine, better than we, whether it was proper to grant the postponement. See Moody v. State, 54 Ga. 660; Charlon v. State, 106 Ga. 400, 32 S. E. 347, and cases cited.

2. Complaint is made of the failure of the court to charge upon the subject of manslaughter. We have carefully read the evidence and the statement of the accused, and find nothing in either which would have authorized the submission to the jury of the question of manslaughter. According to the statement, the accused, on Friday evening, went to the house of a neighbor, where his wife, who had separated from him, was living. In the dining room he found his wife and a man named Pitman. On entering the room he saw Pitman with his hands around Mrs. Baker's neck, kissing her, and he thereupon shot her. Even had this statement been true (and it was positively contradicted, as to the position of Pitman and Mrs. Baker, by the witnesses for the state), it was not sufficient to reduce the homicide from murder to manslaughter. The rule, as laid down by decisions of this court, is that, in order to reduce such a homicide to manslaughter, it must appear that the accused found his wife in the very act of adultery, or under such circumstances as to indicate that she had just committed the adulterous act. Mays v. State, 88 Ga. 399, 14 S. E. 560. The statement of the accused does not show that the deceased was found, at the time of the killing, under such circumstances as would reduce the homicide to manslaughter. It is true, the accused did state that he had, on Wednesday morning before the killing on Friday, seen his wife and Pitman in bed together. If this be true, he might have been justified, under the decision in Hill v. State, 64 Ga. 453, in then killing her to prevent the act of adultery, or the homicide might have been reduced to manslaughter had the killing occurred immediately after the commission of the adulterous act. Instead of moving at that time, however, the accused, according to his own statement, left the premises, and subsequently invited Pitman to a conference in his room. He returned to the house where his wife was living on the night of the second day after he claims to have seen this misconduct of Pitman and Mrs. Baker, and then, seeing them together in the dining room, and that Pitman had his hands around Mrs. Baker's neck and was kissing her, he shot and killed her. There seems to us to be nothing in his own statement to show that the crime was manslaughter, and not murder. Conceding, however, that there was enough in the statement of the accused to have authorized a finding that the crime was manslaughter, certainly there was nothing in the evidence to have done so, and, under repeated rulings of this court, it was not error to fail to charge on the subject in the absence of any request so to do. "In the absence of a proper and pertinent written request for instructions thereon, the court is not bound to give in charge the law of a theory of the case arising solely from the statement of the accused." Hardin v. State, 107 Ga. 718, 33 S. E. 700; Carroll v. State, 99 Ga. 36, 25 S. E. 680; Taylor v. State, 108 Ga. 384, 34 S. E. 2.

3. The newly-discovered evidence, taken in connection with the strong counter showing made by the state, would not, in our opinion, authorize another jury to find a different verdict. The trial judge heard the evidence and the state's counter showing, and, in the exercise of his sound discretion, refused to grant a new trial on this ground. We cannot say, as matter of law, that he abused his discretion.

4. The evidence fully warranted the verdict, and the trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to grant a new trial. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

SILVEY v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE.

GREEN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 9, 1900.)

The evidence in this case being entirely circumstantial, and being insufficient to connect the accused in any way with the crime, the verdict of guilty was contrary to law, and the court erred in refusing to grant a new trial.

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Hezekiah Green was convicted of arson, and brings error. Reversed.

C. E. Carpenter, J. S. Crawford, and C. A. Thornwell, for plaintiff in error. Moses Wright, Sol. Gen., for the State.

SIMMONS, C. J. A barn belonging to Mrs. Graham was burned on the night of February 15, 1899. Green was arrested and charged with the arson. He was tried and found guilty. The evidence showed that he had been a laborer on Mrs. Graham's farm for several months. Green's wife desired to live with him upon the place, but there was no room for her. Green told Mrs. Graham that he would leave on that account. Accordingly, after a settlement, with which he did not seem fully satisfied, he removed from the premises. A few days thereafter the barn was burned. The night on which the burning occurred was very cold, and the ground was covered with snow. There was a hard rain during the night, but the snow was not melted off of the ground, except where it was thinnest. After the burning, tracks were discovered leading towards the barn, and leading from it towards the place where Green resided, some three miles distant. Whoever made the tracks walked into an ashbank in the yard, and the ashes stuck to his shoes, and were plainly visible in the tracks for a considerable distance from the barn. Some of the witnesses testified that Green, in walking, put his right foot down on the side, and that a man walking in that manner would make a track like those discovered near the barn. The tracks were followed from the barn to within a half-mile of the place where Green lived. There was some other testimony to the effect that when Green came to Mrs. Graham's place, the day after the burning, he jumped over muddy places and "flanked around" all soft or sandy spots. This raised a suspicion in the minds of the witnesses that he desired to avoid making tracks which could be compared with those made by the person who burned the barn. There was no measurement of the tracks, and no comparison of them with tracks known to have been made by Green, except that one witness testified that she had noticed Green's track while he worked on Mrs. Graham's place, that it was peculiar, that she had looked at it where he had made it in the sand, and that it corresponded, to the best of her knowledge, with the tracks discovered near the scene of the burning. Upon this evidence the jury returned a verdict of guilty. A motion for a new trial was made by Green and was overruled by the trial judge. To this Green excepted.

We think that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize the verdict. It was entirely circumstantial, and in no way connected the accused with the arson. The law does not permit any one to be convicted upon mere suspicion. If the evidence be circumstantial, it must connect the accused with the offense so as to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt. It is possible that Green was guilty of the arson with which he was charged, but the state has not produced sufficient evidence to show beyond a reasonable doubt that he was so. The court therefore erred in refusing to grant a new trial. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

MADDOX et al. v. WAGNER.

CONTRACT TO PURCHASE—BREACH—ACTION FOR PRICE.

A breach of an executory contract for the purchase of goods will not support an action upon an open account for the price thereof. (a) Thus, where a mercantile partnership in one city gave to an importer in another an order to "import and ship" to the firm certain goods at stated prices, the order specifying that "import orders are not subject to cancellation," and containing a stipulation, "This order not to be shipped until notified by the buyer," the partnership was bound within a reasonable time after the importation of the goods to direct that they be shipped to it, and, failing to do so, was guilty of a breach of contract, for which it is liable in damages to the other party. But he was not, after the arrival of the goods from abroad, authorized to ship them to the firm except by its express direction, and could not, if he shipped without such direction, and it declined to accept the shipment, maintain against the firm an action upon account as for goods sold and delivered.

Error from city court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by Edward H. Wagner against J. J. & J. E. Maddox. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

C. D. Maddox, for plaintiffs in error. W. R. Brown, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. It appears from the record that J. J. & J. E. Maddox, of Atlanta, Ga., executed and delivered to a soliciting agent of Edward H. Wagner, of New York, a written order for goods. It authorized and directed Wagner to "import and ship to J. J. & J. E. Maddox" certain specified articles, at stated prices, contained a clause reciting that "import orders are not subject to cancellation," and embraced a further stipulation in these words: "This order not to be shipped until notified by buyer." Some time after receiving the order, Wagner, without any direction or request from J. J. & J. E. Maddox, shipped to them goods of the nature specified, and rendered to them a bill for the same. Upon the arrival of the goods in Atlanta, J. J. & J. E. Maddox promptly notified Wagner that, never having directed him to ship the goods, they were not bound to take the same; that they declined to accept them, and held them subject to his order. Thereupon Wagner brought against J. J. & J. E. Maddox an action upon an open account as for goods sold and delivered, and attached to his petition a bill of particulars containing an itemized statement of the goods which he claimed had been purchased of him by the defendants. In defense to this action, they filed an answer setting up, among other things, that never having directed a shipment of the goods, and having declined to accept the same, they were not liable for the price thereof. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants bring the case here upon exceptions to a judgment overruling their motion for a new trial.

Without entering into a detailed discussion of the various grounds of this motion, it is sufficient to say that the case turned upon the construction of the written order given by the defendants to the plaintiff's agent. The trial judge based his instructions to the jury upon the theory that this order authorized the plaintiff, without further notification from the defendants, not only to import, but to ship, the goods, and that, upon his so doing, J. J. & J. E. Maddox became at once bound to accept and pay for the same. We do not think this was the legal effect of the contract embraced in this order. It is quite true that the defendants had no right to arbitrarily cancel the order. Obviously, they could not do this in the face of the express stipulation that "import orders are not subject to cancellation." It is likewise clear that Wagner, after receiving the order, was fully authorized, without further direction from the defendants, to at once import the goods, and for the loss, if any, thus arising, the defendants were undoubtedly liable. But, under the express terms of the contract, Wagner had no right to ship the goods from New York to Atlanta until expressly so directed by the defendants. They were bound by the contract to give a direction to this effect within a reasonable time, and, upon failure to comply with their obligation in this respect, became liable to Wagner for all damages occasioned by their breach of contract. Had the order unconditionally directed Wagner to import and ship the goods, the contract of sale would have been fully executed on his part upon his delivering the goods to the carrier to be forwarded to the defendants; but such was not the character of the order with which we are called upon to deal. Under its terms, Wagner was unauthorized, after importing the goods, to ship them from New York to Atlanta until he was notified so to do by the defendants. When, therefore, he made the shipment without being so notified, he took the risk of acceptance by J. J. & J. E. Maddox. Certainly, he had no right to compel their acquiescence in a shipment made in the teeth of the contract, and necessarily shipped the goods at his risk. We do not mean to say that J. J. & J. E. Maddox could escape all liability to Wagner simply by declining to give directions for the shipment of the goods to them. As stated above, they were bound to notify the plaintiff, within a reasonable time, of their readiness to receive the shipment; but, clearly, their mere failure to comply with their obligation in this respect would not subject them to liability for the contract price of the goods upon the theory that the same were actually sold and delivered to them by Wagner. If they in fact made a breach of their contract by refusing, without sufficient reason, to direct a shipment to them of the goods after the arrival of the same in New York, they were, as stated above, liable to Wagner for whatever damages he may have thus sustained. An action for the recovery of the same would, however, be very different from the one now before the court. The case as laid was a plain suit upon an open account, and the liability, if any, proved at the trial, was that arising from the breach of what was, in substance, an executory contract to purchase. We therefore, without difficulty, dispose of the case on its merits. It was tried upon an erroneous conception by the court below of the meaning and effect of the contract, and, considering the nature of the action instituted by the plaintiff, the evidence did not warrant any finding whatever against the defendants. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

ST. JOHN et ux. v. LEYDEN

COVENANTS—BREACH OF WARRANTY—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY—DEED—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—NEW TRIAL.

1. A petition which in substance alleges that the defendant by "warranty title deed" conveyed to the plaintiff a described city lot; that 10 feet of the lot thus described never in fact belonged to defendant, and is in possession of another, who is the owner thereof; that a specified sum was the "purchase money" of this strip of land; and praying for a recovery of this sum,—though loosely drawn, is in fact an action for a breach of warranty of title to land. (a) When, as originally drafted, such a petition claimed as the measure of plaintiff's damages the value of the property to which title failed, it was amendable so as to make the sum claimed as such damages the purchase price of the property. (b) The petition in the present case, as amended, was of the character above indicated; and, though there was a general demurrer to the same, yet, as it does not appear that the demurrer was sustained, but the case went to trial on the merits, the petition is sufficient to sustain the verdict in plaintiff's favor.

2. That the court, in the trial of a case, treated as ambiguous, in the matter of description, a deed which was not so, affords no cause of complaint to a party whose contention as to its real meaning was, under a proper construction of the deed, not well founded. (a) In view of the evidence introduced in the present case, the jury were warranted in finding that the deed from the defendant to the plaintiff covered the land for which she contended, and that as to a portion of it the title failed.

3. A ground of a motion for a new trial alleging in general terms that the entire charge of the court is erroneous, "in giving to plaintiff's suit two distinct grounds of recovery" (specifying them), does not plainly and distinctly point out any error, unless it sets forth, either literally or in substance, the language used by the judge in thus allowing two grounds of recovery.

4. Treating the action as one for a breach of warranty of title to land, it is immaterial whether the court did or did not err in several of the rulings and charges complained of in the motion for a new trial.

5. There was sufficient evidence to warrant the verdict as amended by the order of the judge requiring one item thereof to be written off, and it does not appear that the court erred in denying the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by Mrs. R. C. Leyden against J. F. St. John and wife. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Anderson, Felder & Davis, for plaintiffs in error. Reed & Hartsfield, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. Mrs. R. C. Leyden brought her suit in Fulton superior court against Jacob F. St. John and his wife, Mrs. Alice J. St. John. The substantial allegations in the petition, in so far as concern the issues involved on the trial, are as follows: In April, 1896, Jacob F. St. John entered into a contract with petitioner "to exchange with her his lot on Auburn avenue, in the city of Atlanta, in land lot 51 of the Fourteenth district of said county and state, fronting 55 feet on the south side of Auburn avenue, and running back 179 feet along a 20-foot alley, which lies east of said lot, subject to a loan deed of $2,500." In accordance with this agreement, St. John executed to her his warranty title deed to said property on April 30, 1896, which was duly recorded May 6, 1896, the consideration named in the deed being $5,000. In exchange for this property, petitioner executed to said St. John her warranty deed to 10 acres of land in land lot 176 in the Fourteenth district of Fulton county, the consideration of that deed being $4,000. St. John gave to petitioner, also, five shares, of the par value of $100, of the capital stock of the Georgia Tile & Artificial Stone Company. Petitioner further charged that, in delivering the Auburn avenue lot to her, St. John represented and pointed out the lines of said lot as extending west from the corner of a 20-foot alley 55 feet along Auburn avenue to the middle of the third row of small tenement houses situated on said lot and the lot next adjoining it on the west, and running back 179 feet of uniform width with front. Since receiving the deed to this land, she ascertained that St. John misrepresented to her the number of front feet he owned in the lot conveyed to her; that the western line of the lot, instead of extending to the place pointed out, was in fact 10 feet east of said point; and that the 10 feet, extending the full length of the lot sold, was never owned by St. John, but was owned by another party, thus making petitioner's actual frontage on Auburn avenue from said alley 45 instead of 55 feet, as bargained for. She then demanded of St. John that he make good the missing 10 feet, or their value. He replied that, if she would have the lot surveyed and establish the lines, he would make good his error. She accordingly had such survey made, the result of which confirmed petitioner's belief that the lot sold her by St. John extended only 45 feet from the 20-foot alley, instead of 55 feet; but St. John, when his attention was called to this, failed and refused to make good the 10 feet, or to pay the value thereof. Petitioner prayed for a general judgment against St. John for $1,100, alleged to be the value of the missing feet from the Auburn avenue lot. The court allowed an amendment to this petition to the effect that the purchase money for the 10 feet in question paid by petitioner was $1,100. Petitioner further alleged that, on account of defect in the title to this portion of the land, it would require her to move some houses, at a cost of $300, for which she claimed damages. She also alleged that St. John represented to her the solvency of the company in which she held the stock paid her by him, whereas the company was totally insolvent and the stock worthless, and that the lot, or some portion thereof, she conveyed to St. John had been by him conveyed to his wife; that he was insolvent, and this conveyance was made to prevent her recovering from him in this cause of action. It appears, however, from the record, that all these claims seeking recovery, except the loss growing out of the breach of warranty, were abandoned, and that the evidence was confined to the issue as to whether there was a breach of the warranty in the deed, and, if so, the extent of the damages sustained by petitioner in consequence of such breach. In answer to the charges in the petition which related to a breach of the warranty in the deed as to the 10 feet, the defendant denied that he misrepresented to petitioner the number of front feet conveyed to her, and averred that petitioner not only had title to, but also the actual use and occupation of, the 55-foot lot conveyed to her by him. The answer further joins issue with the allegations in the petition with reference to the other causes of complaint therein set forth, but as these were abandoned, as above indicated, it is unnecessary to set forth the replies thereto made by the defendant in the pleadings. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $500 principal, $103.07 interest to date, and $54 damages to building. Defendant below made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled after petitioner's counsel, under direction of the court, had written off the finding of $54 damages. On the judgment of the court overruling the motion, error is assigned.

1. It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that plaintiff's original petition was based solely upon a fraudulent misrepresentation made by the defendant to petitioner, and, there being no evidence whatever to sustain the action on such a basis, the verdict was contrary to the evidence. It is further urged that the court erred in allowing the amendment to the petition by asserting that the judgment prayed for, of $1,100, was the amount of the purchase money paid for that portion, 10 feet in width, of the land to which the defendant had no title, it being contended that this added a new cause of action to the petition. We do not think there is anything whatever in his contention. The original petition, fairly construed, clearly sought a recovery for damages sustained by petitioner on account of a breach of warranty in the deed; and the fact that the damages in this original petition were alleged to be the value of that portion of the land which was alleged to have been included in the purchase price by petitioner did not affect the allegations touching the breach of the warranty, but was only inaccurate in stating a wrong measure of the damages for such breach. (a) We think it was, therefore, clearly amendable so as to make the same claim as such damages the purchase price of the property. It is true, this original petition was loosely drawn, and was perhaps defective on account of the dual nature of the case. As the judge stated in his order overruling the motion: "It is quite possible that as such it was demurrable for duplicity or misjoinder of actions, but no such demurrer was made, nor any motion based on this on like grounds." There is no question about the original petition containing elements of a suit for a breach of warranty; that the amendment therefore added no new cause of action, but simply that the $1,100 sought to be recovered was the purchase money of the land missing. While there are some allegations in the original petition which partake of the nature of an action for deceit and of tort, on the trial these seem to have been abandoned; yet, as the judge stated in his order overruling the motion, "as an action for breach of warranty it contains every necessary element, sale, warranty, partial breach by lack of land, and loss of the value or purchase money." (b) We conclude that the petition as amended was properly treated as an action for a breach of warranty, and the record shows that the case went to trial on the issue as to whether such breach had occurred, and, if so, the extent of the damages caused thereby. The verdict of the jury for $500 and interest was sustainable under the pleadings. The finding by the jury of $54 damages has resulted in no injury whatever to the defendant below, for the reason that that portion of the verdict has, under the direction of the court, been written off by petitioner's counsel.

2. In one of the grounds in the motion for a new trial (No. 15) it is alleged that the court erred in charging as follows: "Under the terms of this deed [alluding to deed from defendant to plaintiff], and what is stated in it, and the references made in it, the court deems it proper to submit to the jury the question as to what was in fact the land covered and conveyed and warranted by this deed,—whether it was the land lying west of the alley and exclusive of the alley, or whether it was the land extending from the center of the alley westward, and including half of the alley;" movant adding that "the evidence being clear and conclusive that the deed from defendant to plaintiff did not take in the ten feet in controversy." In a note to this ground the court stated that this "statement that the evidence was clear and conclusive is defendant's contention." The deed which plaintiff below introduced in evidence contained the following description of the land, title to which was therein warranted by defendant to the plaintiff: "Part of land lot 51 in the 14th district of originally Henry (now Fulton) county, Georgia, and known and distinguished as the 'East Half of City Lot 126,' fronting 55 feet on the south side of formerly Wheat (now Auburn) avenue, and running back south a uniform width 176 feet to north line of Mrs. T. W. Hubner's line, along a 20-foot alley, with perpetual and joint use of said alley, which lies east of the lot herein conveyed; this being the same property conveyed by Charles W. Hubner to said Jacob F. St. John by deed recorded in Book 109, folio 230, of Fulton county records, August 22, A. D. 1895." An examination of the deed from Charles W. Hubner to St. John, which is referred to in the deed from the latter to Mrs. Leyden, will show that the lot in question, as described in the Hubner deed, really commenced on the side of the alley, and not in the center of it. In the light of the description of the land in the deed from St. John to Mrs. Leyden, we cannot possibly see how it was claimed by movant in his motion for a new trial that the evidence was clear and conclusive that the deed from defendant to plaintiff did not take in the 10 feet in controversy. To our minds the descriptive words used in the deed tend much more strongly to sustain the contention of the defendant in error as to the exact lot which she purchased, and which plaintiff in error intended to convey to her. The contention of the defendant below on the trial was that he intended to convey, and did by his deed convey, 55 feet fronting on Auburn avenue, by a line commencing in the middle of an alley 20 feet wide. This contention was supported only by parol testimony, but there is really nothing in his deed which in the least indicates that he intended to convey land from the center of the alley, thus embracing 10 feet of that alley in his frontage of 55 feet. On the contrary, the deed expressly declares that the line bounding the lot conveyed, instead of running along the center of the alley, runs "along a 20-foot alley," and further specifies that this alley "lies east of the lot herein conveyed," and not simply that half of the alley lies east of the lot. We do not think there was any ambiguity whatever in this description in the deed, relatively to the question as to whether the line on Auburn avenue was to commence in the center of the alley or on the edge of the alley. The language clearly indicates to our minds that this line on Auburn avenue should be exclusive of any portion of the alley. Construing the deed, therefore, as ambiguous in its description, we think, was giving the defendant every advantage he could possibly ask for under the terms of his conveyance. He was also allowed to introduce parol testimony that the property he owned really commenced in the center of the alley, and that 55 feet from the center of the alley would not encroach upon the land of another. We think the court committed no error against St. John in giving instruction complained of in the above-stated ground. (a) Even viewing this case in the light of the parol evidence introduced, we think, unquestionably, the jury were warranted in finding that the deed from defendant to plaintiff covered the land for which she contended, and that as to a portion of it the title failed. As to the 10 feet in controversy, it was on the trial practically conceded that the defendant claimed no title whatever thereto. It was virtually admitted that another party, by 20 years' prescriptive possession, had paramount title to this strip of land. It is true, the defendant introduced some evidence tending to show that the title of his grantor embraced one-half of the alley, but there was nothing in his deed from which this fact necessarily appeared, and what title he had to half of the alley was established purely by parol. But the question is, what did he intend to convey to his grantee in this case? There was testimony in behalf of plaintiff below to the effect that, about the time or soon after the execution of this deed, defendant pointed out the land line to the plaintiff's son, and located it exactly where plaintiff contends the deed designates it. There is a ground in the motion for a new trial objecting to this testimony of the son, for the reason that plaintiff was not present when this representation was made; but it appears from the record of the evidence that, while she was not in their immediate presence during the location of the line, she was near enough to hear the remarks he made about where it terminated. After this it seems that the attention of defendant was by plaintiff called to the adverse claim of the party who had paramount title to the 10 feet of land in dispute, and that he requested her to have it surveyed, and, if there was any deficiency of his title in the land covered by his deed, he would rectify it. Defendant also afterwards wrote a letter in which he seemed to recognize his mistake in locating the line where he did. All this testimony was objected to in several grounds of the motion for a new trial, upon the theory that they were representations made by the defendant after the execution of the deed to the plaintiff, and therefore she could not have acted upon these representations in making the purchase. Counsel, however, seem to lose sight of the fact that this trial had been reduced down to an issue touching a breach of warranty as to the particular land in controversy, and that these statements and conversations of defendant were clearly admissible in evidence, not as a misrepresentation upon which his grantee had acted in the contract of purchase, but as admissions that under his deed to her, and in his transactions had with her touching a sale of the land, he intended to convey, and thought he was conveying, the identical lot of land claimed by her to be described in the deed, and contended for in this suit. In several grounds of the motion for a new trial, particularly the ninth and tenth, complaint is made of the charge of the court with reference to the conduct of defendant in pointing out the line after the trade had closed. Among the instructions of the court on this subject excepted to is one to the effect that "if, after the trade was closed, and after both parties had conveyed titles, respectively, to each other, the defendant then undertook to point out the lines of the Auburn avenue lot, and did so erroneously, but there was no consideration for doing so, and this was not a part of the making of the trade, then this would not furnish a ground for recovery by the plaintiff of this cause of complaint." It is alleged in the motion that this charge suggested to the jury that they might find that pointing out the line after both parties had conveyed titles to each other was a part of making the trade. Instead of the charge containing any such suggestion, it was exactly the opposite, and operated beneficially to the defendant, instead of to the plaintiff. In the tenth ground of the motion another charge on this subject, excepted to, was to the effect that the evidence as to whether there was a pointing out of the line after the trade was made and concluded might be considered by the jury as to whether there were admissions by the defendant as to what he claimed the line to be, or as to whether he had located it erroneously, and that, so far as this throws any light upon the question at issue between the parties, it is admissible, and may be considered along with the other evidence in the case, but, as representations, if made after the trade had been closed, and not acted upon, they would not amount to a warranty, or furnish ground of recovery, if made without a new consideration. This was a correct view of the law. As above seen, the sayings and conduct of the defendant after the trade were unquestionably admissible in evidence as an admission against his contention on the trial. We therefore conclude that, in view of the evidence introduced in the present case, the jury were warranted in finding that the deed from defendant to plaintiff covered the land for which she contended, and that as to a portion of it the title failed.

3. Another ground in the motion (No. 13) complains of the charge of the court as a whole, in giving to the plaintiff's suit two distinct grounds of recovery, either fraudulent misrepresentations or breach of warranty, when the suit itself was on the sole ground of misrepresentation. The judge below, in the order overruling the motion, states that the only grounds which present any serious question to his mind are those touching the dual nature of the case, and the charge accordingly. He recognizes that as the case began, certain equitable features were involved, but these were removed or abandoned, leaving the case a legal one against St. John alone; that it is possible that as such it was demurrable for duplicity or misjoinder of actions, but no such demurrer was made, or any motion based on that ground. In the first place, the ground in the motion above referred to attacks in general terms simply the entire charge of the court as being erroneous, in giving to plaintiff's suit two distinct grounds of recovery; but this ground should not be considered, for the reason that it does not plainly or distinctly point out any error in any one of these charges. It should have set forth, literally or in substance, the language used by the judge in thus improperly allowing two grounds of recovery. Besides this, the judge, in overruling the motion, says that on this last trial defendant's counsel presented several requests more especially applicable to an action of deceit,—for example, that the representations must have been made before the trade was closed, unless upon a new consideration, and that if each had equal opportunities for knowing, etc., there could be no recovery, etc. He gave some of these in charge, either literally or substantially, and this necessitated a further charge on that subject, which he gave. It perhaps was error to charge on this view of the case at all, but, if so, it was error of which the defendant cannot well complain, as it seems from the judge's order that he introduced that element into the charge by request.

4. But, in the view we take of this case, we think it was really immaterial as to whether the court did or did not err in several of the rulings and charges complained of in the motion bearing upon an action of deceit; for this cause of action set forth was abandoned, the evidence did not cover the issue, and what plaintiff finally sought to recover was only for damages for breach of warranty in the deed. The verdict, too, in the light of the testimony before the jury, clearly indicates that the portion thereof which was allowed to stand by the judge below was for the value of the land embraced in the defendant's deed to plaintiff, to which he had no title. Counsel for plaintiff below contends in his argument that the verdict was not large enough, estimating the value of the lot purchased by her by the consideration of $5,000 mentioned in the deed, and that the verdict ought to have been several hundred dollars larger than the jury found. There was some evidence, however, in behalf of defendant below, that these 10 feet running the full length of the lot embraced in her deed was worth $50 a front foot, and the jury evidently based their verdict upon this testimony as to the present value of that strip of land. If there was any error in this particular, it was in favor of the defendant. There is no proof tending to show that the damages could have been less than $500, but, as no exceptions were filed by the plaintiff, there was, of course, no error in refusing a new trial.

5. We think the evidence was amply sufficient to warrant the verdict as amended by the order of the judge requiring one item thereof to be written off. We note from the record (the fact being recited in the judgment of the court overruling the motion) that this case has been twice tried, and each time a verdict rendered for the plaintiff. It further appears that the first trial proceeded upon the theory that the action was one for a breach of warranty, and this last trial was evidently based upon the same theory. In view of the proper construction to be placed upon the pleadings and the evidence introduced upon the trial, as above indicated, we think the court did right in denying the motion for a new trial.

We have not made special reference to all the grounds in the motion. Those herein referred to and considered embrace the controlling issues of this case, and we deem it entirely unimportant to discuss the other grounds. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring

JOHNSON v. AMERICAN FREEHOLD LAND MORTG. CO. OF LONDON, Limited.

AUTHORITY OF AGENT—SALE OF LAND—ACTION AGAINST CORPORATION—PLEADING.

1. An agent who has authority only to receive proposals to purchase the property of his principal, and submit the same to the latter for acceptance or rejection, cannot make an absolute contract of sale, which will be binding upon the principal.

2. When, in an action against a corporation for the breach of an alleged contract for the sale of land, the petition described the person with whom the plaintiff dealt in making the contract as "the agent of said defendant company, empowered by said defendant company to negotiate with this complainant the sale of" the land, the words quoted, whatever might be their true intent and meaning when standing alone, must be construed in connection with all the allegations of the petition.

3. Thus construing these words in the petition now under review, the agent therein referred to was not authorized to make for the defendant a binding contract of sale, but only to receive and submit to the company offers for the purchase of the land in controversy. This being so, and the plaintiff not being entitled to recover save on the theory that the agent had power to sell, the demurrer to the petition was properly sustained.

Error from city court of Richmond; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Jesse Johnson against the American Freehold Land Mortgage Company, Limited. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. S. & W. T. Davidson and F. W. Capers, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Lamar, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. This was an action by Jesse Johnson against the American Freehold Land Mortgage Company of London, Limited, for the breach of an alleged contract for the sale of land. On demurrer, the action was dismissed, and Johnson excepted.

The petition was, in brief, as follows: The plaintiff submitted to the defendant an offer for the purchase of a tract of land in Richmond county, known as the "McLaughlin Place," at the price of $1,000. In reply to this offer, one W. M. Fulcher, "the agent of said defendant company, empowered by said company to negotiate with this complainant the sale of said McLaughlin place," addressed to the plaintiff a letter containing the following words: "I inclose you a letter from my people, in which they make you a proposition to sell the land." Accompanying this letter was another, at the top of which was written the word "McLaughlin." This letter was addressed to Fulcher, and signed by Cuyler, Morgan & Co., in which the following language was employed: "Replying to your favor * * * submitting offer of $1,000 for this place, without interest, we beg to state that we would prefer to put offer in somewhat different shape. We will sell the place for $850, with 6% interest, payments apportioned as follows." Then followed a list of figures specifying the terms of payment. On receipt of the letter from Fulcher with the above-mentioned inclosure, Johnson addressed a letter to Fulcher, accepting the offer. Thereupon Fulcher wrote him another letter, stating that he had notified the owner of the place that Johnson would accept the same "on conditions that it was offered" to him. Subsequently, Fulcher again wrote to Johnson, informing him that the papers were ready for his signature, and asking him to come and execute the same. Still later, Fulcher informed Johnson "that he was in receipt of instructions from the defendant to declare the trade off."

It will have been observed that the petition did not distinctly and unequivocally allege that Fulcher had power from the defendant company to make a sale of the land. He was described as an agent empowered to "negotiate" with the plaintiff for a sale thereof. Even if the words employed in describing this agent could, if taken alone, be construed to mean that he was clothed with an absolute power of sale, it is, of course, proper, for the purpose of ascertaining what they did really mean in the present case, to look to all the allegations of the petition. Pursuing this course, we have reached the conclusion that the petition, taken as a whole, does not sufficiently allege that Fulcher had power to sell. Presumably, the original offer of $1,000 by Johnson was made to Fulcher. He did not accept it, but evidently submitted it to Cuyler, Morgan & Co., whoever they were. If his power to sell had been absolute, he could have accepted Johnson's offer without consulting any other person. Again, when he inclosed to Johnson the letter to himself from Cuyler, Morgan & Co., which itself embraced instructions authorizing Fulcher to submit a proposition to Johnson, he distinctly stated that this was a letter from his people in which they made Johnson an offer to sell. On receipt of Johnson's reply accepting this offer, Fulcher did not at once confirm the trade, but again communicated with some other person or persons, from whom he received papers for Johnson's signature. Viewing all these matters together, we think it clear that Fulcher's authority was limited to receiving proposals, and submitting them to the owner for acceptance or rejection. He therefore had no power to make a contract of sale binding upon the defendant company, and there is nothing in the petition amounting to an allegation that the company itself either contracted with Johnson for the sale of the land, or authorized any other person to make for it the alleged contract, for the breach of which Johnson's action is brought. Certainly, the petition does not aver that Cuyler, Morgan & Co. were the agents of the defendant, or had power to bind it. Limiting Fulcher's agency as above indicated, the petition, in its last analysis, amounts simply to this: Cuyler, Morgan & Co. authorized Fulcher to submit to Johnson an offer for the sale of the land, and Johnson accepted this offer. In the absence of an allegation that Cuyler, Morgan & Co. had from the defendant authority to do what they did, the petition is lacking in an indispensable averment, and fails to set forth, even in substance, a good cause of action. The demurrer made another point, with which we have not dealt, because, in our judgment, the case properly went out of court for the reasons above stated. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

STACK v. HARRIS.

INJURY TO TENANT—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD.

Though a landlord will not be liable in damages for injuries to a tenant resulting from the defective condition of a plank in the floor of the rented building, of which the landlord had no notice, a petition which alleges that the plaintiff (a tenant) was injured by reason of such a defect, and that the landlord (the defendant) had notice of the "defective condition of the floor," sufficiently alleges, as against a general demurrer, that the defendant had notice of the defective condition of the plank.

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by J. L. Harris against Minnie Stack. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hammond, Skeen & Langley, for plaintiff in error. D. W. Rountree, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Harris brought suit against Miss Minnie Stack, alleging in his petition: That on the 18th day of May, 1899, he rented from the defendant a storehouse in the city of Atlanta. That he was a gunsmith by trade, and used the store rented as a general repair shop. That on the night of July 15, 1899, about 11 o'clock, when he quit work and was preparing to clean the floor of the storehouse, he stepped upon a plank in the floor, which was apparently sound, and the same gave way under him, causing him to fall, and by reason thereof he sustained serious and painful injuries. When he rented the premises, the floor was out of repair in different places, but portions of the floor seemed to be sound and in good condition, and such was the appearance of those portions of the floor where he usually worked, and where he was at the time he received the injuries above referred to. When he used those portions of the floor that were out of repair, he did so with the greatest caution. There was nothing in the appearance of the plank that gave way under him to indicate that it was at all dangerous. At the time that he rented the store he called the attention of the defendant to the "defective condition of the floor," and she agreed to repair it. When he paid the second month's rent, he made a similar complaint to the agent of the defendant who collected the rent, and subsequently he reported to the defendant that the floor was out of repair, and she agreed to make the repairs. He complains that his injuries were due to the negligence of the defendant in not having the floor repaired after her attention was called to the same. The defendant filed a general demurrer to the petition, which the court overruled, and she excepted.

As against a general demurrer, the petition sets forth a cause of action. The common law placed the burden of repairs upon the tenant, and the landlord was not bound to make repairs unless there was an express stipulation to that effect in the contract which created the relation of landlord and tenant. Neither was there any implied warranty on the part of the landlord that the premises were suitable for the purposes for which they were leased, or that they were in a condition to be occupied. 1 Tayl. Land. & Ten. (8th Ed.) §§ 175a, 327, 328; Gear, Land. & Ten. § 104. The common-law rule is not of force in Georgia. Under our Code, the landlord, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, is bound to keep the premises in repair. Civ. Code, § 3123. He is, however, entitled to notice from the tenant that the premises are out of repair, and if, after such notice has been given, the tenant suffers damage on account of the failure of the landlord to make the necessary repairs, the landlord is liable for the damage thus sustained, provided the conduct of the tenant was not such as to preclude him from recovering. Guthman v. Castleberry, 48 Ga. 172. Under the law of this state, it is presumed that the premises leased are in a condition suitable for the purposes for which they were rented; and if such is not the case, and damage results therefrom to the tenant, the landlord is liable, provided he has had notice of the defective condition of the premises, and has failed after a reasonable time to make the necessary repairs, and provided also that the tenant has not been guilty of such negligence as to bar a recovery by him. Whittle v. Webster, 55 Ga. 180. See, also, Driver v. Maxwell, 56 Ga. 11; White v. Montgomery, 58 Ga. 204; Lewis v. Chisolm, 68 Ga. 40; Miller v. Smithe, 95 Ga. 288, 22 S. E. 532; Johnson v. Collins, 98 Ga. 271, 26 S. E. 744. When the landlord is notified that the premises are out of repair, it becomes his duty to inspect and investigate, in order that he may make such repairs as the safety of the tenant requires. It follows, therefore, that when, after such notice, the landlord fails, within a reasonable time, to make the repairs, he is chargeable with notice of all the defects that a proper inspection would have disclosed. To this extent he might be charged with liability for injury arising from a defect which was hidden so far as the tenant was concerned. When rented premises become out of repair, it is the duty of the tenant to notify the landlord of this fact, and also to abstain from using any part of the premises, the use of which would be attended with danger. But even after notice to the landlord the tenant has a right to use those parts of the premises which are apparently in good condition, if there is nothing to call his attention to what may be a hidden defect. The failure of the landlord to repair in such a case would give to the tenant a right of action for any damages sustained by him, and his use of that part of the premises which was in an apparently sound condition would not preclude him from recovering, notwithstanding he had knowledge that there were other parts of the premises in a defective condition. Applying what is above said to the facts of the present case, after the defendant had been notified three times that the floor of the storehouse was out of repair, it became her duty to inspect the premises, and make such repairs as were necessary. This is not a case where the landlord is sought to be held liable for injuries arising from defects which were hidden both from the landlord and the tenant. Neither is it a case where the landlord is sought to be held liable on account of the defects which were hidden from him, and known to the tenant. But it is a case where the landlord is sought to be held liable for injuries resulting from defects which were hidden from the tenant, and which the landlord could have discovered by the exercise of ordinary diligence, and where the circumstances were such as to require that he should make an investigation, which, when made, would have necessarily resulted in his discovering the defects which were the cause of the plaintiff's injury. As the petition distinctly alleged that the plaintiff, at the time he was injured, was in the use of a portion of the floor which was apparently sound, and that there was nothing to indicate that there was any defect in that portion of the floor, there was nothing appearing on the face of the petition which would authorize the conclusion that the plaintiff was guilty of such negligence as would preclude a recovery on his part. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

ROBERTS v. KEELER.

SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES — EXECUTION — FAILURE TO MAKE—OFFICER'S LIABILITY—DEFENSES—PAYMENT—COSTS—MALICIOUS ISSUANCE OF RULE—EVIDENCE—APPEAL—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR.

1. Suing out a money rule against a levying officer is, in effect, the bringing of a suit or civil action against him.

2. A levying officer may show, as an excuse for not making the money on an execution placed in his hands, that the same has been paid.

3. Issuing a rule nisi against the officer is not an adjudication that there is probable cause for suing out the same, when the petition for the rule does not truly set forth the facts.

4. That the costs upon a fi. fa. have not been paid will not justify the institution of a rule against the officer for the principal and interest as well, when the plaintiff in execution has himself received payment of the principal and interest, and therefore knows the officer is not liable therefor.

5. The evidence in this case fully warranted the jury in finding that the rules against the constable were sued out maliciously, without probable cause, and solely for the purpose of annoying the officer and putting him to trouble and expense.

6. A general complaint, in a motion for a new trial, that the verdict is "contrary to law," is not a special assignment of error; nor does such an assignment authorize the supreme court, at the instance of one against whom a verdict was rendered in the trial court, to pass upon the question whether or not the plaintiff's petition was good as against a general demurrer. (a) The question whether the bringing of a civil action maliciously and without probable cause affords ground for instituting against the plaintiff a suit for damages is not made in the present case, and therefore is not decided.

Error from superior court, Haralson county; C. G. Jones, Judge.

Action by one Keeler against one Roberts for maliciously ruling plaintiff, a constable, to show cause why he had not made the money on certain executions placed in his hands for collection. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. S. Roberts and Edwards & Ault, for plaintiff in error. E. S. & G. D. Griffith and W. R. Hutcheson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The plaintiff below, Keeler, who was a constable, brought an action for damages against Roberts, alleging in his petition that the defendant maliciously and without probable cause instituted against him in a justice's court five rules requiring him to show cause why he had not made the money on certain executions which had been placed in his hands for collection. There was no demurrer to the petition, but the case went to trial on its merits, and a verdict in favor of the plaintiff was returned. The case is here at the instance of the defendant, whose assignments of error have been disposed of by the rulings above announced.

1. One of the contentions of the plaintiff in error is: "That the rules nisi issued by the magistrate, * * * and which were the foundation of the proceedings, were not suits instituted by the defendant, Roberts, but were rules by a court of law calling on the executing officer to show cause why he should not be punished as for a contempt for a failure to perform his official duty." We are unable to conjecture why the institution of such a rule may not be regarded as a suit. In a broad and general sense, it is certainly an action by the movant of the rule against the respondent thereto. It is a proceeding in a court by one person against another, whereby the former seeks to obtain against the latter a judgment for money, and the right to enforce the collection of the same by attachment. The defendant is, to all intents and purposes, placed in the position of being "sued." The mere fact that the magistrate issued the rule does not make it the court's case, rather than that of the movant, for he is as much responsible for the institution of the proceedings as is the plaintiff in an ordinary action for the filing of the petition by which it is begun. The difference is merely in the form of process prayed for in order to compel the defendant to appear in court and answer the plaintiff's complaint.

2. It appeared at the trial that one of the reasons set up by the constable for his failure to make the money on some of the executions was that the same had been paid, and that Roberts knew this to be so when he instituted the rules. In this connection, exception is taken to the refusal of the court to give in charge to the jury the following request presented in writing by counsel for the defendant: "If a fi. fa. regularly issued by a justice of the peace has been placed in the hands of a constable, it is his duty to execute same by a levy on the defendant's property, and he cannot excuse himself for a failure to do so by setting up a defense thereto in favor of such defendant." Clearly, in view of the issue involved in the present case, this request would have had a decided tendency to mislead the jury; and, moreover, it was not at all applicable. Surely, it cannot be doubted that a levying officer may show, as an excuse for not making the money on an execution placed in his hands, that the same has been paid. Wheeler v. Thomas, 57 Ga. 161. If the court had given the request above quoted, it would have been, in effect, instructing the jury to the contrary.

3. Another contention of the plaintiff in error is that the fact that the magistrate granted rules nisi against the constable amounted to an adjudication that Roberts had probable cause for instituting the rules. In support of this contention the case of Short v. Spragins, 104 Ga. 628, 30 S. E. 810, is cited. In that case it was held that the sanctioning of an equitable petition, and the granting of a restraining order, by a judge of the superior court, afforded conclusive evidence of probable cause for the bringing of the action, if the petition "fairly and honestly set forth the facts relied upon by the plaintiffs therein." But the principle thus announced has no application to the present case, for the reason that it affirmatively appeared at the trial that the allegations in the petitions for the rules which Roberts presented to the magistrate were not true.

4. Error is assigned upon the refusal of the court to charge as follows: "If suit is pending or judgment has been obtained, and a settlement of the principal and interest by the defendant has been made, and there is no agreement as to which party shall pay costs, then, as between the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant would be liable to plaintiff for costs." This request was evidently predicated upon evidence tending to show that, upon one of the executions placed in the hands of the constable, the costs, amounting to $4.35, were due and unpaid. It appears, however, that, in the petition for the rule against the constable relating to this particular execution, Roberts claimed that the officer was liable for $94.35, although, as matter of fact, the principal and interest due upon the execution, amounting to $90, had been paid to Roberts himself before the rule was sued out. The only theory, therefore, upon which the request just quoted would have been pertinent, was that even if Roberts did maliciously rule the constable for $94.35, knowing the officer was really liable for only $4.35, yet if the smaller amount was actually due upon the execution, and the constable failed to levy, the conduct of Roberts in instituting this rule could not be made the basis of an action for malicious prosecution. Clearly, such a theory is not tenable, and consequently the refusal of the request did not deprive the defendant of the benefit of a defense which he was entitled to set up.

5. Complaint is made in general terms that the verdict is "contrary to the evidence." We certainly cannot hold that this complaint is meritorious, for, while there was some conflict in the testimony, that which was favorable to the plaintiff amply made out his case as laid, and fully warranted the jury in finding that the rules against him were sued out maliciously, that the defendant had no cause for instituting them, and that his sole purpose in so doing was to harass and annoy the plaintiff, and subject him to trouble and expense.

6. The motion for a new trial also alleges that the verdict is "contrary to law." We have already attempted to show that suing out a money rule against an officer is, in effect, the bringing of a civil action against him. In our consultation over this case, the question arose whether or not the institution of such an action, maliciously and without probable cause, afforded to the defendant therein ground for bringing against the plaintiff a suit for damages. It was, in view of the ruling announced in Mitchell v. Railroad Co., 75 Ga. 399, that "the bringing of a civil suit maliciously and without probable cause was not a ground upon which an action could be maintained, unless the action was one whereby the person of the defendant was arrested or his property attached, or some special damage was done to him," quite natural that this question should occur to us. We cannot, however, undertake to deal with it in the present case, for the imperative reason that it is not made, and we are therefore without jurisdiction to do so. Even before the passage of the supreme court practice act of November 11, 1889 (Acts 1889, p. 114), this court uniformly held that it had no authority to decide any question which was not passed upon by the trial court, and brought here for review by a plain and distinct assignment of error. A striking and pointed illustration is to be found in the case of Jenkins v. State, 50 Ga. 258, in which it was held: "When there is a verdict of guilty in a criminal case, and a motion is made for a new trial on the sole ground that the verdict is contrary to law and to evidence, and the motion is overruled, this court will not inquire into the sufficiency of the indictment, no such question having been decided by the judge." The undoubted effect of this ruling was that a general assignment, in a motion for a new trial, that a verdict was "contrary to law," was the equivalent of no assignment at all, and the court accordingly allowed a verdict and sentence in a criminal case to stand, regardless of the question whether the indictment charged an offense or not. Again, in Mayor, etc., v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 279, 10 S. E. 719, a case which was tried in the superior court of Spalding county at the February term, 1889, this court held: "Points of law proper as grounds for demurrer ought not to be made first in this court under a ground for new trial that the verdict was contrary to law." And see comments of the present chief justice on page 283, 84 Ga., and pages 720, 721, 10 S. E. In view of the constitutional provision that "the supreme court shall have no original jurisdiction, but shall be a court alone for the trial and correction of errors" (Civ. Code, § 5836), it is clear that we have no jurisdiction to pass upon any question not made in the court below, and, since the passage of the act above mentioned, the question of the authority of this court to deal with points not properly brought here for review is likewise jurisdictional, though the record may show that such points were in fact presented to and passed upon by the trial court. Section 5584 of the Civil Code, which was taken from that act, in express terms declares that "the supreme court shall not decide any question unless it is made by a special assignment of error in the bill of exceptions, and shall decide any question made by a specific assignment of error in the bill of exceptions." Of course, if a motion for a new trial contains a special assignment of error, and the bill of exceptions alleges error in overruling the motion, the bill will be treated as itself making a special assignment of error. A general complaint that a verdict is "contrary to law" is certainly not "a special assignment of error." It is anything but "special," in that it signally fails to point out a single respect in which the verdict is violative of law. There is statutory authority for moving for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is "contrary to evidence," or "decidedly and strongly against the weight of evidence" (Id. §§ 5477, 5482), but no such authority for complaining in such a motion that the verdict is "contrary to law." Certainly, then, a ground of this nature ought to distinctly specify how or why the verdict is unlawful. Even if the general assignment that a verdict is "contrary to law" could in any case be regarded as a proper ground of a motion for a new trial, it could not, as was held in Mayor, etc., v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 279, 10 S. E. 719, be so treated in a case where the petition failed to set forth a cause of action. If, then, the present petition is of that character, the defendant is not entitled to a new trial on any ground, for nothing is better settled than that a new trial will not be granted in a case where the petition is fatally defective in substance. In such a case, the remedy is by general demurrer before a trial on the merits, or by motion in arrest after verdict. The case of Brock v. State, 23 Ga. 371, has never been followed by this court, and the ruling therein on the question of practice is obviously unsound. It is not, however, necessary to formally overrule it, for unquestionably it has not, since the passage of the supreme court practice act of 1889, been binding as authority.

There is yet another reason why we ought not to decide whether the present petition does or does not set forth a cause of action, viz.: We have not, even in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, been requested so to do. Were we, therefore, to reverse the judgment on the ground that the petition is fatally defective, we would be ruling upon a point not argued before us or insisted upon here, and as to which the defendant in error has had no opportunity to be heard. Accordingly, it is apparent that we have neither right nor pretext for usurping authority which the law has expressly forbidden us to exercise. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

BRYSON v. SCOTT.

ACTION AGAINST ADMINISTRATOR—APPEAL—BOND.

Suit was brought in a justice's court against an administrator, as such, seeking a judgment binding the assets of the deceased. The defendant pleaded no assets and plene administravit. The finding upon these pleas was against the defendant, and judgment was rendered by the justice in favor of the plaintiff for the amount sued for, to be satisfied of the assets of the deceased, if to be found; if not to be found, then of the assets of the defendant personally. The defendant entered an appeal to a jury in the justice's court from so much of the judgment as affected the assets of the estate, and neither paid the costs nor gave bond for the eventual condemnation money. Held: (1) That the defendant could not enter an appeal from only a part of the judgment; (2) that, as the judgment rendered bound the administrator personally, an appeal could not be entered under the provisions of section 4464 of the Civil Code, which provides that administrators, when sued as such, or defending solely the title of the estate, may enter an appeal without paying the costs and giving security.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by S. A. Scott against H. M. Bryson, administratrix. Judgment for plaintiff before a justice, and defendant appealed to a jury in that court. From a refusal to dismiss the appeal, plaintiff brings certiorari. Appeal dismissed, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Hunt & Golightly, for plaintiff in error. J. N. Glenn, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Scott brought suit in a justice's court against Mrs. Bryson, "as administratrix of the estate of Thomas M. Bryson, deceased," seeking to obtain a judgment against her in her representative capacity. The defendant pleaded that she had no assets of the estate in her hands, and also that all the assets of the estate had been properly applied to the payment of debts of higher dignity than that of the plaintiff. The justice, after hearing evidence, found against these pleas, and entered a judgment for the amount sued for, to be satisfied of the property of the deceased, if any to be found, and, if not to be found, then to be satisfied of the property of Mrs. Bryson individually. Within four days after the rendition of this judgment, Mrs. Bryson filed with the justice a paper in which it was stated that she desired, "in her representative capacity," to enter an appeal to a jury in that court, and prayed that the same be allowed "without the giving of a bond or the payment of costs"; the paper reciting that she entered the appeal to protect the estate. When the case came on to be tried on the appeal, the plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal on two grounds: First, because the defendant had neither paid the costs nor given bond as required by law; second, because the appeal was entered for the estate only, and no appeal was taken so far as the judgment bound Mrs. Bryson individually. The justice overruled the motion to dismiss, and the case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount sued for, to be satisfied of the property of the deceased when the same should come into the hands of the administratrix. The jury further found that the administratrix had fully administered the estate. The plaintiff filed a petition for certiorari, assigning error upon the refusal of the justice to dismiss the appeal. Upon the hearing the judge sustained the certiorari, and ordered the appeal dismissed. To this judgment the defendant excepted.

The general rule applicable to appeals requires that the appellant, as a condition precedent to entering the appeal, shall pay the costs and give bond for the eventual condemnation money. Civ. Code, § 4458. One of the exceptions to this general rule is found in section 4464 of the Civil Code, which declares: "Executors, administrators, and other trustees, when sued as such, or defending solely the title of the estate, may enter an appeal without paying costs and giving bond and security as hereinbefore required; but if a judgment should be obtained against such executor, administrator, or other trustee, and not the assets of the estate, he must pay costs and give security as in other cases." It is manifest from the terms of this section that the exception in favor of persons sued in a representative capacity is intended for the benefit of those who are really litigating in the interest of others, and who are not themselves to be affected by the judgment to be rendered. It is clearly inferable from the latter part of the section that, if the person sued in a representative capacity is bound personally in any way by the judgment, the section does not apply, and such person would be compelled to pay the costs and give the bond, as required by the general rule. The test seems to be this: Does the judgment bind the defendant in his representative capacity only, or does it bind him personally as well? If the former, then the case is within the terms of the section; if the latter, then the case is within neither the letter nor spirit of the section, but falls under the general rule. While this exact question has never been ruled by this court, what has been heretofore said in passing upon questions growing out of the right to enter an appeal under this section, as well as under the statute from which it was taken, has some bearing upon the question now before us. In McCay v. Devers, 9 Ga. 184, it was held: "An executor is entitled to appeal without security when the judgment is to affect only the assets of the decedent in his hands; aliter, where the judgment is against him personally, and for which he is responsible out of his own funds." In Irving v. Melton, 27 Ga. 330, it was held that, in a suit in equity against an administrator for a settlement, the defendant was entitled to appeal without giving security. This decision was rendered by two judges; Judge McDonald being absent. In Hickman v. Hickman, 74 Ga. 401, it was held that where an executor was cited to appear and settle his accounts, and pay over to the legatees the amounts to which they were entitled, the executor could not appeal from a judgment rendered against him without paying the costs and giving security. While the decision in 27 Ga. was a suit for a settlement in a court of equity, and the decision last cited was a citation for a settlement in the court of ordinary, the principle controlling in each case would be the same, and therefore the two decisions are in direct conflict. The latter decision, having been concurred in by three judges, must be allowed to control. This seems also to us to be the better view of the matter. In Cannon v. Sheffield, 59 Ga. 103, it was held that where an appeal was taken from a judgment de bonis testatoris without giving security, and subsequently the judgment was amended so as to charge the defendant individually the appeal should not be dismissed because entered without giving bond and security. Chief Justice Warner thus disposes of the question in that case: "As the judgment stood against the defendant as administrator at the time he entered his appeal therefrom, he was not required to give security in order to obtain it. Having obtained an appeal from the judgment of the justice according to law, his legal right thereto could not be defeated by the subsequent amendment of the judgment, even if the justice had the legal authority to amend the judgment as he did, pending the appeal." As the judgment in the present case bound the defendant personally, she could not enter an appeal under the provisions of Civ. Code, § 4464, without paying the costs and giving bond, at least so far as the judgment against her personally was concerned.

Could she enter an appeal from so much of the judgment as bound the assets of the estate, and leave the judgment to stand in so far as it bound her individually? We know of no law which authorizes an appeal to be entered from a part of a judgment. An appeal is a de novo investigation. "It brings up the whole record from the court below, and all competent evidence is admissible on the trial thereof, whether adduced on a former trial or not. Either party is entitled to be heard on the whole merits of the case." Civ. Code, § 4469. Even in a case where more than one person is bound by the judgment, an appeal entered by one will carry up the whole record, and any judgment rendered will bind the parties not appealing as well as the appellants. Civ. Code, §§ 4461, 4462; Murray v. Marshall, 106 Ga. 523, 32 S. E. 634. As any appeal entered by the defendant in the present case would have the effect of carrying to the appeal the entire case, and as the judgment rendered by the justice was one which bound her personally, and was not one in which the estate represented by her was alone interested, no appeal could be entered until after the payment of the costs and the giving of security required under the general rule in reference to such matters. The present case furnishes an illustration showing the wisdom of the law which prevents the administratrix from entering the appeal from so much of the judgment as affects the estate of her intestate. Upon the trial of the appeal, the jury found in favor of the administratrix on her plea of plene administravit, and the effect of the finding was to discharge her from individual liability to the plaintiff. She thus appealed in behalf of the estate, and took advantage of the law allowing representatives of estate, when sued as such, to appeal without paying the costs and giving bond, and secured a judgment releasing her from individual liability. The justice erred in refusing to dismiss the appeal, and a reversal of this judgment upon certiorari was proper. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CAMPBELL v. MORGAN.

MORGAN v. CAMPBELL.

SALE OF NOTE—USURY—ESTOPPEL OF SURETY—TITLE IN THIRD PERSON.

1. When the payee of a negotiable promissory note sold it outright to another, the mere fact that the seller indorsed the paper did not place him in the attitude of a borrower of money from the purchaser; nor, as between the latter and the maker of the note, was the transaction usurious because the discount amounted to more than the maximum lawful rate of interest.

2. Even if a promissory note was usurious, yet, if this fact did not appear on its face, the maker, who induced another to sign the note as surety in ignorance of the usury, and in good faith believing that the payment of the note was secured by a bill of sale to personalty which the maker had executed, was estopped from setting up the usury in defense to an action of trover brought by the surety for the personalty after he had paid off the note and taken an assignment of the same and of the bill of sale.

3. Nor could the defendant, in such a case, for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's action, set up as outstanding title a duly-recorded bill of sale which the defendant had executed to a third person after making the bill of sale relied on by the plaintiff, which was not so recorded.

Error from city court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by J. A. Campbell against W. A. Morgan. From the judgment, plaintiff brings error, and defendant assigns cross error. Affirmed on cross bill and reversed on main bill of exceptions.

Tompkins & Alston, for plaintiff in error. John C. Reed, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. Campbell brought bail trover against Morgan in the city court of Atlanta. The case was submitted to the judge upon substantially the following agreed statement of facts: Hardaway held three notes dated August 16, 1897, signed by one Morgan, payable to the order of Hardaway,—one for $100, due 60 days after date; one for $100, due 90 days after date; one for $125, due 120 days after date. Hardaway applied to one Jackson for a loan, and offered him these notes made by Morgan, but Jackson refused to discount them. Hardaway than asked him if he would discount the notes in case they were indorsed by Campbell, the plaintiff. Jackson agreed to do so. Campbell indorsed the notes, and Jackson let Hardaway have thereon $275. At the same time a bill of sale from Morgan to Jackson of the personal property herein involved was delivered to Jackson in order to secure the notes. Campbell, the plaintiff, did not know at what price the notes were sold, to whom they were sold, and did not know who held the same, until about the time the first note became due, when he was informed who held the notes, but not what had been paid for the same. Campbell called upon Morgan and asked him to pay each of said notes as they became due. Morgan told Campbell that he (Morgan) did not have the money to pay off the notes, and asked Campbell to pay the same; and, upon Campbell paying same, Morgan stated that he would pay back to Campbell the money so expended. In pursuance of this request of Morgan, Campbell paid to Jackson the sum of $325, the full face of the notes, without knowledge of what sum had been paid for the notes by Jackson. The three notes were introduced in evidence, indorsed on the back by "J. A. Campbell, Scty.," and transferred to J. A. Campbell by Jackson as follows: "Without recourse, this note is transferred to J. A. Campbell, for value received." The bill of sale was also introduced in evidence. It was made for the purpose of securing the payment of these notes, under section 1969 et seq. of the Code of 1882, and in accordance with the act of the legislature approved December 17, 1894. It was properly signed by Morgan, legally attested, and was filed for record on December 24, 1897, and recorded on January 3, 1898. On September 16, 1897, Jackson transferred to Campbell, in writing, the bill of sale. Jackson swore upon the trial that he took the notes which were secured by the bill of sale from Morgan to himself, and transferred by himself to Campbell, in the regular course of business,—discounted them as commercial paper, that they were represented to him as such; that he took the bill of sale, and upon payment of the notes by Campbell, the security, transferred the bill of sale to Campbell, the plaintiff in this case. Defendant then introduced R. P. Bush, who was surety upon defendant's bond in the bail-trover action. Bush testified that Morgan had executed to him a bill of sale upon the property described in the petition, and in the bond which he had signed, for a valuable consideration, and which was taken without notice of the outstanding title claimed by plaintiff in this case, and that his bill of sale was recorded prior to the date of recording the bill of sale under which Campbell, the plaintiff, claims. This evidence was objected to by plaintiff as being irrelevant and immaterial, in that the outstanding title could not be pleaded or shown by the defendant, Morgan, to defeat a bill of sale which he had previously executed, and in which bill of sale he had warranted the title to the property attempted to be sold or conveyed; that Morgan was estopped to defeat the title which he had conveyed in the bill of sale, which contained his warranty, and which had previously been introduced by the plaintiff in this cause, by showing an adverse title created by himself. This objection was overruled. The bill of sale from Morgan to Bush was then admitted in evidence. The court rendered a judgment deciding that the defendant, Morgan, could not set up the outstanding title of Bush in his defense, and that the defendant is estopped to plead usury as against Campbell, holding the notes; but he ruled that the evidence showed that the bill of sale under which plaintiff claimed was void for usury, and that the plaintiff could not bring this kind of action (that is, trover), as he had no title; and that his action therefore failed. Plaintiff in error in his bill of exceptions assigns error upon the admission of the evidence of Bush and of the bill of sale from Morgan to Bush, and also assigns as error the judgment of the court finding against the plaintiff, for the reason that the same was contrary to law and the evidence, and because the defendant Morgan was estopped by his acts from pleading usury against Campbell; was estopped by the warranty in his bill of sale from setting up an outstanding title previously or subsequently made to the property which is the subject-matter of this suit. There was a cross bill of exceptions filed by counsel for defendant in error, alleging error in the following ruling of the court: In holding that Morgan could not set up the outstanding title of Bush in his defense,—and further error in holding that the defendant, Morgan, was estopped to plead usury as against Campbell, the holder of the note.

1, 2. We do not think that under the evidence in this case the court was authorized to draw the inference that any usury had been established either in the notes or in the bill of sale given to secure the same, which is the foundation of this action of trover. It seems that Hardaway held the notes of Morgan, which were unsecured then by bill of sale. What the consideration of those notes was, does not appear from the evidence,—whether Morgan gave them as a mere matter of accommodation to Hardaway, or whether he gave them for the payment of a debt he was due Hardaway. Therefore there is an utter failure of proof to show that any usurious consideration ever entered into these notes in the transaction between the maker and the payee thereof. Hardaway applied to Jackson for a loan, and offered him these notes, we presume, as collateral security. Jackson refused to accept them. Hardaway then offered to have them indorsed by Campbell, the plaintiff in this case, whereupon Jackson agreed to discount them, and bought them in at $275. At the same time Morgan gave to Jackson a bill of sale of the property herein sued for, for the purpose of securing the notes. There is no contradiction of Jackson's testimony that he took the notes in the regular course of business, discounted them as commercial paper, and had no reason to believe that they were not commercial paper, as they were represented to him as such. He took the bill of sale, and upon payment of the notes by Campbell, the security, transferred the same to him. The fact that Jackson was dealing in commercial paper, and bought these notes up at a discount, so that he paid for them less than their face value, does not render the transaction at all usurious. But, even conceding that these notes were usurious, yet this fact did not appear upon their face. The plaintiff was induced to sign the same as security in utter ignorance of any taint of usury, and in good faith believing that the payment of the notes was secured by bill of sale to the personalty which Morgan had made. When the notes fell due, plaintiff tried to get Morgan to pay them off; and Morgan's reply was a request that plaintiff pay them off as they matured, and that he would reimburse plaintiff for his expenses in so doing. This conduct on the part of the maker clearly estops him from impeaching the validity of his title on the ground of usury. To allow such a defense would be giving the debtor the privilege of taking advantage of his own fraud perpetrated upon his creditor. If Campbell, before he paid the money appearing due upon the face of these notes, had discovered that they were tainted with usury, he would have been discharged from all liability thereon. This was decided in the case of Prather v. Smith, 101 Ga. 283, 28 S. E. 857, where it was held: "A waiver of a homestead and exemption right, even though such right be inchoate only, is valid and will be binding upon the person making the waiver when the right becomes complete. Such a waiver is, however, void if embraced in a promissory note infected with usury, and a surety thereon signing in ignorance of the usury will be discharged." The decisions relied on by counsel for defendant in error have no application to the facts in this case. For instance, in Beach v. Lattner, 101 Ga. 357, (Syl., pt. 2), 28 S. E. 110, it was decided: "A grantee in a security deed tainted with usury cannot, as against the maker thereof, convey a good title, even to a person who takes bona fide, before maturity, for value, and without notice of the fact of usury." To the same effect, see Angier v. Smith, 101 Ga. 844, 28 S. E. 167. But in none of these cases does it appear that an innocent party was induced to purchase the note, or the property covered by the deed tainted with usury, by the representations and at the request of the maker thereof. Nearer allied to the facts in this case is the principle decided in Polhill v. Brown, 84 Ga. 338, 339 (Syl., pt. 3), 10 S. E. 921, where it was held: "Whatever usury may have been in the contract under which defendant had formerly conveyed the land to one to secure a debt could not affect a deed which defendant procured this one to make to plaintiff to indemnify him for standing security for defendant upon a note to a fourth person for borrowed money." See, also, Lay v. Seago, 47 Ga. 82, 83, where it is held: "If a surety on a contract originally usurious pays it, and in payment includes the usury, he is entitled to recover it of his principal, unless previous to the payment he had notice of the intention of the principal to resist the usury." A case more directly in point, and the principle in which necessarily controls the present one, is Henry v. McAllister, 99 Ga. 557, 26 S. E. 469. There it appeared: That the deed was tainted with usury, it being given as security for a usurious note. That the usury did not appear upon the face of the papers. The maker of the note and deed appealed to a third person to purchase the note, representing to him that the deed was valid and all right. It was held in that case that the maker of the usurious deed was, as against the rights of such a purchaser, estopped from setting up usury in the transaction.

3. Complaint is made in the cross bill of exceptions that the court erred in ruling that the defendant, Morgan, could not set up the outstanding title of Bush in his defense; and plaintiff in error, in the main bill, likewise complains of error in the court admitting in evidence the testimony of Bush, and the bill of sale to the property in dispute from Morgan to Bush. It seems, however, that the error in admitting that evidence was cured by the judgment of the judge, who held that the defendant Morgan could not set up the outstanding title of Bush in his defense, and that Morgan was estopped to plead usury as against Campbell, holding the notes. Bush was no party to the case. The question would have been quite different if this action had been brought against Bush, and he had been in possession of the property, claiming under this title. But the plaintiff brings his suit against Morgan, the grantor from whom he derived title, which he has made the basis of his action of trover. We think the principle announced in Hall v. Davis, 73 Ga. 101, controls this question. It was there held: "The defendant was estopped by his deed from denying title to the mortgaged premises, and neither he, nor the court at his suggestion, could intervene for the protection of the rights of a third person who would not be bound by a judgment to which he was not, and could not be made, a party." See, also, authorities therein cited. Judgment on main bill of exceptions reversed. On cross bill, affirmed. All the justices concurring.

WILKINSON et al. v. BERTOCK et al.

STIPULATION — TRIAL BY COURT — CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDERS—SET-OFF—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. When the parties on both sides of a case agree, in effect, that all contested questions shall be submitted to the jury, to be answered by specific findings; that questions not contested need not be passed upon by the jury; and that upon their findings and the undisputed facts the judge may enter a decree,—it is not erroneous, but proper, for him to take into consideration, so far as the same can be legitimately gathered from the pleadings and evidence, all the material facts concerning which the parties are not at issue, and give due effect thereto in making up the decree.

2. Shareholders of an insolvent corporation, who are indebted to it upon unpaid stock subscriptions, and who are also its creditors, cannot, in defense to an equitable proceeding brought by another creditor in behalf of himself and all the creditors of the corporation to wind up its affairs, and, as an incident thereto, to subject these shareholders to liability upon such stock subscriptions, set off against the amounts due thereon the debts due to them by the corporation. In such a case "they must pay up what they owe, like other debtors, and then get their dividends, like other creditors," when the court distributes the assets among those entitled to the same. (a) The present case is of the nature above indicated. (b) To such a case the rules governing the right of a stockholder of a corporation to set off a debt due by it to him in defense to a common-law action brought to enforce an individual liability for its debts imposed upon him by statute have no application.

3. An error of calculation which the court committed in the present case is cured by an appropriate direction.

Error from superior court, Carroll county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Suit by F. Bertock & Co. against the Wilkinson Paper Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Simmons & Corrigan, Sidney Holderness, and W. C. Hodnett, for plaintiffs in error. Oscar Reese and Robt. Zahner, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The plaintiffs below, F. Bertock & Co., filed an equitable petition against the Wilkinson Paper Company, a corporation, certain named individuals as its stockholders, and others, alleged to be acting in collusion with the officers of that company with a view to hindering, delaying, and defrauding its creditors. Petitioners averred that the paper company was indebted to them in the sum of $1,171.57, as was evidenced by two promissory notes which were past due and unpaid; that it was hopelessly insolvent; and that, with intent to defeat the collection of their just debt, it had fraudulently conveyed all its visible assets to the Hutcheson Manufacturing Company, for the benefit of certain named persons, who held mortgages covering the property so conveyed. These mortgages were attacked as being without consideration, and in fraud of petitioners' rights in the premises. They further alleged that the stockholders of the paper company named as defendants had not paid in full their subscriptions to its capital stock, and that accordingly each was, in equity, liable to account to petitioners and other creditors for the amount of his unpaid subscription. The prayers of the petition were (1) that judgment in favor of the plaintiffs be rendered against the paper company for the full amount of their claim; (2) that a receiver be appointed to take charge of the company's assets fraudulently conveyed by it to the Hutcheson Manufacturing Company; (3) that the stockholders of the paper company who had not paid in full their stock subscription be required to pay into the hands of the receiver the several amounts, respectively, due thereon, "for the benefit of the creditors of said company, and especially petitioners"; (4) that the deed to the Hutcheson Manufacturing Company and the mortgages above mentioned be canceled; (5) that the receiver be directed to sell the property fraudulently turned over to that company, to the end that the proceeds thus realized might be justly and equitably distributed among creditors according to their respective rights as fixed by final decree; and (6) that process issue, directed to all the defendants named in the petition. It appears that at the trial the controversy finally narrowed down to a contest between the plaintiffs and the defendants who were stockholders of the paper company as to their liability to account for unpaid stock subscriptions, and they bring the case to this court upon exceptions to a decree based upon a special verdict of the jury which was adverse to them upon this issue.

1. The first attack made upon this decree is that the trial court erred in rendering judgment in favor of Bertock & Co. for the amount due upon the promissory notes held by them, "because there was no finding in favor of the plaintiffs and against the Wilkinson Paper Company in the verdict of the jury, and, without a finding by the jury in favor of the plaintiffs, the court had no jurisdiction to render that portion of the decree." That there is no merit in this contention is conclusively established by the following facts which the record before us discloses: So far as appears, the paper company interposed no defense to the action; and none of the plaintiffs in error, each of whom filed a separate answer thereto, undertook to deny the alleged indebtedness of the company, or to raise any issue in regard thereto. Furthermore, at the trial Bertock & Co. introduced in evidence the two promissory notes which were the basis of their claim against the company, and no attempt to meet and overcome the prima facie case thus made out was essayed by the plaintiffs in error, or by any one of their co-defendants. The decree rendered by the court is set forth in full in the bill of exceptions, and contains a recital to the following effect: After argument had, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiffs in error and other parties at interest that "all contested questions in the case should be submitted to the jury by the court, in the shape of written questions," but "that all other questions in the case necessary to an adjudication of the same which were not contested, and which were outside the written questions, were conceded, and that the judge of said court should decree upon the same without the intervention of a jury." The Wilkinson Paper Company was represented in open court, when said agreement was made, by its president "and other officers"; and it being by them conceded "as an admission binding not only upon the company, but also upon" themselves, as defendants, individually, that there was no contest over plaintiffs' demand against the Wilkinson Paper Company, "or over certain other specified matters, the court, in pursuance of said agreement, submitted" to the jury the questions really at issue. These questions, the bill of exceptions states, are correctly set forth in the decree. None of them remotely referred to the plaintiffs' claim against the paper company, notwithstanding they were framed under the following circumstances: "The defense submitted such questions as they desired to have the jury pass upon. The plaintiffs also submitted such questions as they desired to have the jury pass upon. The court revised the questions submitted by both sides, and changed and altered" the same "to meet the views of the court and counsel of both sides," after which revision they were reduced to writing and duly passed upon by the jury. It is to be noted in this connection that, as presented to the trial judge for verification, the bill of exceptions contained various recitals as to what transpired at the hearing at variance with those above referred to as appearing in the decree of the court with regard to the agreement between the parties; but, before certifying the bill of exceptions, his honor eliminated all conflict in this respect by striking therefrom all statements not in harmony with those set forth in his decree, being unwilling, evidently, to adopt as true counsel's version as to what was conceded by their clients. In view of this fact, it is somewhat remarkable that counsel pressed before this court their contention that the trial judge improperly rendered judgment against the paper company, yet, as they have seen fit to do so, we deal with the point, and announce as our conclusion thereon the ruling made in the first headnote.

2. It appeared from evidence introduced in behalf of the defense that, prior to the institution of the plaintiffs' action, M. R. Wilkinson and E. P. McBurney, the principal stockholders of the paper company, had advanced out of their individual means large sums of money with which to pay off and discharge various claims against that company which were being pressed by its creditors, and in this manner it had become largely indebted to them. In one instance suit had been commenced against the company, and payment was made to prevent a judgment being rendered against it. Some of these claims were based on promissory notes of the company, many of which had been indorsed by McBurney, and others of which bore the personal indorsement of Wilkinson. In the aggregate, the sums of money each had thus expended in behalf of the company far exceeded the amount of his unpaid stock subscription. They accordingly sought to defeat any recovery against them in the present action on the ground that, as accounts stood between themselves and the paper company, it was really largely their debtor. The question squarely presented, therefore, is whether or not, as against Bertock & Co. or other creditors of the corporation, Wilkinson and McBurney were at liberty to plead as a set-off their just demands against the paper company. The reply to this question is to be found in the following extracts taken from Judge Thompson's admirable work on the Law of Corporations (volume 3, §§ 3785–3787): "As a corporation is a distinct person in law from each of its members, and as it may sue one of its members and be sued by him, the same as one natural person may sue another and be sued by him, it follows that in any action by a corporation against one of its stockholders, while the corporation is a going concern, the stockholder has the same right to set off any debt which may be due to him from the corporation which he would have if sued by a natural person. And the same rules govern in determining whether the right of set-off exists which governs in ordinary actions. A leading one of these rules is that no debts can be set off against each other which are not mutual. But the right of set-off resembles, in one respect, the right of rescission for fraud. It ceases as soon as the corporation becomes insolvent. The stockholder cannot, in a proceeding against him by or on behalf of a creditor or creditors, set off a debt due to him by the corporation. Where there is a general winding-up proceeding, either by means of a receiver or liquidator appointed under a statute such as the * * * late federal bankruptcy act, or a state insolvency law, no right of set-off exists in favor of the shareholder, since to allow such a right would be to allow a preference to the shareholders over other creditors. On the contrary, they must pay up what they owe, like other debtors, and then get their dividends, like other creditors. The first reason generally given for the rule denying the right of set-off after a corporation has become insolvent is the theoretical reason which often operates to deny the right of set-off in courts of law, which is that there can be no set-off unless the debts are mutual and in the same right. Briefly explained, the meaning is that, when the assets have been impressed with the quality of a trust fund for the equal benefit of all the creditors, their custodian, whether the corporation, its directors, a receiver, assignee, or other liquidator, holds them, not in the right of the corporation against which the set-off is claimed, but in right of the creditors." Accordingly, this rule obtains as against a stockholder who is at once both a debtor and a creditor of a corporation, when his "liability is for moneys due on account of stock held by him which has not been fully paid. Such a debt, as we have seen, is deemed in equity a part of the capital stock of the company, and is a trust fund to be devoted to the payment of all its creditors; and hence, while the company, as long as it continues a going concern, may call it in, and the stockholder, without doubt, set off against it any demand he may have against the company, yet when the company becomes insolvent, and there is not enough to satisfy all its creditors, this trust fund manifestly cannot be appropriated by a creditor who is a stockholder to the exclusive payment of his own claim. Substantially the same reasons are held in the English courts of equity. The winding-up acts of that country are framed on the idea of doing justice to creditors by allowing them to share pari passu. By allowing the right of set-off to a shareholder who is a creditor, he thereby obtains a preference over other creditors. * * * The disallowance of the right of set-off does the shareholder no injustice, because, if the company is insolvent, he will share pari passu with other creditors, whereas, if there is enough to pay all the debts in full, of course his debt will be paid among the rest, and the right of set-off will not be wanted, to do justice between him and the other shareholders." It is worthy of note that Judge Thompson, before dismissing the subject, adds: "Where the object of the proceeding is to sequester what remains unpaid by the stockholder to the corporation upon his share subscription, and there are no other creditors, then no reason exists why he should not be exonerated to the extent of his demand against the corporation." Id. § 3788, citing McAvity v. Paper Co., 82 Me. 504, 20 Atl. 82, wherein the contest was wholly between the plaintiff and fellow stockholders, who were represented by an assignee. That is to say, it is evidently just to allow such a set-off so long as the rights of creditors will not be thereby prejudiced. For illustration, when, as in Stinson v. Williams, 35 Ga. 170, a single creditor of a corporation, without regard to its solvency or to the rights of other creditors, seeks through the aid of a court of equity to subject to the payment of his claim equitable assets of the corporation which cannot be reached by the legal process of garnishment, he necessarily predicates his action upon the ground that, as a creditor of the corporation, he is entitled to enforce against a stockholder its legal or equitable rights in the premises,—not upon the idea that unpaid stock subscriptions constitute a trust fund to be equitably distributed among all creditors, for he proceeds in behalf of himself alone, with a view to reaping all the benefits sought, to the entire exclusion of every one else. It follows, of course, that there would, in that sort of a case, be no equity in depriving the shareholder of the benefit of any of his defenses as against the corporation itself. Indeed, the only theory upon which, as to the corporation itself, a proceeding can be maintained, says the eminent writer just referred to, in section 3481 of the volume above cited, is that a "creditor who has exhausted his remedy at law, and who seeks the aid of equity, is not bound to proceed in behalf of other creditors, and to shake the tree in order that they may come in and help him pick up the fruit"; and he has nothing to do with adjusting the equities among the stockholders, but that, having exhausted his remedies at law, he is entitled to the aid of equity to discover and subject to the payment of his debt any assets of the corporation, wherever he can find them,—whether in the possession of a stockholder or elsewhere. While very properly permitted to bring an action of this character, it does not follow that such creditor will at all events be granted the relief he seeks. On the contrary, "a court of equity will not allow a single creditor to proceed where it appears (1) that there are other creditors, and (2) that there is not enough for all,—in other words, that the particular creditor is endeavoring to use a court of equity as the instrument of getting an advantage over other creditors who stand equal with him in right." 3 Thomp. Corp. § 3482. "The general rule is that a creditor who proceeds in chancery to subject the liability of the shareholders of an insolvent corporation must bring his bill on behalf of all other creditors who may come in and establish their debts according to the course of a court of chancery. Whilst liens and legal priorities are preserved, he does not obtain a preference over other creditors by the filing of such a bill, but the property of the corporation, or the sums due from other shareholders in respect to their individual liability, are sequestered for the ratable benefit of all the creditors." Id. § 3483.

It is not difficult to properly classify the present proceeding. As will have been perceived from the foregoing preliminary statement of facts, the obvious purpose of the petition filed by Bertock & Co. was to bring about a speedy and equitable winding up of the affairs of the paper company. They alleged it was hopelessly insolvent, and this was proved upon the hearing. They prayed for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of all its assets, and that he be empowered and directed to convert the same into cash, to the end that there might be an equitable distribution of the proceeds among all its creditors. In so far as their petition sought to hold the stockholders of the corporation individually liable for unpaid stock subscriptions, they, in direct and unequivocal terms, stated their object to be to thus reach a trust fund to be paid into the hands of the receiver "for the benefit of the creditors of said company, and especially petitioners." Therefore, while, perhaps pardonably, chiefly concerned as to their own protection, they at the same time recognized to the fullest extent the right of other creditors to share in the fruits of the litigation. Furthermore, the plaintiffs averred in their petition that they had therein "disclosed the names of the creditors or alleged creditors of defendants, so far as [was] within the knowledge of petitioners or their power of ascertaining," and it appears that at the hearing all creditors concerned in the controversy were properly before the court. Upon the argument here, counsel for the plaintiffs in error sought to draw an analogy between the present action and that class of cases in which a creditor of an insolvent corporation, basing his right to recover upon a statute imposing upon each of its stockholders a limited individual liability for its debts, brings a common-law action against one or more of them to enforce such statutory liability. In this connection the cases of Lane v. Harris, 16 Ga. 217, Robinson v. Bank, 18 Ga. 65, and Jones v. Wiltberger, 42 Ga. 575, were cited in support of the proposition that where a stockholder, prior to the filing of a suit against him, had voluntarily discharged debts of the corporation equal in amount to his statutory liability, he could not be compelled to pay anything more at the instance of a creditor whose claim remained unsatisfied. The case of Boyd v. Hall, 56 Ga. 563, wherein it was ruled that "a bona fide judgment debt of a stockholder against the company in which he holds stock may be set off by him in equity against a suit to make him individually liable in proportion to his stock," was also relied on. None of these cases, or others on the same line which might be cited, can, however, properly be considered as having any bearing whatever on the question now in hand. The decision in each was predicated upon what this court deemed the proper construction of a statute imposing upon stockholders a liability for the debts of the corporation, in the event it should itself be unable to pay the same. In other words, in each instance the court undertook to construe an act of the general assembly, determine its true intent and meaning, and then give effect to the legislative will with reference to its subject-matter. Whether or not a correct interpretation of these several statutes was arrived at, it is not now pertinent to inquire. On the contrary, it is only necessary to contrast the case at bar—an equitable proceeding to marshal and administer the assets of an insolvent corporation—with those in which the rulings relied on were announced. It is not, in the present case, contended that the stockholders of the paper company were, under the terms of its charter, individually liable for one dollar of the company's debts. Its charter is not in the record before us, but presumably it was such as is usually granted to ordinary private mercantile or manufacturing concerns, and imposed upon its stockholders no statutory individual liability for its debts. Certain it is that Bertock & Co. did not attempt to show any such liability, or to recover anything upon the theory that the plaintiffs in error were under any duty whatever to pay, in whole or in part, the company's debts. Their debts, and their debts alone, were they called upon to pay,—debts which constituted a portion of the assets of an insolvent corporation, and were therefore impressed with a trust raised by law for the equal protection and benefit of all its creditors. Civ. Code, § 1886; Railroad Co. v. McDaniel, 56 Ga. 191; Turner v. Insurance Co., 65 Ga. 649; Hamilton v. Insurance Co., 67 Ga. 145, 150; Beck v. Henderson, 76 Ga. 360, 370; King v. Sullivan, 93 Ga. 621, 626, 20 S. E. 76. Our attention has not been called to any statute, general or special, wherein the legislature has expressed its will that, as regards debts of this character, the debtor of a corporation shall be left undisturbed and unmolested, provided only he be also its creditor in an equal or in a greater degree. We know of none. It would therefore seem that the familiar rules which obtain in equity procedure should be held to apply in the present case, and it results that the plaintiffs in error were not entitled to a preference over another creditor, the justice of whose claim they do not even pretend to dispute, but voluntarily conceded upon the hearing below.

3. His honor of the trial bench gave proper direction to the case in this respect, and undertook to prorate the proceeds realized from unpaid stock subscriptions among Bertock & Co., Wilkinson, and McBurney, the only creditors of the paper company entitled to share in this fund, according to the amount of its indebtedness to each of them, respectively. It appears, however, that, in calculating the amount due upon the various claims held by Wilkinson and McBurney, the court computed interest only from the date the present action was instituted, whereas the evidence discloses that all of these claims had been paid off by, and assigned to, one or the other of them several months prior to that time. As direct exception is taken to the decree upon this ground, we have given appropriate direction whereby the error thus committed may be corrected. Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the justices concurring.

CORNELL et al. v. SIMS et al.

CORPORATIONS—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDERS—REQUEST TO DIRECTORS.

As a general proposition, stockholders in a corporation cannot, in their own names, institute an action against it, nor defend one brought against it, until a request from them to the directors to institute or defend such action has been made and refused, which fact must be alleged in either instance. Such allegation, however, may be omitted when the corporate management is under the control of parties who, it is alleged, are guilty of fraud or collusive conduct in refusing to bring or to defend the suit which such stockholders desire shall be instituted or defended. But in neither of these events can the stockholders institute or defend an action in the name of the corporation. On the contrary, the corporation must be a party defendant to the action, and sufficient allegations of the failure of the corporate authorities to take action be made, to authorize the stockholders to intervene in their own name. Accordingly, it is held that when stockholders intervene in a suit filed against the corporation, and allege that, through fraud and collusive conduct, the officers and directors refuse to defend such suit, it is not error to refuse to permit such stockholders to appear and defend in the name of the corporation, when they decline to proceed in their own names as stockholders, in behalf of themselves and other stockholders who may see proper to join with them in defense of such suit.

MORTON v. MAYOR, ETC., OF MACON.

LICENSE—PROHIBITORY TAX—LOANS ON PERSONALTY.

1. The mayor and council of a city have not, under a legislative grant of "authority to levy and collect a license tax * * * upon all persons exercising any profession, trade or calling within said city," the power to impose upon a useful and legitimate business a prohibitory tax.

2. "Lending money on household or kitchen furniture and wearing apparel" is, if lawfully conducted, such a business, and therefore one which cannot be classed as injurious to the public, although some persons who make loans on such security may be usurers.

Error from superior court, Bibb county; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

J. M. Morton was convicted of violating an ordinance of the city of Macon. A writ of certiorari was overruled, and he brings error. Reversed.

M. Felton Hatcher and Guerry & Hall, for plaintiff in error. Roland Ellis, Minter Wimberly, and Robert Hodges, Sol. Gen., for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. Section 72 of the charter of Macon provides: "That the mayor and council shall have power to license, regulate and control all hotels and public houses within the city; also, to regulate all butcher pens and slaughter houses within the corporation, and to remove the same if they shall become nuisances or injurious to the health of the city. They shall also have power to license drays, hacks and other vehicles used for business purposes, and to regulate the same. They shall also have full power to regulate and control all livery stables, pumps, bar-rooms, restaurants, places of amusement, telegraph, telephone and electric companies, all gas, water and railroad companies doing business or seeking to do business within said city." Section 79 confers upon the mayor and council "power to levy and collect a tax * * * upon all persons exercising within the city any profession, trade, calling or business of any nature whatever." And section 84 declares: "That said mayor and council shall have authority to levy and collect a license tax * * * upon all persons exercising any profession, trade or calling in said city, when not prohibited from so doing by the constitution and laws of this state; to compel the payment of the same; to make all suitable laws and regulations necessary and proper to carry out the powers herein conferred, and to prescribe suitable penalties for the violation thereof." The tax ordinance of the city for the year 1900 imposed a tax of $500 upon "money lenders, copartners, associations, corporations, or individuals, lending money on household or kitchen furniture and wearing apparel." If further provided that this license tax should be paid "by January 15, 1900, or within fifteen days from commencing business," and declared that all persons failing to comply with this provision should "be deemed guilty of doing business without a license" and subject to a prescribed penalty. Morton was, in the recorder's court, convicted upon a charge brought against him of doing business in violation of this ordinance. He thereupon sued out a certiorari to the superior court, to the overruling of which he excepted. At the trial before the recorder it was affirmatively proved that the tax in question was, in effect, prohibitory. It also appeared that Morton and other money lenders of the class described in the ordinance exacted from their customers exorbitant and usurious rates of interest. Did the municipal authorities, under and by virtue of the above-recited provisions of the city's charter, and in view of the fact last mentioned, have power to impose such a tax? As this is the main and controlling question in the case, we will confine ourselves to a discussion of it, without noticing the minor points presented by the bill of exceptions.

There is a very wide difference between a power to license an occupation with a view to regulation, and a power to tax it for the sole purpose of raising revenue. "A power to license, when specifically given in the charter of a city, is * * * a police power. The exaction of license fees for revenue purposes is the exercise of the power of taxation." North Hudson Co. Ry. Co. v. City of Hoboken, 41 N. J. Law, 71. As will have been perceived, the general assembly, in the seventy-second section of the charter of Macon, dealt expressly with the question of empowering the municipal authorities to license, regulate, and control occupations carried on within the city, and, in so doing, specifically enumerated the various callings to which their powers in these respects should apply. Among them we find no mention of money lenders. The mayor and council therefore have not, under this section, any power to exercise police supervision over the business of persons whose occupation it is to lend money. Nor can the municipal authorities rightly claim that any such power is given them by the provisions contained in section 84. The term "license tax," as therein used, cannot be understood as expressly conferring, or even implying, a grant of power to regulate the professions, trades, or callings which are by this section made the subject-matter of taxation. On the contrary, this term, as here employed, has relation strictly to the power of taxation, and not to that of police regulation. We are further of the opinion that no right to regulate or supervise is derivable from the concluding provisions of this section, whereby the municipal authorities are empowered "to make all suitable laws and regulations necessary and proper to" enforce payment of the tax, "and to prescribe suitable penalties for the violation thereof." To our minds it is clear that these provisions cannot be tortured into a grant of power to regulate or to exercise police supervision over the various occupations upon which the license taxes may be imposed. Obviously, it was the legislative intent simply to confer upon the mayor and council power "to compel the payment of the" taxes by adopting such ordinances looking to that end as might be necessary and proper. Our views respecting those portions of the charter of Macon with which we are now concerned coincide with those expressed in the case of Fretwell v. City of Troy, 18 Kan. 271, in which it was held that power to levy and collect a "license tax" on specified occupations "was designed for purposes of revenue, rather than of police regulation." The question before us is therefore resolved into simply this: Does a power given by law to a municipal corporation to tax a useful and legitimate business include the right of imposing upon it a tax so high as to render it impossible to pay the same and carry on the business profitably? As the purpose of such taxation is to raise money for the support of the municipal government, and as the power of taxing is given exclusively for the accomplishment of this needful purpose, ordinances adopted in pursuance of this power must tend to effectuate, and not to defeat, the end in view. Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 240, 241. We find the following in Cooley, Tax'n (2d Ed.) 597, 598: "If a revenue authority is what seems to be conferred, the extent of the tax, when not limited by the grant itself, must be understood to be left to the judgment and discretion of the municipal government, to be determined in the usual mode in which its legislative authority is exercised; but the grant of authority to impose fees for the purposes of revenue would not warrant their being made so heavy as to be prohibitory, thereby defeating the purpose." In 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law it is, with reference to the imposition of license taxes on useful trades and occupations, laid down that a municipality is not "authorized to entirely prohibit the exercise of the trade or occupation by any excessive license fee." See pages 532–534, and cases cited in notes.

Under a Nebraska statute relating to cities of the "second class," the city of Lincoln was authorized "to raise revenue by levying and collecting a license tax on any occupation or business within the limits of the city, and regulate the same by ordinance." The supreme court of that state, in the case of Caldwell v. City of Lincoln, 19 Neb. 569, 27 N. W. 647, held that taxes imposed by virtue of this act "must be reasonable, considering the nature of the business, and not so high as to prohibit the carrying on of the business." See, also, in this connection, Ex parte Burnett, 30 Ala. 461; Craig v. Burnett, 32 Ala. 728. In the Kansas case cited above, Mr. Justice Brewer plainly indicated that in his opinion it was not true "that a city having authority to collect revenue by license may impose any sum, however large, as license, and thus, in effect, destroy certain kinds of business." See 18 Kan. 275. In City of Lyons v. Cooper, 39 Kan. 324, 18 Pac. 296, it was expressly ruled that, under legislative authority to levy and collect "just and reasonable" license taxes from persons pursuing designated occupations, "an ordinance of such city purporting upon its face to be enacted for the levying and collecting of a license tax, but which is a clear and palpable attempt to destroy and forbid a legitimate, necessary, and commendable business, is void and cannot be enforced." The tax then under review was held to have been laid, "not for revenue, but for destruction," and therefore wholly unauthorized. As all taxes ought to be "just and reasonable," we do not think the Kansas statute, by stipulating in express terms that the license taxes which it authorized the city to impose should be so, was really more restrictive than an act which in general terms merely gives the power to tax. Chief Justice Horton, in denying the right of the city to levy the tax complained of, took the ground that, even where the power embraced authority to both regulate and tax, the city could not make the tax so large as to be prohibitory. He said: "The grant of authority to a mayor and city council to impose license fees for the purposes of revenue would not warrant them to be so heavy as to be prohibitory, thereby defeating the purposes. Where the grant is not made for revenue alone, but for regulation also, and the business is one that does not injuriously affect the public interests, or lead to disorder or to increased necessity for police supervision, like the sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage, the license fee, while somewhat within the discretion of the mayor and council, ought not to and cannot be so excessive as to prohibit or destroy a business carried on for necessary purposes." Page 327, 39 Kan., and page 298, 18 Pac. On the same line is the case of Hirshfield v. City of Dallas, 29 Tex. App. 242, 15 S. W. 124, wherein it was held that a tax "laid for the double purpose of regulation and revenue must be grounded in both the police and taxing power, but the grant of a power to tax will not authorize the imposition of a burden in its nature and purpose prohibitory." White, P. J., expressed the opinion that under its broad charter power to "license, tax and regulate" occupations, "the city was empowered not only to exact a reasonable license fee and license for the purpose of regulating the occupation under its police power, but to impose, if it desired to do so, a reasonable tax for purposes of revenue on the pursuit of the occupation." Page 245, 29 Tex. App., and page 125, 15 S. W. The word "reasonable," twice used in the clause just quoted, is of the utmost significance in arriving at its meaning. It is true that on the same page this learned judge does say that "some occupations are so injurious that a tax prohibitory entirely would be justifiable," and the same idea has been advanced by Judge Cooley. After stating that license fees may be imposed (1) for regulation, (2) for revenue, (3) to give monopolies, and (4) for prohibition, and declaring that "the third purpose is inadmissible in any free government," he says: "The fourth purpose is entirely admissible in the case of pursuits or indulgences which in their general effect are believed to be more harmful than beneficial to society, and which consequently the public interest requires should be put an end to. A case of this nature is that of heavy fees imposed on the keepers of implements of gaming. When, however, prohibition is the object, the end may generally be more directly accomplished by legislation which in its terms is prohibitory, than by the circuitous method of imposing a burden difficult or impossible to be borne, and the direct method is consequently the one usually adopted." Cooley, Tax'n (2d Ed.) 592, 593.

We think the best way to prohibit is to prohibit. But be this as it may, the charter of Macon did not expressly confer any power to prohibit; and, moreover, even if such a power, relatively to injurious pursuits, could be inferred from its provisions, the business of money lenders of the particular class sought to be taxed by the ordinance now under consideration is not on its face an injurious one, but one which, if carried on without violating the usury laws, would apparently be beneficial to people of small means. It is to be observed that the tax is not imposed on usurers. Indeed, it is doubtful whether the city could license their unlawful calling; for it can hardly be supposed that the legislature deliberately intended to authorize the collection of taxes upon forbidden pursuits, and thus give at least a qualified sanction to the carrying on of the same. The fact that some money lenders practiced usury cannot be held to make the useful and legitimate business to which the ordinance applied one which should be considered as per se hurtful. There is scarcely any calling which unscrupulous persons cannot, if they choose, carry on in an unlawful manner.

Before concluding, it is proper to remark that the question above discussed widely differs from that which might arise respecting the validity of a tariff imposed by congress ostensibly for revenue, but really for protection, and in effect prohibitory, or upon the constitutionality of a state statute professing merely to tax a particular occupation, but in fact designed to destroy it. We may, for the purposes of this case, grant to the fullest extent the authority of the lawmaking power of the nation or of any state to respectively enact laws of the nature above indicated without touching the question we have herein undertaken to decide. Granting that the general assembly of this state might tax out of existence useful occupations, and even that it might in terms empower a city so to do, we are perfectly certain that nothing of the kind has been attempted in the present instance. The city of Macon may tax occupations, but there is nothing in its charter which either expressly or by implication authorizes it to directly suppress any legitimate business, or to indirectly accomplish such a result under the guise of an ordinance purporting to impose a license tax for the purpose of raising revenue, but having for its real object the prohibition of that very business.

The foregoing, we think, conclusively establishes the propositions laid down in the headnotes, and it results that so much of the Macon ordinance as seeks to impose the tax of which the plaintiff in error complains is void. That the courts have the power to declare inoperative municipal ordinances which are ultra vires or unreasonable and oppressive is too well settled to require argument or the citation of authority. The certiorari ought to have been sustained. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

BRADLEY v. STATE ex rel. HILL, Sol. Gen. LOONEY v. SAME.

CONTEMPT—POWER TO PUNISH—JURISDICTION.

1. The power to punish contempts is inherent in every court of record. If the court is created by the constitution, the legislature cannot, without express constitutional authority, define what are contempts, and declare that the court shall have jurisdiction over no acts except those specified.

2. The provision of the constitution which declares that "the power of the courts to punish for contempts shall be limited by legislative acts" does not confer such authority, but only the power to prescribe the punishment after conviction. Consequently, section 4046 of the Civil Code, in so far as it seeks to limit the jurisdiction of a constitutional court to punish contempts to certain specified acts, is not binding upon such courts. They may go beyond the provisions of the statute, in order to preserve and enforce their constitutional powers, by treating as contempts, acts which clearly invade them.

3. That a given act may be indictable does not deprive a court of the power of dealing with it as a contempt of court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county: J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Informations by the state, on the relation of C. D. Hill, solicitor general, against W. A. Bradley and T. S. Looney, for contempt. From a judgment of conviction, they bring error. Affirmed.

King & Anderson, Lewis W. Thomas, and Rosser & Carter, for plaintiffs in error. C. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. Information under oath was filed before the judge of the superior court of the Atlanta circuit, charging Bradley and Looney with contempt of court. The specifications of the charges will be found in the official report. Neither Bradley nor Looney was an officer or juror of the court, or connected with the case on trial. Both filed demurrers on the grounds that the facts set out did not show that they were guilty of any contempt of court; that the allegations did not show that the contempt, if any was committed, was in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice; that, if the facts alleged were true, they were liable to be indicted for the violation of a criminal statute. These were, in substance, the grounds of demurrer argued before this court The court overruled the demurrers, trials were had, Bradley and Looney were adjudged in contempt, and both fines and imprisonment were imposed. To this judgment and sentence, and to the overruling of their demurrers, Bradley and Looney excepted. A separate information was filed against each, and they were tried separately, but the cases were argued together here, and we will treat them together, as they present the same questions.

The power to punish for contempts is inherent in every court of justice. It is absolutely necessary that a court should possess this power in order that it may carry on the administration of justice, and preserve order and decorum in the court. As far as we can ascertain, this power has existed since courts were first established. Judge Wilmot, in 1765, in a treatise upon the subject, said he had been unable to find where it was first exercised, but, in his opinion, it was as old as the courts themselves. All the courts in their decisions, and all the text writers, lay down the same doctrine,—that this power is necessary to all courts, and is inherent in them. It is so well established that we deem it unnecessary to cite authorities upon the subject. This power being inherent and necessary, can the legislature, by defining what are contempts, limit the courts to treating as contempts such acts only as are embraced in the legislative definition? In the formation of our government, federal and state, the three departments of government were in each constitution ordained to be separate, distinct, and independent of each other. No one of them had any right or power to infringe upon the power or jurisdiction of the other without an express constitutional provision granting this right or power. The legislature cannot take away, restrict, or modify any of the powers conferred by the constitution upon the executive. Nor can the executive infringe upon the powers of the legislature. Nor can either the legislative or executive abridge the powers conferred by the constitution upon the courts, unless express authority is given. Each of these departments represents the sovereignty of the people. Indeed, the executive, the legislature, and the judiciary are but the servants and agents of the people. To each department the people have given certain powers, and have declared that neither of the other departments shall interfere therewith. The people have intrusted these servants or agents with the duty of carrying out their will, and for that purpose, in one of these departments, they have, by their organic law, established certain courts. Among these are the superior courts. When these courts were established by the constitution, they were established with all the rights and powers possessed by all courts of record prior to that time. Among these powers was that of defining and punishing contempts of court, whether such contempts were direct—that is, committed in the presence of the court—or constructive, interfering indirectly with the administration of justice. This power was incident to the court itself, and belonged, not to the judges as individuals, but to the court. The courts established by the constitution were established by the people, and represented the majesty of the people. Whoever disobeyed an order of such a court, or was in contempt of its proceedings, or did anything which tended to impede or corrupt the administration of justice, committed a contempt against the majesty of the people. Without power and ability to preserve order and decorum, to preserve the purity of jury trial, and to enforce their own orders, and the like, courts could not carry out the wishes of the people. The courts established by the constitution were therefore vested with all these necessary powers,—powers which were, at common law, possessed by all courts of record. Whatever a court of record could, under the common law, punish as a contempt, these courts had power to deal with as a contempt. This power came to them as much as did the common law. Indeed, it is a part of the common law. 1 Bailey, Juris. § 297. When the constitutional convention established our courts, it vested in them all the power necessary to carry out the purposes for which they were designed. Such a court, established with such powers, is not, in the exercise of these powers, subject to legislative control. The superior court is a constitutional court, established with these powers, and the legislature has no right, without express constitutional authority, to abridge, restrict, or modify either its jurisdiction or its powers. 1 Bailey, Juris. § 397; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384; Carter v. Com. (Va.) 32 S. E. 780, 45 L. R. A. 310; Ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall. 505, 22 L. Ed. 205; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 33, and cases cited. These points were conceded by the able and learned counsel who argued these cases here, but they claimed that the constitution of this state had granted to the legislature the express power to define what are contempts, to classify them, and to take away from the courts jurisdiction to punish as contempts any act not mentioned in the statute, which is now codified as section 4046 of the Civil Code. Paragraph 20 of section 1 of article 1 of the constitution of our state (Civ. Code, § 5717), in the bill of rights, says: "The power of the courts to punish for contempts shall be limited by legislative acts." We think that neither a literal nor a liberal construction of this paragraph can make it mean what counsel for the plaintiffs in error insisted it did mean. The word "power," used in this connection, and as applied to courts, means "the right, ability, or faculty of doing something." Bouv. Law Dict. (2d Ed.) tit. "Power." It is "the ability to act, regarded as latent or inherent; the faculty of doing or performing something; capacity for action or performance." Webster. The word "punish" is defined by Webster to mean "to impose a penalty upon; to afflict with pain, loss, or suffering for a crime or fault; * * * to inflict a penalty for (an offense) upon the offender"; and by Anderson, "to impose a penalty for the commission of a crime." Giving to these two words their ordinary and usual meaning, the paragraph would read as follows: "The right or authority of the courts to impose penalties or inflict punishment for contempts shall be restricted by legislative acts." If the framers of the constitution had desired that the legislature should classify and define contempts of court, they would certainly have put in this paragraph, or in some other, words expressly giving the legislature power to do so. Had they said that the legislature should have power to define what are contempts, there could be no possible doubt upon the subject. Many illustrations could be given of where constitutions give to the legislature power to define offenses and to fix the punishment for the same, but we think that nothing of the sort, in regard to contempts, is contained in our constitution. Where a court is established by the constitution, it is given all the powers usually possessed by all courts, and we will not construe another provision of the constitution so as to take away from the court a power which is essential to its preservation, and to its accomplishment of the purposes for which it is created, unless constrained to do so by express words or necessary implication.

The power to limit the punishment of contempts was first given the legislature by the constitution of 1861. The chairman of the committee on the revision of the constitution in that convention was T. R. R. Cobb, who, in my opinion, was the greatest lawyer this state has ever produced, and who had, I think, no superior in any other state. His codification of the common law, of equitable principles, of the statutes of this state, and of the decisions of this court will stand as a monument to his great learning, research, and ability as long as our system of laws prevails. Being chairman of the committee which reported the constitution of 1861, he doubtless drafted the paragraph now under consideration. He was not only a great lawyer, but a scholar as well, and must certainly have known the meaning of the words used, and what would be their effect, and must have used them with reference to their ordinary meaning, as defined by lexicographers. Taking these words in this sense, it is clear to us that the only power given to the legislature was the power to fix the limit of the punishment which the courts could inflict for contempts. Before that time, courts were not restricted, in punishing contempts, to any certain sum or to any certain period of imprisonment. Knowing the fallibility of human nature, and perhaps believing, from his experience and practice in the courts, that a judge sometimes took a contempt as personal, rather than as a contempt of his authority or office, and punished it too severely, and knowing, also, that the legislature would have no power, without a constitutional provision, to control the judge in this matter, Mr. Cobb doubtless inserted this provision in order to give the legislature power to restrict and limit the amount or quantum of punishment which could be inflicted. We are strengthened in this view by certain provisions inserted by Mr. Cobb in his codification of the laws of the state. From a diligent search of the statutes in force prior to 1861, we can find no act of the legislature which attempted to restrict the amount of punishment to be imposed for contempts of court, the only hint at it being in the judiciary act of 1799, which prescribed the practice in summoning jurors, and declared they should be fined $300 for nonappearance. When Mr. Cobb came to codify the laws of the state, he knew that there was no act limiting the punishment for contempt, and we first find a limitation upon the amount of such punishment in the Code of 1863. In that Code were sections limiting the amount of punishment for contempts in the supreme and superior courts and courts of ordinary. These sections were doubtless inserted by him to carry out the provisions of the paragraph of the bill of rights quoted above. They limit the punishment for contempt by prescribing the maximum of fine or imprisonment which could be imposed. They apparently show Mr. Cobb's construction of the constitutional provision, and they have been adopted and incorporated in all succeeding Codes of this state.

If these views are correct, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that constitutional courts are not, in dealing with contempts, restricted exclusively to the acts specified in section 4046 of the Civil Code, and that the legislature had no power, so far as these courts were concerned, to take away the inherent power to punish for contempt. Such a court may still "go beyond the provisions of the statute in order to preserve and enforce its constitutional powers by treating as contempts acts which clearly invade them." Rap. Contempt, § 11. Tampering with a juror or officer of court, corrupting or attempting to corrupt him, bribing or attempting to bribe him, are held by all courts to be contempts. Nor does it make any difference that the same act is indictable under the penal laws of the state. On this subject, Judge Seymour D. Thompson, in an admirable article in 5 Cr. Law Mag., says (page 155): "The power of the courts in this regard being founded in the principle of self-preservation, it does not at all go to deprive them of it that the law has provided some other mode for punishing the offender. It is quite immaterial that the offense is indictable. Courts are not obliged to trust the preservation of their dignity and authority to such weak agencies as information, indictment, and trial by jury, it may be before some other tribunal, where the success of the prosecution and the conviction of the offender may depend upon the zeal of a prosecuting witness, or the state's attorney, or upon circumstances purely accidental. Besides, the exigencies may not admit of so tardy a remedy." See the authorities cited in the footnote, and see, also, 2 Bish. New Cr. Law, § 264. On the general subject of contempts and the power of the legislature to regulate their punishment, see an admirable treatise by Judge Bailey in his work on Jurisdiction (volume 1, § 287 et seq.). In the argument of this case, counsel cited many decisions of the United States courts construing the act of congress of March, 1831, of which section 4046 of our Code is substantially a copy. These decisions simply hold that the circuit and district courts, being the mere creatures of congress, are bound by the act of congress defining what contempts shall be punishable. Judge Field, in Ex parte Robinson, supra, puts his decision on that ground, and virtually holds that the supreme court of the United States, being a constitutional court, would not be bound by the act. So, while in this state courts created by the legislature are bound by section 4046 of the Civil Code, our superior courts, being created by the constitution, and having the inherent power to decide what are contempts and to punish for contempts, cannot be controlled in this respect by the legislature. The latter has no more power to abridge, restrict, or modify the jurisdiction of the superior courts over contempts than it has to abridge their jurisdiction over matters conferred upon them exclusively by the constitution, such as the trial of title to land and the like. The constitutional provision giving the legislature power to limit the power to punish for contempts does not authorize it to define or classify contempts, but only to fix the maximum amount of punishment to be imposed after the contempt has been adjudicated. Judgment in each case affirmed. All the justices concurring.

SHARP v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—STATEMENT OF ACCUSED—APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. The accused has no legal right to make more than one statement. Whether he should be allowed to make a second statement, because the state has introduced additional evidence, strengthening the case against him, is a matter which is within the discretion of the trial court.

2. Grounds of a motion for a new trial which are not approved by the presiding judge cannot be considered. In the present case, the grounds of the motion which were approved by the judge do not, when taken in connection with his explanatory notes, present any error.

3. The evidence was sufficient to authorize the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Dekalb county; J. S. Candler, Judge.

Hiram Sharp was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

Hooper Alexander and Milner & Brand, for plaintiff in error. W. T. Kimsey, Sol. Gen., and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

SIMMONS, C. J. Upon an indictment for murder, Sharp was tried and convicted. He made a motion for a new trial. This motion contained eighteen grounds. Three of these were general; six of the remaining fifteen were not approved at all by the court; seven were approved with such qualifications and explanations as showed that the rulings complained of were not erroneous; one of the two remaining cannot be considered because it complained of the admission of testimony, without setting forth such testimony, either literally or in substance. Thus, there really remains, aside from the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence, but one ground which it is necessary to consider.

1. The question presented by this ground is whether, after the accused has made his statement, and the state has been allowed to reopen the case, and introduce evidence, partly in rebuttal of the statement of the accused, and partly relating to new and distinct facts, and not in rebuttal of the statement, it is error to refuse to allow the accused to make a supplemental statement, explaining and replying to the new evidence brought out by the state. The judge's certificate would seem to indicate that the judge considered that all the evidence introduced by the state after the accused had made his statement was in rebuttal of that statement, but, after examining the record, we think that new and distinct facts were brought out,—facts which were not in rebuttal of anything stated by the accused. Witnesses were allowed to testify as to the flight of the accused and as to his resistance to arrest. These things were not in any respect in rebuttal of the statement of the accused. The accused was then allowed to introduce evidence, but not to make a second statement. Under the former rulings of this court, it was within the discretion of the trial judge, after the accused had made his statement and put in his evidence, to allow the state to reopen the case, and prove new and independent facts to strengthen its case. Huff v. State, 104 Ga. 521, 30 S. E. 808; Hunley v. State, 104 Ga. 755, 30 S. E. 958. This court has, in several cases, ruled that it is likewise within the discretion of the trial judge to allow the accused to make a second or supplemental statement. In Vaughn v. State, 88 Ga. 732, 16 S. E. 64, the decision was as follows: "The statute gives the prisoner no right to make more than one statement. Whether he should be allowed to supplement it with another is discretionary with the court." In Boston v. State, 94 Ga. 590, 21 S. E. 603, it was held: "It is not matter of right for the accused to make a second statement to the court and jury because the state has introduced additional evidence which strengthens the case against him." In the present case, the judge, in the exercise of the discretion given him, allowed the accused to introduce additional evidence in reply to that introduced by the state, but refused to allow him to make a second statement. While it would have been most proper for the judge to do this, and we would have been better satisfied if he had pursued this course, still it was a matter within his discretion, and we cannot say that it was abused. If this court should ever, in any case, undertake to say that a judge did, in such a matter, abuse his discretion, it would have to be an extreme one. We certainly could not do so when the record does not disclose what the accused proposed to state, if allowed to again go upon the stand, but merely, as in the present instance, that he asked leave to do so, saying that "the statement was desired only for the purpose of replying to new evidence not before the court at the time of the first statement."

2. We, of course, cannot consider the grounds of the motion for new trial which were not approved by the presiding judge. Of the remaining grounds, other than the general ones, one cannot be considered, for the reasons given in the statement of the facts of the case, and another has just been considered. The rest, when taken in connection with the judge's notes, not only present no error, but present no question which it would be profitable to discuss.

3. The evidence was amply sufficient to authorize the verdict of the jury. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

HERNDON v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—SUSPENSION OF TRIAL—SANITY OF ACCUSED—EVIDENCE—REMARKS OF COUNSEL—MURDER—EVIDENCE.

1. It is discretionary with the court to suspend the trial of a criminal case to allow an expert witness, introduced by the accused and then on the stand, to examine an indenture in the skull of the accused, in order to enable him to testify as to its effect upon the accused, as to sanity or insanity.

2. It is not error to allow nonexpert witnesses on the subject of the sanity of the accused to testify that they knew the accused, and had seen nothing in his appearance or conduct to indicate insanity.

3. Improper remarks by the solicitor general, unrebuked by the judge, will not work a reversal of the judgment in this case, as no objection was made, and no ruling of the court invoked.

4. The evidence amply supported the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Wilkes county; S. Reese, Judge.

Dillard Herndon was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. D. Tutt & Son and R. C. Norman, for plaintiff in error. R. H. Lewis, Sol. Gen., Z. D. Hornson, and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

SIMMONS, C. J. Upon an indictment for murder, Herndon was tried and convicted. His motion for a new trial was overruled, and he excepted.

1. One of the grounds relied upon by counsel for the plaintiff in error was that the court refused to allow a medical expert, who had been introduced by the accused, and who was upon the stand testifying as a witness, to examine an indenture or depression in the skull of the accused, and then testify as to the effect it would produce upon his mind; the accused having, in his statement to the jury, stated that the depression had been made in his early youth by a falling stone, that he had subsequently had a severe case of typhoid fever, and that since then he had been at times ignorant or unconscious of what he said and did. We think this was a matter entirely within the discretion of the trial court. The court may or may not suspend a trial for this purpose, according to the circumstances of each particular case. Where a matter of practice is within the discretion of the trial court, this court will not interfere unless such discretion is manifestly abused. We cannot establish any fixed rules to govern courts in this respect. In some cases an examination of an injury might be made in a few minutes. In others, hours might be consumed before the expert could come to any definite conclusion as to the nature and character of the injuries. Then, too, this appears to have been the second trial of the present case, and the accused and his counsel had abundant opportunity to have the examination made before the trial. Had he done so, then the expert could have testified as to his opinion of the effect the injury would have produced upon the mind of the accused. The rule governing the testimony of experts is thus laid down in Lawson, Exp. Ev. (2d Ed.) p. 257, rule 42: "An expert may give an opinion based on a state of facts which he himself has witnessed, or which are detailed by other witnesses, or which are put before him in the form of a hypothetical case." See, also, Tayl. Med. Jur. (Clark Bell's Ed.) p. 53 et seq.

2. The next ground of the motion which was insisted on was that the court allowed certain witnesses to testify, over the objection of the accused, as to his sanity, without giving the facts or reasons upon which their testimony was based. We have carefully read the testimony of these witnesses, and find that each of them stated the length of time he had known the accused, and the frequency with which he met or was thrown with him, and that he had never seen about him anything to indicate unsoundness of mind. The substance of their evidence was that after intercourse with the accused for a number of years, a knowledge of his character, and observation of him at church, in Sunday school, and at the court house, as well as on other occasions, they had in all these years seen nothing in his appearance or conduct to indicate in any way that he was not of sound mind. While it is true that nonexpert witnesses cannot give opinions without stating the facts upon which the opinions are based, we think the facts stated by these witnesses were sufficient to form the basis of the opinions given. There is no other way, as far as we know, in which a nonexpert can form an opinion as to a person's sanity than observation of his acts and doings,—observation of his ordinary and everyday appearance and conduct. One may associate for years with another and see no signs of unsoundness of mind, and, if asked to give his opinion in regard to the matter, could only make just such a statement of facts on which to predicate his opinion as was given in this case,—that he had observed nothing which would seem to indicate insanity. A witness may base his belief that one is insane upon some particular and peculiar conduct, or upon something in the appearance, and may easily state just what it is upon which his opinion is based. Where the belief in one's insanity is a general impression, the facts upon which it is based would be more difficult of statement. Where the witness believes that the person about whom he is testifying is of sound mind, he can then usually testify only in a general and negative manner,—that he has noticed nothing about him to indicate that he is not of sound mind.

It is somewhat analogous to proof of general good character. One may live for years in the neighborhood of another, never hear his character impeached or any remarks or rumors concerning it, and form an opinion that his character is good because he has never heard anything against it. Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9, 29 S. E. 309, and cases cited. The identical question made in this case has, however, been settled by decisions of this court. In Walker v. Walker, 14 Ga. 242, the question was made, and the court decided that the witnesses gave sufficient facts and circumstances upon which to base an opinion as to the sanity of the decedent, following the rule laid down in Potts v. House, 6 Ga. 324. In the case of Taylor v. State, 83 Ga. 647, 10 S. E. 442, it was held, "Knowledge of the defendant for a long time by witnesses, and his always acting like a sane man, were facts upon which they could base opinions as to his sanity." See, also, an elaborate discussion of the subject in Lawson, Exp. Ev. (2d Ed.) p. 532, rule 64, subrule 4.

3. The ruling made in the third headnote is supported by repeated decisions of this court,—among them, the following: Bowens v. State, 106 Ga. 760, 32 S. E. 666, and cases cited; Owens v. State, 34 S. E. 1015; Robinson v. State, 34 S. E. 1017; O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Pruitt, 36 S. E. 59.

4. The evidence amply supported the verdict. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

KILLIAN v. BANKS.

APPEAL—REVIEW—GRANT OF NEW TRIAL.

This was the first grant of a new trial, and, in view of the evidence disclosed by the record, falls within the provision of Civ. Code, § 5585.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action between Elizabeth Killian and Mary A. Banks. From an order granting a new trial, Killian brings error. Affirmed.

MOON v. McRAE.

MALPRACTICE—DAMAGES—PAIN AND SUFFERING.

Under the allegations of the petition and the testimony in the present case, the trial judge was not authorized to conclude that the plaintiff's entire case was placed throughout on the amputation of his limb, caused by the alleged negligent and unskillful treatment by the defendant as plaintiff's physician. As elements of damages claimed by the plaintiff, pain and suffering are sufficiently set forth in the declaration, and there was sufficient evidence to submit to the jury the issue as to whether, by the unskillful treatment of the defendant, the plaintiff sustained damages in consequence of such pain and suffering, notwithstanding such treatment may not have led to the loss of his limb. The court therefore erred in instructing the jury, in effect, that damages could not be recovered for pain and suffering resulting from unskillful treatment by the physician, unless such treatment was the cause of the loss of plaintiff's limb.

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Z. Moon, as next friend of Emmet Moon, against Floyd McRae. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

T. W. Rucker and Arnold & Arnold, for plaintiff in error. Alexander & Lambdin, Rosser & Carter, and J. T. Pendleton, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. On December 13, 1898, Z. Moon, as next friend of his minor son, Emmet Moon, brought suit in the city court of Atlanta against Dr. Floyd W. McRae, substantially alleging the following facts as a cause of action: On November 4, 1891, Emmet Moon bruised his right leg or shin bone, just below the knee, on a wheelbarrow, and after about a week, considerable pain ensuing, the defendant, a practicing physician, then and now of Fulton county, Ga., was called in to treat the wound. When he examined the leg, he was informed by petitioner and his wife and son of the manner in which Emmet was hurt, and was told that, in their judgment, the pain was the result of the blow in falling against the wheelbarrow, which petitioner alleges is the case. Defendant replied that this was not the cause, but that Emmet was suffering from inflammatory rheumatism, and prescribed, as a proper treatment therefor, that the place should be rubbed with a liniment which he furnished, stating this was the treatment needed. The leg commenced to get worse, and defendant continued his visits at very short intervals. He was told by petitioner that the treatment was not doing any good, and that the leg was getting worse. Defendant was again informed that the trouble was not rheumatism, but that it was produced from the effect of the blow; but defendant declared that this was a mistake, and ordered his treatment for rheumatism to be continued. After about the 10th of November there was evidence of the formation of pus under the place where the wound had been received on the leg, and the attention of defendant was called to this from about the time of his second visit, but, notwithstanding, he continued his treatment for rheumatism, and Emmet's pain and suffering became so great that he had to be given opiates. Petitioner continued to tell defendant that he was sure pus had formed in the wound, and that it was present in large quantities. The defendant finally admitted he had made a mistake in his diagnosis of the case, and, at the urgent request of petitioner, lanced the leg below the knee and above the foot, and pus to the amount of a quart or more, much of it in large clots, was taken out of the leg. Defendant then prescribed a wash for the wound, washing it himself, and after a few more visits he told petitioner that his wife could wash the wound as well as he, and that he would call again after a few days. The treatment prescribed by defendant was followed, but Emmet became much worse, not being able to sleep, and suffering intense pain. After several days, defendant called to see Emmet, pronouncing him worse, and ordered a continuance of his prescribed treatment. He then ceased his visits, and petitioner had to call in other physicians, who split the leg open from near the knee to near the foot, and it was found that the periosteum of the bone had been destroyed, and that the bone of the leg had decayed. It was charged that this was the result of defendant allowing the pus to remain in the leg, and, as the result of unskillful treatment and wrongful diagnosis of the case by defendant, the leg had to be amputated. Petitioner further charges that Emmet suffered great pain and anguish in consequence of his leg being unskillfully treated, which made amputation necessary; that his suffering had been severe and protracted,—all to his damage in the sum of $10,000. In answer to this petition, the defendant, in effect, denied all the allegations therein which attempted to charge him with liability on account of his alleged negligent, improper, or unskillful treatment of the patient. Quite a volume of evidence was introduced pro and con, and the jury, after the charge of the court, returned a verdict for the defendant. Plaintiff moved for a new trial on various grounds, and in his bill of exceptions assigns error on the judgment of the court overruling his motion.

In one ground of the motion, error is assigned on the following charge of the court: "It is further contended, gentlemen of the jury, in the case, that although there was a mistake as to the first diagnosis of the disease by the defendant, and treatment kept up as for another disease, up to the time when the treatment was changed, it is contended by the defendant that this did not result in the necessity for the amputation, but the amputation resulted from an entirely different disease, which would have been the result notwithstanding the original mistake that may have been made. Well, gentlemen of the jury, if that is true,—if you believe that Dr. McRae made any mistake in his diagnosis, any mistake as to the treatment, but yet, if you believe it did not cause the amputation,—then the defendant would not be liable; the rule being, as already stated to you, in order to make the defendant liable, it must appear that he failed to exercise a reasonable degree of skill and care, and that such failure resulted in the injury. If the injury resulted from something else, but did not result from such failure, then the defendant would not be liable." One ground of objection to this charge is that it is argumentative, and it eliminated the fact that the plaintiff could have recovered for all the results of the defendant's mistreatment, such as pain and suffering and the like, even though it may not have caused the amputation itself; that if the defendant's negligence caused the plaintiff's leg to become swollen and inflamed, and caused his pain and suffering, then there could have been a recovery, although the amputation itself resulted from some other disease. The court's charge amounts to stating that, if the amputation itself did not result from the defendant's treatment, there could be no recovery, short of the amputation. We think the criticism made on the charge excepted to is entirely correct, and that the charge necessarily excluded from the jury the consideration of any damages growing out of pain and suffering, although the result of defendant's negligence in the treatment, provided this mistreatment did not result in the amputation of the limb. We presume this charge was evidently based upon the idea that in his petition the plaintiff sought a recovery exclusively on account of the treatment resulting in an amputation of the leg. Counsel for defendant in error, in their brief and argument before us, do not absolutely and unequivocally claim that the declaration cannot possibly be construed as declaring for pain and suffering, yet they do contend that it is exceedingly doubtful whether it does, and that the record indicates that the entire case was placed throughout on the amputation,—loss of the leg,—and that nowhere in the pleadings and evidence were pain and suffering mentioned, except as mere inducement. While the petition is not as full and explicit on the point of pain and suffering as it perhaps should have been, yet there was no demurrer filed to it. It expressly sets forth the extent of the patient's pain and suffering, much of which, from the charges in the declaration, was clearly attributable to an improper diagnosis of the case by the physician, and to his delay in administering the proper treatment until pus had so accumulated in the diseased leg as to unnecessarily add to his pain and suffering. The damages claimed in the declaration were not only for the loss of the leg by amputation, but also for pain and suffering occasioned by the alleged mistreatment. There was much uncontradicted evidence admitted upon this subject, showing to what extent the accumulated pus in the leg had caused injury and suffering, from which no relief whatever was experienced until it had been removed therefrom. Some evidence was also introduced in behalf of the plaintiff, which does not seem to be denied by the defendant, that an earnest effort was made to persuade the latter to operate so as to remove pus from the leg, because of its swelling and pain, days before he acted upon the suggestion; and there is also testimony to the effect that after operating, and finding such a quantity of pus discharged therefrom, he admitted making a great mistake in his diagnosis of the case, and that, if he had operated on the leg sooner, he would have saved the patient much pain and suffering.

The evidence in this case is quite voluminous. It would serve no useful purpose to enter into minute detail of the volume of testimony that was introduced on each side of the issues of fact on trial. We only make brief allusion to the above facts appearing in the testimony with the view of showing that pain and suffering was evidently an important element in the damages claimed by the plaintiff, and that the testimony did not demand a finding by the jury that no part of such pain was caused by the unskillful or negligent treatment by the defendant. It was fair, therefore, to the plaintiff's cause, that the court should have presented this theory to the jury for their consideration, that they might determine the issues of fact upon this particular branch of the case. For this reason, we think the charge of the court complained of requires the grant of a new trial.

There are various other grounds in the motion for a new trial, complaining principally of certain charges of the court, some of which are alleged to be argumentative, and some because they present only defendant's side of the case; and the theory of defendant was by certain charges repeated too often, and was presented more prominently than the contentions of the plaintiff. After carefully reading over all of these grounds, and comparing them with the entire charge of the court, which is embodied in the record, we see nothing in them which would necessitate a new trial or justify a discussion. In so far as the requests to charge were pertinent, the principles therein embodied were covered by the general charge of the court. We think, in the main, the charge fully and fairly covered the case. We, of course, do not mean to intimate upon what side even apparently rests a preponderance of the evidence. In this connection we will only say that we have carefully read, at a consumption of much time and thought, this voluminous record of evidence, and we cannot say that it necessarily demanded the verdict that was found. The charge above quoted and excepted to in the motion for a new trial is on such a material issue that, in view of the testimony, it requires the grant of a new trial, and on this ground alone is the judgment of the lower court reversed. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring, except COBB, J., disqualified.

REESE v. FIDELITY MUT. LIFE ASS'N.

LIFE INSURANCE—DEFAULT IN FIRST PREMIUM—NOTE—DELIVERY.

1. Where the application for a policy of life insurance and the policy itself both stipulated, in effect, that the policy should not become binding on the association issuing it until the first premium had been actually received by the association or its authorized agent during the good health of the applicant, and that no agent of the association should have power to make, alter, or discharge contracts or grant credit, and that no alteration of the terms of the contract should be valid unless such alteration should be in writing and be signed by the president of the association, held, that the actual payment of the first premium during the good health of the applicant was a condition precedent to the liability of the association, and that no agent of the association could waive such condition.

2. Delivery is essential to the validity of a promissory note.

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by Lucy L. Reese against the Fidelity Mutual Life Association. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Mrs. Lucy L. Reese sued the Fidelity Mutual Life Association to recover the amount of a policy issued by the defendant company upon the life of her husband, T. B. Reese. Upon the trial the evidence submitted in behalf of the plaintiff was, in brief, as follows: T. B. Reese applied to the defendant company for a policy of insurance on his life for $2,000 in favor of his wife, Lucy L. Reese. The written application which was signed by him contained the following stipulations: "I hereby agree and bind myself as follows: * * * That the policy issued hereon shall not become binding on the association until the first payment due thereon has been actually received by the association or its authorized agents during my lifetime and good health; that no verbal statements, to whomsoever made, shall modify this contract, or in any manner affect the rights of the association, unless the same be reduced to writing, and be presented and approved by the officers of the association at the home office, in Philadelphia, no agent or examiner having any power or authority to make or alter contracts, waive forfeitures, or grant credit. * * * This application shall be the sole basis of the contract with the association if a policy be issued hereon." On September 8, 1894, the association issued a policy, as applied for, containing stipulations similar to those set out in the application, and in terms making the application a part of the policy, a copy of the application being attached thereto. The policy was sent to W. M. Reese, a soliciting agent of the association and a brother of T. B. Reese, at Thomasville, Ga., who received it about the 13th day of the same month. T. B. Reese was then living at New Holland Springs, Ga. On the 15th of the same month, W. M. Reese, in pursuance of an agreement with S. A. Loyless, state agent of the association, executed his promissory note for the amount of the first premium due on the policy, payable to Loyless or order, and on the same date signed a receipt to T. B. Reese for the premium.

This note was never delivered to Loyless, nor was he ever notified of its execution, so far as the evidence shows, but it was retained by W. M. Reese, who intended forwarding it soon, with some other papers, to Loyless. W. M. Reese kept the receipt and the insurance policy for his brother. It appeared that T. B. Reese was in good health until the 16th or 17th of September, when he was taken sick and continued ill until his death, which occurred on the night of the 26th of September. On the 25th of September, J. A. Linton, the father-in-law of T. B. Reese, received a telegram from his daughter, Mrs. Reese, announcing the illness of her husband and requesting him to come to New Holland Springs. Linton showed this telegram to W. M. Reese, who thereupon told him about T. B. Reese's insurance policy. Linton then paid to W. M. Reese the amount of the first premium, and W. M. Reese destroyed the note which he had executed to Loyless, and which he had held up to that time. Linton took the policy and receipt, and had them in his possession at the time of the death of T. B. Reese. Some weeks after the death of T. B. Reese, Charles G. Beck, state agent of the defendant association, made a demand upon the plaintiff for the insurance policy, giving as a reason for demanding the policy that the company would never pay it, and tendered her the premium that had been paid. Upon this evidence the court granted a nonsuit, and the plaintiff excepted.

King & Spalding and J. T. Pendleton, for plaintiff in error. Hamilton Douglas, D. S. Craig, and J. E. Bond, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. In the written application which was signed by the applicant, he expressly agreed that it should be the sole basis of the contract with the insurance association, if a policy should be issued thereon, and that the policy should not become binding on the association until the first payment due upon it had been actually received by the association or its authorized agent during the good health of the applicant. The policy likewise contained the stipulation that it should not be binding until delivered during the good health of the applicant, and until the first payment due thereon had been made, and recited that the application, a copy of which was attached, was made part thereof. It is clear from these explicit and unambiguous terms of the contract between the applicant and the association that the latter merely entered into an executory agreement, the performance of which absolutely depended upon the contingency that the first premium on the policy should be actually paid during the applicant's good health. This prerequisite had to be complied with before the policy could become effectual. In Ormond v. Association, 96 N. C. 158, 1 S. E. 796, it was decided that, "where an application for a life insurance policy declares on its face that the payment of the premium is a condition precedent to the issuing of the policy, the policy is not in force until the premium is actually paid." And in Oliver v. Insurance Co. (Va.) 33 S. E. 536, the court held that "an applicant's express agreement in his written application that the policy should not take effect until the first premium was paid, and the policy delivered during his continuance in good health, created a condition precedent to the company's liability." The contract, as expressed in the application and the policy, established the respective rights and obligations of the parties; and this court has no power to alter its provisions, and to declare a liability under a state of facts which the parties never agreed should fix it. As was said by Mr. Justice Little in Lippman v. Insurance Co., 108 Ga. 391, 33 S. E. 897, "A contract of insurance is governed by the same rules of interpretation as extend to other contracts, and, when parties incorporate terms or stipulations in their contracts, it is not the province of the court to extend or enlarge them, but, in construing them, to give expression to the true intent of the parties, and in so doing the language used is the best criterion of intention."

The controlling question in this case is, did the applicant comply with the essential condition upon which the association's liability depended; in other words, was the first premium actually paid during his good health? Counsel for plaintiff in error contended here, in argument and by brief, that "the execution by W. M. Reese of his note to the defendant's agent, Loyless, in pursuance of his previous agreement with the company through Loyless, was a good payment of the premium." The applicant, it appears, was in good health at the date of this note, and, if it amounted to a payment of the first premium, then the policy became binding on the association. Even if Loyless, whose powers to bind the association were not otherwise indicated than by being denominated its "state agent," had been vested with authority to alter the terms of the contract, so as to accept the note of W. M. Reese, the soliciting agent, in lieu of cash, for the first premium, we do not think the note claimed to have been executed in this case would have constituted a payment. The proof was to the effect that the note was filled out and signed by W. M. Reese on September 15th; that he kept it in his possession for about 10 days, intending to forward it to Loyless with some other premiums; that it was never sent, nor was Loyless ever notified of the fact that the note had been signed. W. M. Reese testified that he destroyed the note upon its payment by Linton, the applicant's father-in-law, the day before the applicant died. In our opinion, these facts did not constitute a delivery of the note, and it was therefore never duly executed and was a nullity. A delivery, actual or constructive, was as essential as the maker's signature. "No contract arises upon a bill of exchange or promissory note until the delivery of the instrument, and until such delivery it remains revocable and unenforceable. Thus, a promissory note has no inception until it has been delivered by the maker to the payee." 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 201. "While actual or manual delivery is not indispensable to the validity of a note, still it must appear that the maker in some way exercised an intention to make it an enforceable obligation against himself according to its terms, by surrendering control over it, and intentionally placing it under the control of the payee, or of some third person for his use." Purviance v. Jones, 120 Ind. 162, 21 N. E. 1099. See 1 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 63 et seq.; Pars. Notes & B. § 49; Tied. Com. Paper, § 84. The payment of the sum of money by Linton to W. M. Reese could not be in satisfaction of the note which the latter claimed to have made to Loyless, for the reason that such note, for want of delivery, never became operative. It seems to have been an anomalous transaction for Reese to have written out and signed a note payable to Loyless, to have kept it in his possession without notice to Loyless that it had been made, and for Linton to have paid Reese the amount of Reese's own note, and such a payment to have been designated as a satisfaction of the note.

Another contention of the plaintiff in error was that the agents of the association, Loyless and Reese, waived the condition of payment of the first premium by becoming responsible therefor to the association. Mechanics' & Traders' Ins. Co. v. Mutual Real-Estate & Building Ass'n, 98 Ga. 262, 25 S. E. 457, and Insurance Co. v. Pekor, 106 Ga. 1, 31 S. E. 779, were cited in support of this contention. In both of those cases it appears that the agents who dealt with the assured were general agents, who had authority to issue and deliver policies and renewals thereof, and that, according to the course of dealing between them and their customers, it was usual for them to issue renewals and charge the premiums to themselves, and afterwards to account with the companies they represented. The rulings made in those cases were therefore based upon the implied assent of the insurance companies for such general agents to waive the payment of the premiums in cash for the renewal policies. There was no pretense in either of those cases that the authority to make the waiver had been expressly withheld from the agent, as was done, both in the application and in the policy, in the case at bar. Here there was no evidence of any custom or course of dealing upon the part of Loyless and W. M. Reese which could warrant an inference that the association impliedly assented that they might become responsible to it for the first premium, in order that credit might be extended to the applicant. Under the express terms of the agreement in this case, the agents had no authority to make such a waiver. The policy declared that "no agent of the association has any power or authority to make, alter, or discharge contracts, waive forfeitures, or grant credit; and no alteration of the terms of this contract shall be valid, and no forfeiture hereunder shall be waived, unless such alteration or waiver be in writing, and be signed by the president of the association"; and the application contained substantially the same provisions. More distinct and unequivocal language could hardly have been used to express the mutual understanding of the parties to the contract. The applicant was an intelligent business man; he signed the application; and in the absence of any want of opportunity to read it, or of any suggestion of fraud practiced upon him, it must be conclusively presumed that he fully understood the entire transaction. Furthermore, his brother, W. M. Reese, the soliciting agent, who was acting for him in endeavoring to arrange the payment of the first premium, certainly knew the contents of the application which he took, and of the policy he had in his possession, and was fully aware that neither he nor Loyless had authority to grant credit for the first premium, or in any way to alter the terms of the contract agreed upon between the applicant and the association. It is a familiar rule that a principal may limit the power of his agent, even within the apparent scope of his authority, so that the agent cannot, in violation of the restriction, bind his principal when dealing with one who has notice of the limitation. Here the applicant expressly agreed in writing that no agent of the association should have authority to grant credit, and no alteration of the terms of the contract of insurance should be valid unless in writing and signed by the president of the association, and there was no pretense that the president ever signed such a writing. If, in violation of these specific provisions of the contract, it were held that the agent of the association could vary its terms and grant credit for the first premium, instead of requiring its payment in cash, then must we subscribe to the rule, which seems to be supported by some adjudicated cases, that an insurance agent, unlike all other agents, may bind his principal, though acting contrary to express instructions, and dealing with one who has full knowledge of the limitations of his authority. The soundness of such a doctrine does not commend itself to our minds. "It must not be thought that the established rules of the law of agency do not apply to the transactions of life insurance companies. There is no particular sanctity about the business of life or any other kind of insurance. The companies engaged in it have the right to employ agents and give to them such authority as they please. Whatever limitations are imposed upon such agents, if communicated to those dealing with them, will be binding, and if this authority be exceeded the act will not bind the principal. On the other hand, if the agents are held out to the public as possessing certain powers, their acts within the apparent scope of this authority will bind their principals. While the business of life insurance has its recognized peculiarities, the courts have constantly endeavored to apply to all the transactions of fire and life insurance organizations, or mutual benefit societies engaged in doing a life insurance business, the general doctrines of the law of agency. The inquiry is, what was the contract entered into by the parties? If made through an agent, what was the authority of the agent, and had the party dealing with him any notice of limitations or restrictions upon such authority, or were there sufficient circumstances to put him on his guard and to require him to acquaint himself with this actual authority?" Bac. Ben. Soc. § 151. See, also, §§ 152–155, 158. In Conway v. Insurance Co., 140 N. Y. 79, 35 N. E. 420, the court held: "No different rules apply to contracts of insurance from those which obtain in the case of other contracts, and, where the parties have deliberately and formally executed a contract for the purpose of defining their respective engagements and securing due and exact performance thereof, they should be held to the same; and the only cases in which recoveries have been permitted contrary to the provisions of the contract are where it has been shown that there has been such a usage or course of business, or such consent, express or implied, as to justify the inference that the insurer had extended its agent's authority, and thus modified the restrictions contained in the policy." In 1 Joyce, Ins. § 433, the author says: "It is undoubtedly within the power of the parties to stipulate that an agent's authority shall be exercised only within certain limits. It is equally true that an insurance company may validly, as between itself and its agent, define and limit his powers, and this will affect all third persons, dealing with an agent, who have knowledge or notice thereof." In Woods, Ins. § 411, it is said: "In all cases where the assured has notice of any limitation upon the agent's power, or where there is anything about the transaction to put him on inquiry as to the actual authority of the agent, acts done by him in excess of his authority are not binding; as where it is generally known that limitations are imposed in certain respects. So, where direct notice, or any notice which a prudent man is bound to regard, is brought home to the assured, limiting the powers of the agent, he relies upon any act in excess of such limited authority at his peril. That an insurance company has a right, in a fair way, to limit the powers of its agent, must be conceded; and when it does impose such limitations upon his authority, in such a way that no prudent man might be mistaken in reference thereto, it is not bound by an act done by its agent in contravention of such notice." Id. §§ 414, 416, 417. In this connection, see 1 May, Ins. § 137; Cooke, Life Ins. §§ 894, 1062, 1081; Ostr. Ins. p. 36; and the numerous cases cited in support of the text by these various authors. See, also, Fowler v. Insurance Co., 100 Ga. 330, 28 S. E. 398; Morris v. Insurance Co., 106 Ga. 461, 32 S. E. 595; Insurance Co. v. Rogers, 108 Ga. 191, 33 S. E. 954; and the recent case of Murphy v. Insurance Co. (La.) 27 South. 143. In Insurance Co. v. Fletcher, 117 U. S. 519, 6 Sup. Ct. 837, 29 L. Ed. 934, Mr. Justice Field, in the course of his opinion, made use of the following expressions: "The company, like any other principal, could limit the authority of its agents, and thus bind all parties dealing with them with knowledge of the limitation. It must be presumed that he read the application, and was cognizant of the limitations therein expressed." "The present case is very different from Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. 222, 20 L. Ed. 617, and from Insurance Co. v. Mahone, 21 Wall. 152, 22 L. Ed. 593. In neither of those cases was any limitation upon the power of the agent brought to the notice of the assured." "Here the power of the agent was limited, and notice of such limitation given by being embodied in the application, which the assured was required to make and sign, and which, as we have stated, he must be presumed to have read. He is therefore bound by its statements."

Counsel for plaintiff in error also insisted that, as to the delivery of the policy, W. M. Reese was the general agent of the association, and that his acceptance of the premium from, and delivery of the policy to, Linton, for the benefit of the plaintiff, with full knowledge of the applicant's illness, bound the association. If correct in what we have already said, then this contention cannot be sound. So far as the evidence discloses, W. M. Reese was not the general agent of the association; but, even if he had been, he could not, in the very teeth of the express limitations upon his power as agreed to by the applicant, have bound the association by delivering the policy in violation of the contract. The mere fact that the agent knew at the time he received the premium from Linton,—who, by the way, was an entire stranger to the contract between the applicant and the association,—and delivered the policy to him, that the terms of the contract were being violated, could not affect the liability of the association.

Applying the law, as we conceive it to be, to the evidence submitted by the plaintiff upon the trial, we conclude that she was not entitled to a recovery, and therefore the court did not err in granting a nonsuit. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

WAYCROSS AIR-LINE R. CO. v. SOUTHERN PINE CO. OF GEORGIA et al.

RAILROADS — RIGHT OF WAY — CONTRACTS — CONSTRUCTION — TRESPASS — INJUNCTION — PHYSICAL ACTS—STATUTES—PRIVATE RAILROAD—CONSTRUCTION RIGHT.

1. Where a lumber company, by a written contract, granted to a railroad company a right of way over all the lands which the grantor then owned, or might thereafter own, through which the railroad of the grantee then ran, or over which it might thereafter run, "to and from any and all points authorized by the [then existing] charter" of the railroad company, the meaning of the contract was that the railroad company should have a right of way for its railroad, over the lands of the grantor, to and from any of the termini of the railroad designated or indicated in the charter of the railroad company. Under such a contract, the railroad company did not acquire a right of way through the lands of the lumber company for a temporary spur track, for private use only, from its main line to a point some three or four miles distant therefrom, which was not named or indicated in the charter as one of the points to which it was authorized to build its road. (a) Consequently, when the railroad company undertook, solely under the right which it acquired by this contract, to construct such a spur track upon and across the lands of the lumber company, and the latter forcibly prevented it from doing so, it was not erroneous, upon petition by the railroad company for an injunction, for the court to refuse to enjoin the lumber company from further interfering with the construction of such track upon its lands. Nor was it erroneous, upon the cross application of the lumber company, to enjoin the railroad company from constructing this track upon the lands in question.

2. When, in acting upon an equitable petition for injunction, the court grants to one of the parties the right to exercise a specific privilege on stated conditions, such party, by accepting the grant, becomes bound by the conditions, and the court may subsequently enforce compliance therewith, and in so doing does not, though ordering the party to do physical acts, violate the rule against granting mandatory injunctions.

3. The general railroad law of this state, which provides that "the general direction and location" of a new railroad, constructed by one railroad company, "shall be at least ten miles from [a] railroad already constructed" by another railroad company, except at points "within ten miles of either terminus" (Civ. Code, § 2176), does not prevent a purely private corporation from constructing, and itself operating, for its own exclusive use, upon its own land, a tramroad, for the purpose of hauling lumber, etc., from its sawmill, located upon one railroad, to another and competing railroad, for shipment over the latter road, although such tramroad may run parallel to and in close proximity to the first-mentioned railroad.

Error from superior court, Coffee county; Joseph W. Bennett, Judge.

Suit by the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company against the Southern Pine Company of Georgia and others to restrain defendants from interfering with complainant's construction of a railroad over defendant's lands. From an order denying the injunction, and granting a cross injunction against the construction of the road, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. L. Sweat, for plaintiff in error. W. E. Kay and John C. McDonald, for defendants in error.

FISH, J. 1. The Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company undertook to build a spur track, extending from its main line to a point three or four miles distant therefrom, upon and across the land of the Southern Pine Company of Georgia, without consulting the latter, and without resorting to condemnation proceedings to procure a right of way for such track. We by no means intend to intimate that the railroad company could have procured a right of way for the spur track which it was seeking to construct, by exercising the state's power of eminent domain, but are merely stating the facts, which show that its claim was not based upon an alleged right to take this private property for public use, under the forms and by due process of law. It based its claim to a right of way for this track over the lands of the pine company entirely upon a written contract with the latter company. Therefore, so far as this case is concerned, if the railroad company's claim is not supported by the contract upon which it relies, the court below committed no error in refusing to enjoin the pine company from preventing or interfering with the construction of the spur track upon its land, nor in enjoining the railroad company, until the further order of the court, from constructing the track upon this land. The contract upon which the railroad company relies was executed by the parties on the 5th of August, 1895, and in it the Southern Pine Company of Georgia, which is otherwise designated therein as the "party of the first part," grants to the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company, otherwise designated as the "party of the second part," a right of way, not less than 150 feet wide, "over all lands the said party of the first part now owns, or which it may hereafter own or become entitled to, through which the railroad of the said party of the second part now runs, or over which it may hereafter be run, to and from all points authorized by the present charter of the party of the second part." There is nothing in the original charter of the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company, nor in either of the amendments thereto, which expressly authorizes it to build its railroad, or any branch thereof, to the proposed terminus of this spur track. Its original charter authorized it to build a railroad "from Waycross, in the county of Ware, to the city of Macon or Hawkinsville, in Pulaski county, or to some point on the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railroad in the counties of Appling, Telfair or Dodge, and thence to Dublin in Laurens county, and from Waycross to the Florida line, at some point on the St. Mary's river, with the right of extending the same to the port of St. Mary's, Georgia." Acts 1887, p. 227. By an amendment to its charter, in 1889, it was authorized to build a railroad "from Waycross, through the counties of Ware, Appling, Coffee, Irwin and Wilcox, to Cordele, Dooly county." Acts 1889, p. 247. Another amendment, in 1891, authorized "an extension of said road from some point on the line thereof as now surveyed and located in the counties of Coffee or Irwin, through the counties of Wilcox and Dooly, to Fort Valley, in Houston county, and also an extension or branch from its line between Waycross and St. Mary's to Brunswick or South Brunswick, in Glynn county." Acts 1890–91, p. 416. As we have seen, under the contract with the Southern Pine Company of Georgia, the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company was granted a right of way through all the lands of the former company over which the railroad company's railroad then run or might thereafter be run, "to and from all points authorized by the [then existing] charter" of the railroad company. The "points" to and from which the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company, by its charter, was then authorized to run its railroad, are those designated or indicated in the acts of the legislature from which we have quoted; that is, they are the termini mentioned or indicated in its charter, to and from which it was authorized to construct and operate its main line, or main lines, or the extensions or branches thereof. The meaning of this contract, therefore, was that the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company should have a right of way for its railroad, over the lands of the Southern Pine Company of Georgia, to and from any of the termini of the railroad designated or indicated in the charter; not that the railroad company should have a right of way through the lands of the grantor to reach any point indicated in the charter, and also the right to build, over the land of the grantor, spur tracks extending from its main line in any direction that it might see fit. "The railroad of the said party of the second part," which was contemplated and intended by this contract, was its main line, or main lines, and the extensions or branches thereof authorized by the charter, built or to be built, to the points designated in its charter, for the public convenience and benefit. The spur track which the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company was engaged in constructing when this controversy arose, by its own showing, was not for the purpose of reaching any point named or indicated in its charter, and was to be neither a part of, nor even an essential appendage to, its railroad, but was to be purely temporary in duration and for private use only. The plaintiff alleged in its petition that it was to be built "for the purpose of facilitating the transportation of the freights of Lott & Hatfield, engaged in the sawmill business, and McLean & Perkins and J. F. Cook, engaged in the naval-stores business, at or near" the point it was intended to reach; and the superintendent of the plaintiff's railroad testified that the purpose in constructing this spur track was "to facilitate the handling of the lumber and naval stores of" these parties "at said point, at the prevailing rate from Nicholls, to meet the emergency and necessity therefor, the same to be used only temporarily for said purpose, and not to be operated, either temporarily or permanently, as a branch railroad; the freight and passenger trains of plaintiff not to be run thereon, but only cars of lumber and naval stores of said parties to be transferred thereon to plaintiff's depot at Nicholls on its said main line." While, in a purely mechanical and material sense, this spur track was a railroad, it was not the railroad of the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company for which the Southern Pine Company of Georgia granted a right of way through its lands. One who, in general terms, grants to a railroad company, chartered for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad for public use, a right of way for its railroad over the lands of the grantor, does not thereby grant a right of way for any and every temporary and private spur track or branch road which the railroad company may see fit to construct from its railroad across such lands. The parties in such a case are presumed to have contracted with reference to the kind of a railroad which the railroad company was chartered to build and operate; that is, a railroad for public convenience and benefit, upon which freight and passenger trains are to be operated. The court did not err in refusing the injunction prayed for by the Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company, nor in enjoining it, until the further order of the court, from constructing this spur track upon the lands of the Southern Pine Company of Georgia.

2. The Waycross Air-Line Railroad Company began to build this spur track upon and across the lands of the Southern Pine Company of Georgia without the consent of the latter, and without authority of law. While this work was in progress, the latter company assembled a force of its employés, tore up the track which had been constructed upon its land, except a portion thereof upon which stood an engine and cars of the railroad company, which had been used in the work of construction, and prevented the railroad company from further prosecuting the work. The destruction of the track left the engine and cars cut off from the main line of the railroad company. When the railroad company's petition for injunction was presented to the judge, he granted a temporary restraining order against the pine company, and restrained the railroad company, until the further order of the court, from constructing, or attempting to construct, the spur track, but in the same order granted the railroad company permission to temporarily relay the track which had been torn up, for the sole purpose of removing its engine and cars to its main line, upon the express condition that the railroad company, if thereafter so directed by the court, would take up and remove the spur track entirely from the land of the pine company. The railroad company relaid the track for the purpose indicated. Upon the subsequent interlocutory hearing, the court, after refusing the injunction prayed for by the railroad company, and enjoining it from constructing the spur track, ordered it to take up and remove all the track which had been laid on the land of the pine company. One of the assignments of error is that the court had no power to order the railroad company to take up and remove this track. While, as a general rule, a court cannot, by injunction, compel the performance of an act, we think, under the circumstances of this case, the court had the power to compel the railroad company to take up and remove the track from the land of the pine company. When the railroad company, in order to recover its engine and cars, availed itself of the permission granted it by the court to relay the track for this purpose, it elected to accept and abide by the condition upon which the right to do this was granted, and could not thereafter be heard to complain if the court compelled it to take up and remove all the track which it had laid on the land of the pine company. It could not exercise the right conferred upon it by the order of the court, without submitting to the terms imposed upon it by that order. Submission to these terms was a condition precedent to the exercise of the right. It is too late, after exercising the right conferred upon it by the order, to question the terms under which it was exercised, or the power of the court to enforce them.

8. The charge that the Southern Pine Company of Georgia and the Offerman & Western Railroad Company had combined and confederated for the purpose of, and were "actually engaged in, paralleling the plaintiff's main line of railroad, by constructing a road from the mill (of the pine company) at Marie to said town of Nicholls, there to connect with the Nicholls mill (of the pine company) and the said Offerman & Western Railroad," was not sustained by the evidence. The evidence did show that the pine company, for the purpose of connecting its mill at Marie with the Offerman & Western Railroad at Nicholls, was constructing, through and upon its own land, a tramroad from Marie to Nicholls, and that this tramroad would run parallel to and very close to the plaintiff's railroad between these points. But the evidence did not show that the Offerman & Western Railroad Company had anything to do with the construction of this tramroad, or that such tramroad was to be controlled and operated by this railroad company. It is true that the plaintiff, by an amendment to its petition, did allege, and the allegation was not denied, that the stockholders in the Offerman & Western Railroad Company and the stockholders in the Southern Pine Company of Georgia were "largely the same, with certain of their officers the same, * * * both being practically under one control and management." But this did not keep the pine company from being a purely private corporation, separate and distinct from the Offerman & Western Railroad Company, nor make the tramroad which it was building, for its own exclusive use, a part of the railroad of such company. The general railroad law of this state, which provides that "the general direction and location" of a new railroad constructed by one railroad company "shall be at least ten miles from [a] railroad already constructed" by another railroad company, except at points "within ten miles of either terminus" (Civ. Code, § 2176), does not prevent a purely private corporation from constructing, and itself operating, for its own exclusive use, entirely upon its own land, a tramroad, for the purpose of hauling its own products from its mill, located upon one railroad, to another and competing railroad, for shipment over the latter road, although such tramroad may run parallel to and in close proximity to the first-mentioned railroad. The public policy indicated by this section of the Civil Code applies to railroad companies chartered by the state to act as common carriers. It puts no restrictions upon private individuals, or purely private corporations, who may seek to construct and operate, upon their own premises, tramroads, or railroads, for their own exclusive use and benefit. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CRITTENDEN v. SOUTHERN HOME BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N.

CORPORATIONS — BY-LAWS — AMENDMENT — ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER—PETITION —DEMURRER—APPEAL.

1. A business corporation may make amendments to its by-laws which are not inconsistent with its charter or constitution. Consequently an allegation in a petition that the defendant, a corporation, made specified amendments to its by-laws, does not negative its authority so to do, when there is no allegation that these amendments were contrary to the defendant's charter or constitution.

2. Where given amendments to the by-laws of such a corporation were, under its charter and constitution, allowable, they were not, as to a particular stockholder, fraudulent or void merely because made without his knowledge, or because he "has never ratified, acquiesced in, or consented to, the same."

3. A stockholder who brings an action against a corporation, and in his petition alleges that certain amendments to its by-laws were in violation of his contract with the defendant, must set out the contract with sufficient fullness to enable the court to determine whether or not his allegation is well founded.

4. When the petition in such a case alleges that the plaintiff is entitled under the by-laws to recover a designated amount as the withdrawal value of his stock, it is incumbent upon him to show, by the terms of his contract, that his rights to recover such withdrawal value accrued under the contract in connection with the by-laws; and, to do this, it is essential that the terms of the contract be set forth.

5. When a demurrer to a petition is based on several grounds, and the court in terms sustains some of them, and thereupon dismisses the petition, the judgment will be affirmed, whether these grounds were well taken or not, if the other grounds of the demurrer were good.

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Action by O. H. Crittenden against the Southern Home Building & Loan Association. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer in part, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Malcolm Johnson, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Wimbish and Ligon Johnson, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, J. O. H. Crittenden brought suit in the city court of Atlanta against the Southern Home Building & Loan Association, alleging defendant's indebtedness to him to be the sum of $1,005, principal, besides interest, for money had and received to his use. The following were substantially the allegations in the petition: On December 17, 1889, he subscribed for 10 shares of the capital stock in said corporation, and paid as a membership fee thereon $10, and as dues on said shares $678, in monthly installments of $6 each, covering a period of 113 months, to wit, from January, 1890, to May, 1899, both inclusive. On September 1, 1890, he subscribed to 5 other shares of the capital stock of said corporation, and paid as a membership fee thereon $5, and as dues on said 5 shares $312, in monthly installments of $3 each, covering a period of 104 months, to wit, from October, 1890, to May, 1899, both inclusive, making an aggregate amount of $1,005. When petitioner subscribed for the stock and made payments on the same, defendant accepted the subscriptions and payments under contract that it was a true building and loan association, on the ordinary plan, upon which petitioner relied, and knew nothing to the contrary until since the last payment made by him in May, 1899, since which time he has made no other payments. He avers that defendant is not a building and loan association: First, because it requires members to pay on loans a fixed or arbitrary premium, and not a premium which is the result of free and open competition among the members, or of any competition at all; second, because there is a material want of mutuality among the members in the benefits and burdens of the association, in that loans are not made to members tendering sufficient and proper security, as the result of free and fair competition, but arbitrarily, by the board of directors; third, in addition to the regular interest charge of 6 per cent. per annum on loans, some members are required to pay a fixed or arbitrary premium of 6 per cent. per annum, while others are required to pay a fixed or arbitrary premium of 4 per cent. per annum only; fourth, on or about December —, 1897, defendant materially changed several of its most important by-laws, which materially violates its contracts with petitioner and a large majority of its members, and changes the relation of its members to each other. The petition then goes on to briefly mention the changes made in the by-laws, to the effect, for instance, of abolishing the expense fund, repealing the by-law with reference to time for withdrawal of stock by members, etc. It was alleged that these changes violated defendant's contract with petitioner to his great injury, and his prayer was to recover back the money he had paid into the association. There is a second count in the petition, for a further cause of action, in which plaintiff claims the sum of $1,341.65, besides interest, for the withdrawal value of his stock. It is alleged that the by-laws of defendant provided that stock might be withdrawn upon giving 60 days' notice to the association by the stockholder of his intention to withdraw, and that when withdrawn after seven years, and before maturity, the holder shall receive the actual book value of same, as shown by the last statement of the division of profits. More than 60 days before the filing of this suit, petitioner filed an application to withdraw his stock, the actual book value thereof on that date being $1,341.65. He claims to have perfected his right of withdrawal, and complied with all requirements of defendant in the premises, but defendant fails and refuses to pay him the withdrawal value of his stock. He therefore seeks a recovery, also, of $1,341.65. To this petition a demurrer was filed upon the following grounds: (1) Petitioner fails to set forth in sufficient form and detail the alleged contract between him and defendant. (2) Petitioner avers that the contract between him and defendant is in writing, and fails to state in sufficient detail the nature of the contract and the terms thereof. (3) Petition fails to show any good and sufficient reason why plaintiff, being a stockholder, is entitled to a judgment. (4) Petition fails to show that there are any funds available for payment of withdrawals. (5) Petition fails to show that the withdrawal claim of the plaintiff had ever been reached. (6) Petition fails to show that plaintiff paid his dues, so as to entitle him to withdrawal. (7) Paragraph 4 of petition is argumentative, and conclusions of law, and indefinite and vague, and should be stricken; that it contains immaterial matter. Paragraph 6 of the petition is demurred to on the same ground. After argument by counsel, the judge rendered his judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the case, under the following order: "Ordered, that this demurrer be sustained on the third ground thereof, and the first count of the declaration is stricken, as setting forth no cause of action in favor of the plaintiff. As to the second count, the demurrer is sustained, on the fourth, fifth, and sixth grounds thereof, with leave to the plaintiff to amend; and, plaintiff declining to amend under this leave, the second count of the declaration is stricken, and the case is dismissed." Upon this judgment, error is assigned in the bill of exceptions.

1. After a careful reading of the allegations in this petition on the first count, we fail to see that any cause of action is set forth against the defendant company. There is no allegation in the petition that the dues, premiums, etc., paid by plaintiff were not paid properly, and entirely in accord with his obligations under the contract he made with the association. He claims that the association has no right to require members to pay on loans a fixed premium. We know of nothing under the laws of Georgia that prohibits such charge. Under section 8 of the act approved October 19, 1891 (Acts 1890–91, vol. 1, p. 181), it is declared "that no fines, interest or premiums paid on loans in any building and loan association shall be deemed usurious, and the same may be collected as debts of like amount are now collected by law in this state and according to the terms and stipulations of the agreement between the association and the borrower." There is no allegation in the petition that the charge of a fixed premium is in violation of the contract made by plaintiff with the defendant. In 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 1070, it is declared, "Where, however, the statutes make no provision for awarding the loan by competitive bidding, a loan made without bidding is valid." See, also, Investment Co. v. Bachelor, 54 N. J. Eq. 600, 607, 35 Atl. 745. These views also cover the second assignment, as to why the corporation is not a building and loan association. As to the allegation that some of the stockholders are charged a fixed premium of 6 per cent. per annum, while others were required to pay only 4 per cent. per annum, it does not appear that they belonged to the same class of stockholders, nor that such charges are contrary to the charter and constitution of the association. It does not necessarily follow that there is a want of mutuality in this regulation. Mutuality does not imply perfect equality. In building and loan associations, it means that each member shall share alike the profits and losses with all other members of his class. There is nothing in the allegation that the loans were made arbitrarily by the directors. Necessarily, the management of all corporations is intrusted to its directors and officers. No fraud or misconduct is charged against the officers of this association, and by their system of loaning money no injury is alleged to the plaintiff, and no loss to the association. Petitioner further alleges as a reason why he is relieved from his obligations as a stockholder, and is entitled to recover back the money paid by him to the association, that in September, 1897, the defendant materially changed several of its most important by-laws, and made new ones, which materially violated its contract with petitioner and a large majority of the members, and changed the relation of the members to each other. The petition then refers to the changes that were made, but it does not allege that there is a single change made which was not authorized by the charter and the constitution of the association. While it does allege that his contract was violated by such changes, yet he fails to set forth what that contract was, and thus there is a failure to enlighten the court upon such facts as would enable it to determine whether the acts of the association complained of in any wise violated the contract it made with plaintiff. This is made a special ground of demurrer. Even if it were shown (and there is no allegation in the petition that authorizes such a conclusion) that the board of directors or other officers of the association, in the change of its by-laws or in any other respect, had exercised powers ultra vires, this in itself would not relieve the members of the association from performing their duties under their contract as stockholders; and, if the change in the by-laws referred to in the petition were unauthorized, we cannot see what rights this in itself gives a shareholder to recover back from the association the dues he has paid. In End. Bldg. Ass'ns (2d Ed.) § 310, it is declared: "The unlawful departure of a building association from its proper functions in purchasing real estate, even to the extent of changing its character entirely into that of a land society, will not, of course, eo ipso, put an end to its chartered existence as a building association, nor relieve its members from obedience to its rules and performance of their duties in the society."

2, 3. It is contended that the amendments to the by-laws complained of were void as to the plaintiff, because made without his knowledge, and because he has never ratified or consented to the same. As above stated, there is nothing in the petition to indicate that the amendments to the by-laws were not lawfully made. In End. Bldg. Ass'ns (2d Ed.) § 272, it is declared: "But the rule that members of a corporation are bound, in matters pertaining to their rights and duties as such, by every by-law lawfully adopted, results, not from any supposed notice to them of the by-law, but from the implied terms of their agreement of membership, wherefore it is ordinarily quite immaterial whether they had notice of a new by-law or not. The contract of membership carries in gremio the right on the part of the society to alter the by-laws from time to time. It is a right which is given it by statute. A person cannot, therefore, become a member on condition, expressed or implied, that the by-laws shall remain as they are at the time of his accession to it, and has no right to presume that they will so remain, or at any time to bind the society by his acting upon the supposition that they have so remained, beyond this: that the fundamental terms of his original contract of membership must continue unchanged, except by his consent." The petitioner, failing to enlighten the court as to what were the fundamental terms of his original contract, and not setting forth that contract in any of its details, does not show that he has been injured or damaged, or has any right of action whatever against the association to recover back the dues he has paid.

4. What has been said in regard to the plaintiff's claim on the first count of his petition applies with equal force to the second count, where he seeks to recover a designated amount as the withdrawal value of his stock. It is incumbent upon him to show by the terms of his contract that his rights to recover such withdrawal value accrued under the contract in connection with the by-laws, and hence the absolute necessity that the terms of the contract should be fully and fairly set forth. This right of withdrawal must be regulated by statute or the by-laws of the association. As stated in 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) p. 1046: "As the idea underlying the building association requires that the membership continue throughout the life of the body, if a terminating society, and, if not, of the series, the member logically has no right to receive any part of his contributions or of the profits until that life has terminated. To avoid the evident hardship of the strict application of this rule, a right of withdrawal is generally secured to the members; that is, a right to terminate their membership in the society, with its attendant interests and liabilities, at such time as they may desire, upon the basis of a settlement with the association, wherein they are allowed due credit with the association for the amounts previously paid in by them. No such right exists at common law. It is founded upon statute, charter, by-law, or agreement, the terms of which must be complied with." There is no statute in Georgia conferring such a right, nor does it appear from this petition that it is conferred by the charter of the defendant association, nor is the privilege of withdrawal claimed by the plaintiff under either. His privilege depends entirely upon his contract and the by-laws of the association, and a failure to set them forth is necessarily a fatal defect in his petition.

5. While we do not think the judge in this case put his judgment upon the strongest ground in the demurrer, yet we really think the petition was demurrable on the general ground. The strongest special ground is the failure of plaintiff to attach and set forth with any particularity whatever the contract upon which he relied for a recovery, which was practically a failure to set forth a cause of action, which would seem to be covered by the general ground. Unquestionably, to our minds, however, the ground touching the contract is well taken. As a general rule, when a judgment of court complained of is correct, it will be sustained, although based upon a wrong reason. The judgment in the present case was right, and, in the language of this court in Summerlin v. Hesterly, 20 Ga. 689, "a judgment that is right remains right, notwithstanding that the court rendering the judgment may assign a wrong reason for it." See, also, Garner v. Keaton, 13 Ga. 431; Sabattie v. Baggs, 55 Ga. 572; Eve v. Crowder, 59 Ga. 799; Wynn v. Wynn, 68 Ga. 820; Donovan v. Simmons, 96 Ga. 340, 22 S. E. 966, Syl., point 3. We think, in the case at bar, the petition was so clearly demurrable, and the judge having given the plaintiff an opportunity to amend it to conform to the special objections therein made, which he failed to do, that his judgment in dismissing the action was right, and should be affirmed, regardless of the ground upon which he based it. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

FLETCHER v. COLLINS.

NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS OF MOTION—VERIFICATION—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—INTOXICATING LIQUORS—LICENSE—OFFICER—EVIDENCE OF ELECTION—OUSTING TENANT—AFFIDAVIT—CONTINUANCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. Grounds of a motion for a new trial which are not verified cannot be considered by this court. A ground of such a motion will be held not to be verified when (a) the record is silent on the subject; (b) when the record discloses an affirmative refusal to verify; (c) and when the judge appends to the motion a note which states facts in conflict with any statement in the ground which would be material in the consideration of the errors complained of.

2. Assignments of error complaining of the admission or rejection of evidence, either oral or documentary, cannot be considered when the evidence admitted or rejected is not embodied in the motion or attached thereto as an exhibit.

3. There is no law in this state authorizing the chief executive officer of a municipal corporation to grant an exclusive right to sell liquor within the limits of such corporation.

4. "That two bailiffs were regularly elected in" a given militia district cannot be proven by the parol evidence of the justice of the peace in that district.

5. The election of an officer cannot be proven by parol, nor by the production of the "precinct returns of election" made by the managers.

6. The affidavit required by section 4813 of the Civil Code may be administered by any justice of the peace; and it is not essential to the validity of the warrant issued thereon that the affidavit should be made before the justice of the peace of the district where the land lies.

7. The discretion of a trial judge in refusing to continue a case on the ground of the sickness of a party will not be controlled when the record discloses that "there was much evidence pro and con as to whether" the absent party "was able to attend court, and what was his condition." The fact that, on the hearing of a motion for a new trial in the case, affidavits were read tending to show that the absent party was in fact sick at the date of the trial, will not have the effect of varying the rule just stated.

8. Affidavits read at the hearing of a motion for a new trial, setting forth what purports to be newly-discovered evidence, will not be considered by this court, when there is no ground in the motion asking for a new trial on account of newly-discovered evidence. (a) The alleged newly-discovered evidence in the present case was, in part, clearly inadmissible, and, to say the most of the other portion, it was of doubtful admissibility.

9. There was no error in any of the rulings of the judge upon which proper assignments of error were made. The evidence demanded the verdict rendered, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; J. H. Lumpkin, Judge.

Action by A. E. Collins against W. J. Fletcher. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

John Clay Smith, for plaintiff in error. E. M. & G. F. Mitchell and F. M. O'Bryan, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was a proceeding, under the provisions of section 4813 of the Civil Code, to oust a tenant. The affidavit which was the foundation of the proceeding set up four reasons why the tenant should be removed. The tenant, by counter affidavit, denied the right of the landlord to remove him, and gave 4 reasons which he claimed would sustain this conclusion. The judge directed a verdict in favor of the landlord, and the tenant, by a motion for a new trial, gave 21 reasons why he thought this action was erroneous. Such of the errors as are assigned in a way that we can deal with them are disposed of by the rulings set forth in the headnotes, and we do not think any further discussion of the points involved is necessary. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

FULTON GROCERY CO. v. MADDOX et al.

CONSPIRACY—DESTROYING PLAINTIFF'S BUSINESS—PETITION—TRESPASS.

1. A petition alleging that named defendants conspired together to injure the plaintiff, a corporation, by causing one of the former to execute a fraudulent mortgage in its name, upon its property, with the purpose of having the same foreclosed and levied with a view to obtaining possession thereof at sheriff's sale, and which further alleged that the fraudulent scheme was so far carried into effect as to obtain the mortgage, have the same foreclosed, cause execution issued thereon to be levied, and the plaintiff's place of business closed, and that the plaintiff had stopped the illegal proceedings by giving bond, and also alleged that the entire proceeding was carried on maliciously and without probable cause, but failed to allege that the foreclosure proceedings were at an end, was fatally defective for lack of the latter allegation, and was properly dismissed on a general demurrer.

2. A petition containing such allegations as those above indicated cannot be upheld as one setting forth a cause of action in trespass.

Error from city court of Atlanta; H. M. Reid, Judge.

Suit by the Fulton Grocery Company against J. J. & J. E. Maddox and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Frank A. Arnold and T. L. Bishop, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Maddox and Jas. L. Key, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. This was a suit brought by the Fulton Grocery Company, a corporation, against J. J. & J. E. Maddox, L. B. Jackson, Kelly Bros., a firm composed of Edgar S. and Kendrick K. Kelly, and Mrs. Ida Humphries. The petition, though loosely drawn and somewhat vague in its allegations, made substantially the following case: The defendants entered into a malicious conspiracy for the purpose of breaking up petitioner's business, in order that they might obtain possession of its stock of goods. The defendant Jackson, who was the moving spirit in the conspiracy, together with the defendants Mrs. Humphries and Kelly Bros., fraudulently and illegally, and with the knowledge that the property they were seeking to obtain belonged to petitioner, maliciously and illegally persuaded and induced the defendant Mrs. Humphries to execute and deliver to J. J. & J. E. Maddox a fraudulent mortgage upon the property of petitioner, though at the time of the execution of the mortgage all of the defendants well knew that Mrs. Humphries had no authority to execute the same, she being only a small stockholder in the plaintiff company. Defendants also well knew that the property sought to be mortgaged did not belong to Mrs. Humphries, but to petitioner, and that petitioner was not indebted either to J. J. & J. E. Maddox or to Kelly Bros. in any sum whatever. The scheme and purpose of the defendants was expressed by Jackson to Mrs. Humphries in the following language: "You can execute this mortgage, and they (meaning your petitioner) cannot make bond, and we will get possession of their stock by selling the same at sheriff's sale." The defendants collusively, maliciously, and without probable cause conspired together in the execution and foreclosure of the mortgage for the purpose of obtaining possession of petitioner's stock of goods, to its great injury and damage. Pursuant to this conspiracy, and with the knowledge of each and every one of the defendants, a mortgage fi. fa. was issued by the clerk of the superior court of Fulton county to be levied on the stock of goods covered by the mortgage. The fi. fa. was levied, petitioner's store was closed, and remained closed the greater part of one day, until petitioner, with great difficulty, obtained bond, and stopped the illegal proceedings. The defendants maliciously caused the fi. fa. to be levied for the purpose of breaking up, injuring, and damaging petitioner's business, and it was a part of the original scheme to obtain its goods without paying for them. Damages are laid in the sum of $10,000. The mortgage referred to in the petition was attached thereto as an exhibit. This mortgage recites that the Fulton Grocery Company is indebted to J. J. & J. E. Maddox on a promissory note for $107.76, and to Kelly Bros. on a promissory note for $138.09; that, to secure the payment of these notes, a mortgage was created in favor of the payees thereof on the stock of goods and merchandise (describing it) and the business of the Fulton Grocery Company. The mortgage was signed: "Fulton Grocery Company, a firm composed of W. J. Shockley & Mrs. Ida Humphries, per Mrs. Ida Humphries." The court sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and to this judgment the plaintiff excepted.

Counsel for the plaintiff in error contends that the petition set forth a cause of action in trespass, and that, therefore, the plaintiff's right of action was complete the moment its goods were seized, and for this reason the court erred in sustaining a general demurrer to the petition. Counsel for the defendants in error contends that, if the facts alleged in the petition give to the plaintiff any right of action at all, it is one for the malicious prosecution of a civil suit, and that the petition was fatally defective for the reason that it failed to allege that the suit claimed to have been maliciously carried on without probable cause had terminated in favor of the plaintiff before the filing of the present action, and that, therefore, the court rightly dismissed the case on a general demurrer filed to the petition. The case made by the petition is simply this: The defendants have obtained a mortgage upon the property of the plaintiff, signed by one who is a stockholder in the company, and they have sought to enforce this mortgage by a proper foreclosure proceeding. The plaintiff says that the person who signed this mortgage in behalf of the company had no authority to execute the same. The foreclosure of a chattel mortgage obtained under such circumstances is nothing more nor less than a civil suit, and the consequences which result to the plaintiff from bringing such a suit will be the same as would have flowed from the bringing of any other civil action. Before the defendants would be liable to the plaintiff for any damages growing out of the institution of such foreclosure proceeding, it must appear that it was instituted maliciously and without probable cause. In the case of Porter v. Johnson, 96 Ga. 148, 23 S. E. 124, Chief Justice Simmons, in referring to the subject now under discussion, says: "So far as I know, no respectable court in this country has ever held that an action will lie against a person for having brought an action against another, unless he did so with malice and without probable cause. If the law were otherwise, the ending of an action would be merely the beginning of litigation. The defendant, immediately upon the failure of the action, would begin one against the plaintiff; and, if the latter action should fail, the defendant therein would in turn bring another action, and so on ad infinitum. This court is fully committed to the doctrine that such an action is not maintainable without proof of malice and want of probable cause." It is also there stated that this doctrine was first announced in Sledge v. McLaren, 29 Ga. 64, and has been repeatedly recognized in other cases since. The opinion in the Porter Case deals with many, if not all, of the former decisions of the court relating to this subject, and some apparent conflicts in the same are reconcilable. The rule there announced may be now considered as settled in this state. Applying this rule to the petition in the present case, did the same set forth a cause of action? The petition alleges clearly and distinctly that the foreclosure proceeding was instituted maliciously and without probable cause, and therefore, so far as these elements are concerned, there is a cause of action set forth. The petition does not, however, allege that the foreclosure proceedings had terminated in favor of the plaintiff in the present case. The petition does allege that the "petitioner obtained bond, and stopped the illegal proceedings that they had instituted against the plaintiff company." An execution issued upon the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage may be stopped by giving a bond in two ways: First, by an affidavit of illegality filed by the defendant in execution; and, second, by a claim to the property, filed by one who is not a party to the execution. It is true that the defendant in execution may, without filing an affidavit of illegality, give to the sheriff a bond to have the property forthcoming at the time and place of sale; but such a forthcoming bond does not "stop" the proceeding, but merely obligates the defendant to have the property on hand to be sold when the day of sale arrives. As the allegation is that the plaintiff obtained bond, and stopped the illegal proceedings, but one conclusion can be reached, and that is that the plaintiff filed an affidavit of illegality, and that the bond given was the one required in such cases. Of course, the defendant in execution could not interpose a claim to the property. Wynn v. Music House (Ga.) 34 S. E. 582. The effect of the filing of an affidavit of illegality to the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage would be to convert what would otherwise be final process into mesne process, and the proceeding, though in the beginning one simply to foreclose a chattel mortgage, is, by the filing of the affidavit of illegality, converted into a trial of various issues which the defendant may therein raise. Such being the case, it cannot be determined from the allegations in the present case whether the foreclosure suit has terminated, as there is no allegation that the issues raised by the affidavit of illegality have ever been passed on. The question arises, therefore, whether or not, in such a case, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege distinctly that the suit had terminated in his favor before the bringing of the action for malicious prosecution. The Code declares that the prosecution must be ended before the right of action accrued. Civ. Code, § 3850. It is contended, however, that this applies only to criminal prosecutions. In the case of Marable v. Mayer, 78 Ga. 710, 3 S. E. 429, which was an action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the foreclosure of mortgages and levying of executions issued thereon on the plaintiff's property, it was held that a declaration which failed to allege that the suit on which the action was founded had terminated in favor of the plaintiff set forth no cause of action, and the court committed no error in dismissing the same on demurrer. See, also, Wilcox v. McKenzie, 75 Ga. 73; Printup v. Smith, 74 Ga. 157; Hyfield v. Furnace Co., 89 Ga. 827, 15 S. E. 752. Treating the case as one for malicious prosecution of a civil action, the petition was fatally defective for want of the averment that the suit upon which it was founded had terminated favorably to the plaintiff in the present case, and the court did not err in sustaining a general demurrer thereto.

The petition cannot be sustained as one setting up a cause of action in trespass for wrongfully seizing the goods of the plaintiff. Counsel for the plaintiff in error contends that the suit is maintainable as one for trespass under the decisions rendered in the cases of Baker v. Boozer, 58 Ga. 195, Printup v. Smith, supra, and Holton v. Taylor, 80 Ga. 508, 6 S. E. 15. In the cases of Baker v. Boozer, and Holton v. Taylor, it was held that, where an execution was levied upon personal property which did not belong to the defendant in execution, such levy was a trespass. In the former case it was held that the right of action accrued at the date of the seizure, and, in the latter, that the plaintiff under whose direction the levy was made, as well as the levying officer, were liable to the defendant for whatever actual damages he sustained growing out of the levy. There is such a clear distinction between a wrongful seizure of the property of a person under a process against him, and the seizure of the property of a person against whom no process was ever issued, that the distinction between those cases and the present one will readily appear from the simple recital of the facts. Where the property of a person is seized under a valid process issued against him, as has been seen, malice, want of probable cause, and termination of the proceeding in favor of the defendant in the process must all be alleged and proved to support an action for damages against the persons causing the process to be issued and levied. Where property of a person against whom no process has ever issued is seized, such seizure, followed by actual damages to the owner of the property, will give a right of action. In Printup v. Smith it was held that the rule that, in suits for malicious prosecutions on the criminal side of the court, the right of action does not arise until the action is ended, was by analogy applicable to suits brought for such prosecutions on the civil side of the court, except in cases of the seizure of personal property under execution, where a claim is interposed by the person whose property is seized. An examination of the facts of that case will show that there were seizures of personalty by attachments to which claims were interposed, and that there were garnishment proceedings, and the granting of an injunction, all alleged to have been procured wrongfully and maliciously. It was held that the suit was really one for the malicious prosecution of a civil action, and therefore the cause of action was not complete until the claim cases and other proceedings were at an end.

We do not think that the petition could be maintained as one setting forth a cause of action in trespass. The language used in the petition clearly indicates that the purpose of the pleader was to set forth a cause of action for malicious prosecution of a civil suit, and we think that, if he has any cause of action at all, growing out of the wrongful acts complained of, it would be of this character; and the present case fails for want of the essential averments above referred to. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

SMITH v. WOOD.

SALE OF PATENT—NOTE FOR PRICE—VALIDITY.

1. A promissory note, given for the purchase price of a patent right, which fails to comply with the act approved December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, p. 81), in that it does not express upon its face "the consideration of the same, stating the thing or article for which the same was given," is not void in the hands of a bona fide holder.

2. The judgment was not contrary to the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Floyd county; G. A. H. Harris, Judge.

Action by C. D. Wood against T. J. Smith, as administrator. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

C. D. Wood brought suit in the city court of Floyd county against S. W. Smith upon a promissory note, a copy of which, so far as material to the questions to be considered, was as follows:

"State of Georgia, Floyd County. On the first day of November, 1898, I promise to pay to the order of Q. T. Gregory, for a patent right, the sum of two hundred and ten dollars, value received, with interest from March 16th, 1898, until paid at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. Witness my hand and seal this 16th day of March, 1898. S. W. Smith. [L. S.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of R. B. McArver, L. W. Early, N. P. & J. P."

There was a mortgage upon realty embodied in the note. Upon the note there was the following indorsement: "For value received, I hereby transfer this note and mortgage to Chas. Wood, this April 7th, 1898, without recourse. Q. T. Gregory."

The defendant, after denying in his plea that he was indebted to the plaintiff as alleged in the petition, pleaded: "(2) For further plea and answer defendant says that said note as executed is based upon an illegal and criminal transaction, for that the same was taken by the payee, one Q. T. Gregory, for the purchase price of all the right, title, and interest which said Q. T. Gregory had in letters patent No. 476,127, issued to Charlie Cardwell on the 31st day of May, 1892, by the United States of America, for improvements in gates and automatic latcher, so far as the right of said Gregory appertained to, for, and in the counties of Floyd and Bartow in the state of Georgia. (3) That said Gregory failed to have expressed on the face of said note the consideration of the same, stating the thing or articles for which said note was given. (4) Defendant alleges that said note was made to and taken by said Gregory, that his failure to express the consideration thereof in the face thereof was a crime under the laws of Georgia, and for this reason said note is illegal and void. (5) For further plea and answer defendant says that the consideration for said note has partially failed, to wit, one-half, in that said Gregory failed to convey to the defendant the right under said patent to the county of Bartow as a consideration for said note."

The plaintiff demurred to the defendant's plea upon the following grounds: "And now comes the plaintiff, and demurs to the defendant's plea, and says that the same does not set up any cause of defense. And for special demurrer plaintiff says that the plaintiff's declaration shows that the consideration of said note is expressed in the face of the note, and shows that such consideration is a patent right." The demurrer was sustained as to the second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the plea, and such paragraphs were stricken. To this ruling the defendant filed exceptions pendente lite.

Upon the trial of the case at the next term of the court the following evidence was submitted:

The plaintiff introduced in evidence the note sued on. The defendant, sworn in his own behalf, testified: "The consideration of the note sued on was a patent right for a gate for the counties of Floyd and Bartow. I never got any showing for it. My first trade was with J. R. Oglesby, January 13, 1898. I then bought of him the right for Floyd for $125. Afterwards I met Q. T. Gregory, and agreed with him to take Bartow as well; he agreeing to make a discount of 40 per cent. on what I had paid for Floyd. He said that he would destroy the note and deed that had been executed in January, and give me a deed to Bartow and Floyd together, and this I thought he had done until I came to look at the papers last December, when I found I had only the papers I got in January, 1898, which only called for Floyd. Then on April 7, 1898, I bought of Gregory a half interest in six counties—Pike, Upson, Talbot, Taylor, Marion, and Macon—for $125; he agreeing to go with me and help sell the said counties. This he never did, and I have never seen him since, though I have written him. I did not know that Bartow had been stuck into the last paper. That $210 note ought to be for only $200 anyhow, even if he had deeded me the whole of Bartow, as he was to discount Bartow 40 per cent. on what I had contracted to pay him for Floyd. In the shuffle these are the only two papers I got [indicating the two assignments of territory hereinafter abstracted]." Cross-examination: "I didn't see the plaintiff on April 7, 1898. I was not in Rome that day. I didn't tell him, on the street near the Norton corner, that I wanted him to buy this note. I did sign the certificate dated Early, Ga., April 7, 1898, because I thought I had full titles to the counties that he had sold me, and for which I gave notes, and because I expected him to come and comply with his contract by traveling with me and selling the six counties in lower Georgia. I never saw the plaintiff about this note, nor knew that he had it until I got a letter from him in November, 1898, saying that he had traded for it. When I got his letter, I came to Rome to see him. He then tried to make me say that I had had conversation with him on April 7, 1898, about this note. I at that time told him I had had no such conversation, and that I didn't even know he had the note until I got his letter in November, 1898. The certificate held by the plaintiff, dated Early, Ga., April 7, 1898, was signed by me on that day, but at Coosa, Ga., in the presence of Gregory, who went home with me and spent the night. Neither Gregory nor I were in Rome on that day after that paper was signed, and I was not in Rome at all on that day." C. D. Wood, the plaintiff, sworn in his own behalf, testified: "On April 7, 1898, I met the defendant on Broad street, in Rome, near Norton corner, about noon. He told me the note was all right, and that he wanted me to buy it, as it would be a favor to him [Smith]. After this conversation I traded for the note, giving therefor a horse and buggy. I would not have made the trade but for the conversation I had with Mr. Smith, and the certificate of April 7th, referred to, which I had in my possession, and which the defendant admitted signing before I traded for the note. This certificate was brought to me by Gregory before I saw defendant, and I took it and the note, and hunted up defendant, and showed them to him, and he told me they were all right, and wanted me to buy the note." Plaintiff read in evidence the certificate signed "S. W. Smith," dated Early, Ga., April 7, 1898, stating that on or about March 16, 1898, he gave his note to Q. T. Gregory for a patent right, that he expected to pay it when due, that he had value received therefor, and that he was willing for Gregory to sell or trade it. George Ramey, sworn for plaintiff, testified: "On April 7, 1898, Gregory came to our stable to trade the note sued on for a horse and buggy. We declined to take the note at first, but afterwards did trade Gregory a horse and buggy for the note." Defendant read in evidence two papers, called "Assignment of Territory,"— the first dated January 13, 1898, and signed "Q. T. Gregory, by J. R. Oglesby, Atty.," consideration $125, grantee S. W. Smith, wherein is conveyed to grantee all right of Floyd county under patent 476,127, issued to Charlie Cardwell for improvements in gates and automatic latcher; the other dated April 7, 1898, signed "Q. T. Gregory," consideration $300, grantee S. W. Smith, wherein is conveyed to grantee all of a one-half interest in said patent for the counties of Pike, Upson, Talbot, Taylor, Marion, Macon, and Bartow.

Dean & Dean, for plaintiff in error. M. B. Eubanks, for defendant in error.

FISH, J. There was no error in the judgment of the court sustaining the demurrer to so much of the plea as set up that the note sued upon was illegal and void. The note was not void, although it failed to comply with the act approved December 21, 1897. Acts 1897, p. 81. A failure to comply with the requirements of that act, by expressing in the face of a note or contract given for the purchase price of any patent right, or territory for the sale of such right, the consideration, stating the thing or article for which the same was given, does not render the note or contract void, but makes the seller who takes such note or contract guilty of a misdemeanor. Had the purpose of the legislature been to render void every note and contract for the purchase of a patent right which failed to express upon its face the consideration and the particular thing or article for which it was given, doubtless the act would have declared such notes or contracts to be illegal and void. Instead of doing this, however, the act imposes upon the seller of a patent right who takes a note or contract for the purchase money of the same the legal duty of expressing in the note or contract the consideration of the same, and makes his failure to do so a misdemeanor, and further provides that, when the consideration is expressed in the writing as required by the act, any one who purchases the note or contract shall take it subject to all the equities existing between the original parties. It is true that the title of the act, after stating the requirements of the act in reference to such notes and contracts, does indicate a purpose to declare void all notes and contracts which fail to comply therewith; but there is nothing in the act itself which declares them to be void, nor is there anything which indicates an intention to render them void. If the meaning of the act itself were doubtful, resort might be had to the title, in order, if possible, to resolve the doubt; but, as the provisions of the act are clear and unambiguous, it is neither necessary nor proper to resort to its title in order to ascertain its meaning. Counsel for plaintiff in error contend that the note is void "because based upon a crime," and in support of this contention cite Kleckley v. Leyden, 63 Ga. 215, Johnston v. McConnell, 65 Ga. 129, and Conley v. Sims, 71 Ga. 161. It is undoubtedly true, from these decisions, that a note based upon an illegal consideration is void, even in the hands of a bona fide holder thereof. In each of the cases cited the note involved was founded upon an illegal consideration, having been given for the purchase price of commercial fertilizers which had not been inspected, branded, and tagged as required by law. The law made it a crime to sell such fertilizers. A note given for something the sale of which the law absolutely prohibits and makes penal is based upon an illegal consideration, and is consequently void in the hands of any holder thereof. The thing for which the note is given is outlawed, and the note standing upon such a foundation is outlawed also. There is a wide difference between those cases and the one now under consideration. In the present case the consideration for the note was perfectly legal. It is not illegal to sell a patent right. The crime consists, not in the sale of the patent right, but in the failure of the seller to express in the note the article or thing which forms its consideration. The note in question was not "based upon a crime." If it had been, no matter how it might have been written, or with what particularity it described the consideration, it would have been void. The consideration of a note given for a patent right may be perfectly legal, and the maker of the note may have even received full value for the note, and yet the seller of the patent right may have violated the law by not properly expressing in the note the consideration for which it was given. It is one thing to sell an article the sale of which the law prohibits and makes penal. It is quite another thing to sell an article the sale of which is perfectly lawful, and to violate the law by taking a note for the purchase money which does not properly express the consideration for which the note was given. In the one case the consideration upon which the contract is based is illegal, while in the other the consideration of the contract is perfectly legal.

2. The only other ground to be considered is whether, as alleged in the motion for a new trial, the judgment was contrary to the evidence. The court tried the case without the intervention of a jury, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of the note. Was this judgment contrary to the evidence? The only defense to the merits was the plea of partial failure of consideration. This plea was not stricken by the court, and the question to be considered is, did the defendant, as against the plaintiff, sustain this defense? Failure of consideration is no defense against one who purchases a negotiable instrument before its maturity, unless at the time of the purchase he knew, or had reasonable grounds to suspect, that the consideration had failed. The note, while not complying with the statute by stating the particular article or thing for which it was given, did show that it was given for a patent right. While it is only when the consideration of a note given for the purchase of a patent right "is expressed in the face thereof, as is provided in section 1" of the act of 1897, that the note carries upon its face such notice of its consideration as necessarily subjects any one who purchases the note before its maturity to the equities which may exist between the original parties, in view of the policy of the law as shown by the act of 1897 with reference to notes given for the purchase of patent rights, it may be that the statement of the consideration in this note was sufficient to put a prospective purchaser upon inquiry as to its consideration, and what equities, if any, might exist between the maker and the payee. Granting this to be true, we are of opinion that, under the evidence, the defense of partial failure of consideration was not available as against the plaintiff. It appears from the testimony of the defendant himself that "the consideration for the note sued on was a patent right for a gate for the counties of Floyd and Bartow." On January 13, 1898, he bought the right for Floyd county for $125, for which amount he gave his note. Afterwards he purchased of Gregory the right for Bartow county, for which he was to pay $75. Gregory said "he would destroy the note and deed that had been executed in January, and give [the defendant] a deed to Bartow and Floyd together." The note sued on was executed on the 16th of March, 1898, and it may be inferred from the defendant's testimony—he nowhere expressly states it—that its consideration was the right to the patent for both Floyd and Bartow counties. According to the agreement, the note should have been for only $200, instead of $210. The consideration for this note has partially failed, because Gregory failed to convey to the defendant the right to Bartow county. On April 7, 1898, which was more than three weeks after the note sued on was executed, the defendant gave to Gregory, who then held the note, a certificate stating that he had given the note to Gregory for a patent right, "that he expected to pay it when due, that he had value received therefor, and that he was willing for Gregory to sell or trade it." So much appears from the defendant's own testimony. Gregory presented this certificate to the plaintiff before the plaintiff traded for the note. At the time that the defendant gave this certificate to Gregory, he was obliged to have known that he had received no conveyance of the right for the county of Bartow. The "deed," to use his expression, which he had received when he purchased the right for Floyd county, covered only Floyd county; and this he knew. He testified that Gregory said "he would destroy the note and deed that had been executed in January, and give me a deed to Bartow and Floyd together, and this I thought he had done until I came to look at the papers last December, when I found I had only the papers I got in January, 1898, which only called for Floyd." It is extremely difficult to conceive how the defendant could have thought that Gregory had destroyed the conveyance of the patent right for Floyd county, which the defendant still retained in his possession, and had given to him another conveyance covering both Floyd and Bartow counties, when Gregory had given to him no paper of any kind from the time that the defendant had received the conveyance covering only the right to Floyd county until April 7th, when he purchased of Gregory a half interest in six other counties. The defendant himself testified that the only papers he got were the one covering Floyd county, which he received in January, and the one given him when he purchased the half interest in the six counties, and that he "did not know that Bartow had been stuck in the last paper." It would be an insult to his intelligence, therefore, to believe that he did not know of the partial failure of consideration for the note sued on on April 7, 1898, when he signed the certificate which Gregory used in inducing the plaintiff to purchase the note. After ample opportunity to know that there had been a failure of consideration in the respect alleged, he, over his own signature, said—in effect to all whom it might concern—that he gave this note to Gregory for a patent right, "that he expected to pay it when due, that he had value received therefor, and that he was willing for Gregory to sell or trade it"; and this written statement of the defendant was presented by Gregory to the plaintiff, who was thus induced to exchange valuable property for the note. Irrespective, therefore, of the plaintiff's testimony in reference to the conversation which he testified he had with the defendant before the purchase of the note from Gregory, we think that the defendant was estopped from setting up failure of consideration against the plaintiff. See rule 10, Greenh. Pub. Pol. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

TRIMMIER v. LILES et al.

EQUITY—CHANCELLOR — POWERS — MASTER'S REPORT—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES TO JURY—WRITTEN INSTRUMENT — CONSIDERATION — ORAL TESTIMONY—AFFIRMATIVE OF ISSUE—REFERENCE OUT OF TERM.

1. Plaintiff sued on a note executed to his testator by defendant, who claimed that $3[illegible] of it was to save the testator harmless as surety on defendant's bond, and that the obligation of the bond had been discharged. By agreement of attorneys the matter was referred to a master, who reported adversely to defendant. Held, that the chancellor had power on return of the report, of his own discretion and without a motion for reference, to order the issue to be submitted to a jury.

2. Where plaintiff sued on a note executed to his testator by defendant, oral evidence was admissible to show that part of the consideration for the note was to save the testator harmless as surety on defendant's bond, and that the obligation of the bond had been discharged.

3. Where the chancellor, on return of the master's report, ordered one of the issues to be submitted to a jury, he had power to do so nate which party should uphold the affirmative of the issue.

4. Where the chancellor, on return of a master's report, ordered one of the issues to be submitted to a jury, an objection that he had no authority to order the issue to be tried at another term of court was not well taken, since the issue was heard at a regular term, and the chancellor's decision, when rendered, would be referred as a matter of law to the term at which the issue was tried.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by T. R. Trimmier, as administrator, against J. B. Liles and another. From a decree denying a part of defendant J. B. Liles' counterclaim, and ordering the finding of a master in favor of plaintiff to be submitted to a jury, both plaintiff and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. T. Johnson and Duncan & Sanders, for plaintiff. Simpson & Bomar, for defendants.

POPE, J. On the 13th day of February, 1888, the defendant J. B. Liles made his promissory note, due at 10 months after date, for $4,061.51, with interest from date at 10 per cent. per annum payable annually, unto F. M. Trimmier, or order, and on the same day he executed unto the said F. M. Trimmier, in order to secure said note, a mortgage on a fraction of an acre of land situate in the town of Spartanburg, S. C., and whereon was located a two-story brick storehouse, occupied at that time by Reed & Liles, and a warehouse, occupied by J. B. Liles. On the —— day of July, 1894, this action was brought. In the complaint it was alleged that F. M. Trimmier departed this life on the 17th of August, 1888, testate; that Margaret Trimmier procured letters of administration on his estate with his will annexed, and that, upon her death, the plaintiff was duly appointed administrator de bonis non cum testamento annexo of the estate of the said F. M. Trimmier, deceased; that the said J. B. Liles has not paid said debt, but "has made some payments on his said note, but the exact amount of same this plaintiff does not know"; that Henry V. Liles is made party defendant because he claims to own some interest in or lien upon the real estate mortgaged to plaintiff's testator, but no personal judgment will be demanded against him in this transaction. J. B. Liles answered, admitting that he made the promissory note in question, together with the mortgage of real estate, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint; but he avers that said note represented in all of its terms only a debt due by J. B. Liles of $1,060, and the remaining $3,000 thereof was a liability of his to said F. M. Trimmier, as his surety to the guardianship bond of J. B. Liles as the guardian of the estate of J. H. Fowler, a minor, which liability is canceled and annulled by reason of J. B. Liles having paid and discharged every part of the estate of said J. H. Fowler to the administrator of the estate of said J. H. Fowler, deceased, and that J. B. Liles has paid much, if not all, of the sum of $1,000 which said note of his to F. M. Trimmier called for. By consent, an order was passed by Judge Fraser, on October 31, 1894, by which all the issues of law and fact were referred to the master for Spartanburg, with directions to report his conclusions thereon to the court. At the reference before the master there was testimony introduced tending to show that $3,000 of the $4,060 note was to cover and protect $3,000 of the liability of the said F. M. Trimmier, deceased, as the surety on the guardianship bond of J. B. Liles as guardian of the estate of J. H. Fowler, a minor, which liability, it was proved, had been fully terminated by the payment of every dollar thereof. However, the master held that proof was not convincing to his mind that the contention of the defendant J. B. Liles was correct as to the $3,000; for he held that said $3,000 was still a subsisting part of the debt evidenced by the note for $4,060. When he came to pass upon the credits which J. B. Liles set up against the said note, he sustained sums which aggregated $1,824.05 as credits to which J. B. Liles was entitled. Plaintiff excepted to these credits. Defendant J. B. Liles excepted to the finding of the master as to the $3,000 being no liability of defendant growing out of the guardianship, but as to defendant's debt of F. M. Trimmier. When Judge Gage heard the cause he struck out the $1,175 of the credits allowed by the master, and when he came to pass on the exceptions relating to the $3,000 he declared he was unable to bring himself to a restful conclusion either to confirm or overrule. He therefore ordered that the following issue be referred for trial by a jury, and that defendant be the actor therein, to wit: "Was $3,000 of the note and mortgage for $4,060.51 by J. B. Liles to F. M. Trimmier save harmless F. M. Trimmier as the surety on the $14,000 bond of J. B. Liles to the probate judge? Let the verdict be 'Yes' or 'No,' as the jury find." Both sides to the controversy appeal from this decree.

The six exceptions of the plaintiff relate mainly to alleged errors of the circuit judge in not confirming master's finding as to the $3,000. These errors are alleged: (1) Because, the order of reference being consented to it was obligatory upon the circuit judge to confirm, modify, or reject, or recommit the same, and the circuit judge had no power to order an issue for trial before a jury. (2) In ruling certain testimony competent, which it is insisted by the appellants that such testimony tended to vary or contradict the terms of written instruments. (3) That the testimony of J. B. Liles and Henry Liles, objected to, was competent, when it was clearly incompetent, as in violation of section 400 of the Code. (4) Because the order framing an issue to be tried at some other term of court was incompetent; for, if the circuit judge could form an issue, it must have been tried before himself. (5) Because the circuit judge erred in not ruling as obnoxious to section 400 of the Code certain testimony of J. B. Liles as to transactions and communications between said Liles and Trimmier. (6) Because his honor erred in making Liles the actor.

We will first dispose of the exceptions presented by plaintiff relating to the framing of an issue for trial before a jury. Such order was perfectly competent. When the exceptions to the master's report came on to be heard, the circuit judge declares that he was prepared neither to confirm nor to reject it. The difficulty suggested by the circuit judge was that he had no sight of the witnesses and that he had no knowledge how Trimmier or Liles were accustomed to transact business. Any other circuit judge would be subjected to the same difficulties if the report was recommitted to the master and a new report was made. Hence all that was left was to frame an issue to be tried by a jury, who could see the witnesses for themselves, and could be made to see how Liles and Trimmier transacted business together or by themselves. As early as the case of Gibson v. Broadfoot, 3 Desaus. 588, 589, it was held that a chancellor could recommit a report to the master for causes like the present. It has always been in the power of a chancellor to frame an issue out of chancery for trial by a jury, and in such cases he can name the party who is to uphold the affirmative of the issue. So far as framing an issue out of term time and without a motion therefor, we may say this action was heard at a regular term of the court, but the decree could not be framed by the chancellor. Wallace v. Railroad Co. (S. C.) 16 S. E. 35, is an apt illustration of decisions being made of causes heard during term time, but not actually rendered until after court has adjourned. In such cases the law refers the decision to the term at which heard. The circuit judge needed no motion for reference. It was within his own discretion. When the cause came before Judge Gage for a hearing, of course, the exceptions and the master's report were before him. The moment, however, he thus acquired jurisdiction of these issues raised by the exceptions to the master's report, it was perfectly competent for the circuit judge to confirm, modify, reverse, or recommit, or to frame an issue or issues, within the lines made by the exceptions made to the master's report, for trial by a jury. So far as the second exception is concerned, we may remark it is no longer an open question in this state that inquiry based upon testimony may be made as to the consideration of a written instrument. See Kaphan v. Ryan, 16 S. C. 352; Willis v. Hammond, 41 S. C. 153, 19 S. E. 310; Sloan v. Gibbes, 56 S. C. 480, 35 S. E. 408. The third exception, relating, as it does, to the testimony of J. B. Liles and Henry Liles as to alleged transactions or communications with F. M. Trimmier, now deceased, and thus being obnoxious to the 400 section of the Code, really calls for a slight notice by us; for, inasmuch as this testimony related to the $3,000, which matter is to be tried under an issue found by a jury, we cannot say that either one of the witnesses will be examined before the jury on this issue. We cannot say now whether section 400 will exclude such testimony or not. It depends upon circumstances. Of course, section 400 is sound law and must be enforced. This exception is overruled. We have already disposed of the fourth exception. It is overruled. The fifth exception is disposed of in our remarks in considering the third exception; and so, also, are the fifth and sixth exceptions.

It remains for us to consider the exceptions presented by the defendants. All of these exceptions relate to questions hinging upon the disallowance of $1,175 worth of items presented by J. B. Liles as credits to which he was entitled in his note. While this court must try anew all matters of fact at issue in an equity cause, yet we hold the appellant to the duty of showing us by the testimony that the circuit judge has erred in his findings of fact. We have studied the testimony closely, and the remarks of the defendant thereupon, and yet we are bound to admit, after that careful study, that our inclinations are in favor of the findings of the circuit judge. These exceptions must be overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

DORN v. GEORGIA, C. & N. RY. CO.

RAILROAD—EXCAVATION—DUTY TO GUARD—ALLEGATIONS—CAUSE OF ACTION.

The complaint alleged that L. street and two railroads ran parallel through the town; that between the two railroads was a footpath, which the town's people had habitually used for years; that defendant's road passed under L. street and the other two roads in a deep cut, and that defendant bridged the cut at L. street; that it was defendant's duty to maintain a safeguard at the cut on the path between the two other railroads; that, to protect passers on the path between the said railroads, two posts were placed in the ground, and connected by planks or railings; that defendant allowed the guard to become rotten; that deceased, passing, leaned on said guard, when it broke, and deceased fell into the cut; that deceased's death was due to plaintiff's negligence in failing to keep said safeguard in repair. Held, that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, since it did not allege that the public had any legal right to use the path between the railroads, or that deceased was using the path when he was hurt, or that defendant had erected the safeguard, thereby assuming the duty of guarding the cut.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenwood county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action by James W. Dorn, as administrator, against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company. From an order at the trial dismissing the complaint for failure to state a cause of action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sheppards & Grier, for appellant. L. W. Perrin, for respondent.

JONES, J. This appeal is from an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint for failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. So much of the complaint as relates to the contention is as follows: "Third. That before and at the time of the construction of the said railroad by the defendant, and at the times mentioned hereinafter, the tracks and roadbeds of the Columbia & Greenville Railroad and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railroad passed through the said town of Greenwood, in said state, parallel with each other and with Logan street, therein, near a blacksmith shop known as 'Beaudrot's Shop,' and nearly opposite to the dwelling known as the 'Old Gibbs Place,' in said town, and are only a few feet apart, to wit, about ten feet; that ever since the construction of the said Columbia & Greenville and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railroads, and at the times mentioned hereinafter and prior thereto, and now, the people of the said town of Greenwood, in going from one part thereof to another, passed and repassed between the said roads without objection or hindrance, between which said roads thereat there was at the times hereinafter mentioned, and prior thereto, and now, a well-beaten and much-frequented footpath, along which, as aforesaid, the people of the said town walk, and along which they have walked for years, and at the times hereinafter mentioned. Fourth. That in the construction of their said railroad the defendant approached the said Columbia & Greenville and the said Charleston & Western Carolina roadbeds at right angles, approximately, and in the construction thereof the defendant made a long and deep cut or excavation, and thereby passed underneath the said Logan street, within the limits of the said town, and at a point near a small distance below the shop therein known as 'Beaudrot's Shop,' and in front of and nearly opposite to the dwelling known as the 'Old Gibbs Place.' Fifth. That the said defendant erected a bridge over the said cut where it intersected the said Logan street; that the distance between the said bridge and the roadbed of the said Columbia & Greenville Railroad is only a few feet, to wit, about 15 feet; that the distance between the said roadbed of the said Columbia & Greenville and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railroads, which thereat are parallel, is only a few feet, to wit, about ten feet; that it was the duty of the defendant to maintain and keep in good repair a safe and suitable safeguard at and along the space between the two said roadbeds thereat, to protect persons there passing from walking or falling into the said cut; that, to protect persons from walking or falling into the said cut between the roadbed of the said Columbia & Greenville and Charleston & Western Carolina Railroad, two posts were placed in the ground, in an upright position, which two posts were connected by two plank or railing; that the said defendant failed and neglected to keep and maintain in good repair the said posts and the said plank or railing; on the contrary, permitted them to become unsound and rotten, and utterly worthless as a safeguard against persons walking or falling into said cut. Sixth. That on or about the 12th day of April, 1898, Grover C. Dorn, late of said county and state, an infant about eleven years old, was sent on a mission by his mother, and had to pass by and near to the said cut and between the roadbed of said Carolina & Northern and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railroads in said town; that as he was passing some children on the other side of said cut knocked a ball which fell into the said cut; that the said child, Grover, went to the edge of the cut, to see the ball at the bottom, and, for support, rested his hand on the said plank or railing which connected the said post; the said plank or railing not being fastened or nailed to the said post, although it appeared to be nailed, gave way, and said post, being entirely rotten, also gave way, and he fell to the bottom of said cut, and was thereby so bruised and broken and injured internally that he died in a few hours. Seventh. That the death of the said boy, Grover C. Dorn, resulted from the negligence of the said defendant in failing to maintain and keep in good repair the said posts and the said plank or railing which connected them, as a safeguard against persons there passing from walking or falling into the said cut." The order of Judge Watts sustaining the demurrer does not specify in what particular the complaint was insufficient, but it appears in the "case" agreed upon for this hearing that Judge Watts, in his remarks upon the motion to dismiss the complaint, particularized upon this: "That it did not appear from the complaint that the public had acquired legally the right to use the alleged footpath in passing from one point of Greenwood to the other."

The first, second, third, sixth, and ninth exceptions, imputing error, assume that the complaint alleges that the defendant erected the posts and plank as a safeguard to said excavation, to protect persons from walking or falling therein. The complaint does allege the erection of said posts and plank, but it was not alleged by whom they were erected. It appears that said structure was with the 10-foot space between the parallel tracks of two other railroad companies. In the absence of a positive averment of the fact, it cannot be said that the defendant erected said alleged safeguards, and then argue therefrom that the defendant thereby recognized and assumed the duty to safeguard said excavation. The complaint was defective in not stating facts from which it could be inferred that it was the duty of the defendant to properly safeguard the excavation on its premises. A general allegation of duty, without a statement of facts from which such duty would arise, is insufficient.

In order to show that defendant owed plaintiff any duty to safeguard said excavation, it was essential for plaintiff to allege by what right he was on said premises where he was injured, so as to create a corresponding duty in defendant to use reasonable precautions to protect him from danger. The complaint alleged something about a well-beaten and much-frequented footpath, along which the people of Greenwood had for years been accustomed to pass and repass; but, as said by the circuit judge, it was not alleged that the public had acquired legally the right to use said path. Nor was it alleged that plaintiff was using said path at the time of the injury. Nor was it alleged how near the said excavation was to said path, so as to enable an inference whether the excavation was so dangerously near as to imperil persons rightfully using said path; for, as tersely stated by the same judge, "Precaution is a duty only so far as there is a reason for apprehension." The mere fact that defendant had made such excavation within the town of Greenwood, of itself, is not sufficient to impose the duty to safeguard it against all persons who might, from motives of curiosity, sport, or otherwise, venture too near. Finding no error therein, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed, with leave to amend the complaint as plaintiff may be advised within 20 days after the filing of the remittitur herein.

ELMORE v. ELMORE.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 26, 1900.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — CLAIM AND DELIVERY—PERSONAL PROPERTY—ACTIONS.

An action of claim and delivery cannot be maintained against an executor of an estate to recover possession of personal property unlawfully withheld by him. (By divided court.)

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by L. C. Elmore against J. T. Elmore, executor of the last will and testament of George Elmore, deceased. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. R. Richey, for appellant. J. L. M. Irby, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. The record contains the following statement of facts: "On the 21st day of November, 1898, appellant, L. C. Elmore, named above, commenced this action in Magistrate J. M. Hudgens' court, in Laurens county, against J. T. Elmore, as executor of the last will and testament of George Elmore, deceased, the defendant (respondent) above named, to recover possession of a mule, alleged to be of value of seventy-five dollars. On the trial of the case, Magistrate Hudgens dismissed plaintiff's complaint upon the grounds that the action was prematurely brought, and that the plaintiff had not given any undertaking. The plaintiff appealed to the circuit court of common pleas for Laurens county, alleging error on the part of the magistrate. The appeal was heard at February, 1899, term of court, by Judge George W. Gage, who reversed the judgment of the magistrate, and remanded the case to the court of J. M. Hudgens, magistrate, or his successor in office, for trial. There was no appeal from Judge Gage's order. On the 8th day of July, 1899, the case was tried before J. W. Peterson, magistrate, who had succeeded J. M. Hudgens as magistrate, at Laurens, S. C. Before the plaintiff closed the testimony, and before he concluded the examination of his first witness, Magistrate Peterson granted a nonsuit. The plaintiff again appealed to the circuit court of common pleas for Laurens county, upon various grounds. The second appeal was heard at October, 1899, term of court by Judge R. C. Watts, who did not consider plaintiff's grounds of appeal, but dismissed plaintiff's appeal and confirmed the judgment of the magistrate on the ground that no action of claim and delivery of personal property could be sustained against a party, as executor, for an unlawful possession. The plaintiff appeals to this court, alleging error on the part of Judge Watts."

The practical question raised by the exceptions is whether there was error in the ruling of the circuit judge that "no action of claim and delivery of personal property could be sustained against a party, as executor, for an unlawful possession." There can be no question as to the manner in which the defendant came into possession of the property, for in his answer he alleges, as a fact which the plaintiff does not deny, that he came into possession of the mule as the executor of the will of George Elmore, deceased. In 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) 832, the doctrine is thus laid down: "At common law no action founded upon a tort committed by the deceased, for which damages only could be recovered as satisfaction, such as trespass, trover, false imprisonment, assault and battery, slander, deceit, * * * and the like, where the declaration imputed a tort to person or property, and the plea must be, 'Not guilty,' lay against his executor or administrator. But if by reason of the tort the estate has derived pecuniary advantage, the representative could be compelled to account to the injured party, in another form of action, for the benefit so obtained. Thus, if goods wrongfully taken away by the deceased remain in specie in the hands of the executor or administrator, the rightful owner might maintain replevin or detinue against such executor or administrator to recover them back; or trover, laying the conversion to have been by the representative; or, if sold, an action for money had and received to recover their value." In 3 Williams, Ex'rs, 1602, it is said: "In some, however, of the cases above mentioned, a remedy may be had against the executor or administrator in another form. Thus, although at the common law an action of trover upon a conversion of the testator dies with him, yet if the goods, etc., taken away continue still in specie in the hands of the executor or administrator of the wrongdoer, replevin or detinue will lie against such executor or administrator to recover them back; or trover, laying the conversion to have been by the executor; or, in case they are sold, an action for money had and received, to recover their value." The following cases throw light upon this question: Jenkins v. Bennett, 40 S. C. 393, 18 S. E. 929; Huff v. Watkins, 20 S. C. 477; Chaplin v. Barrett, 12 Rich. Law, 284; Ford v. Caldwell, 3 Hill, 248; Middleton's Ex'rs v. Robinson, 1 Bay, 58. If the testator had sold the mule, the plaintiff could have sued the executor for the value thereof, and we see no reason why he should not be allowed to recover the specific property, if he can show that it belongs to him. Since there is no question that the mule came into the possession of the defendant as executor of the testator's will, I think the judgment of this court should be that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial; but, as two members of this court are of the contrary opinion, the judgment of the circuit court must stand affirmed.

POPE, J. (concurring). I am conscious that an example is to be set, but I am ready to assist in setting such example. I cannot conceive that a man who takes my mule, and then dies, having named an executor, which executor takes possession of my mule as assets of his testator's estate, to be by him administered, and upon my demand for my mule declines to surrender the mule to me, and, when I sue him to recover my mule in a magistrate's court, his reply is, "You cannot sue in claim and delivery," will be protected by law. If the executor surrenders the mule on my demand, without suit, will not he have to account for such surrender to the legatees of his testator? If the executor refuses to surrender, must I stand by and take no steps to recover my mule? If the executor had been the original tort feasor, I admit he could plead that his taking of the mule was his personal act, and in no manner connected with his testator's estate. But the testator took my mule, and died with said mule in his possession (which last, we have heard it said, was nine points out of a possible ten in the law). His executor succeeds to the testator's possession, in his representative character. When I demand my mule, and I am refused possession of him by such executor on the ground that the mule belonged to the estate of his testator, of course I must sue him as executor. I concur in the opinion of Justice GARY and the judgment of reversal.

McIVER, C. J. Being unable to concur in the conclusion reached by Mr. Justice GARY in the opinion which he has prepared in this case, I propose to state the grounds of my dissent. The appeal turns upon the single question whether the circuit judge erred in holding that an action of claim and delivery of personal property brought against the defendant as executor of the will of the testator, George Elmore, under the allegations that he, as such executor, is in the unlawful possession of such property, cannot be maintained, but that such action should have been brought against the defendant individually, and not as executor. This is an important question, far-reaching in its results, and, it is claimed, has never heretofore been distinctly decided in this state. It is not a mere question of pleading or of the proper parties to an action, but its decision vitally affects the interests of those who may be interested in the estates of decedents; for if this case is allowed to proceed in its present form, and the plaintiff shall succeed in establishing his right to the possession of the mule sued for, or damages in lieu thereof, then it is clear that a liability will be fastened upon the estate of the testator, not by reason of any act of his own (for it is distinctly declared that "no wrong is imputed to defendant's testator"), but solely because of a tort committed by the defendant, who has been appointed executor of the testator's will. So that it seems to me that the practical inquiry is whether one who has been intrusted by a decedent with the execution of his will can by any act or omission of his own fasten a legal liability upon the estate of his testator, in the absence of any provision in the will investing him with authority so to do; and it is not pretended that there is any such provision in the will in the case.

The doctrine is well settled that neither an executor, in the absence of authority in the will so to do, nor an administrator, can, by contract, either express or implied, impose any new debt upon the estate of the testator or intestate, as the case may be. McBeth v. Smith, 2 Tread. Const. 676 (reported, also, in 3 Brev. 511); Nehbe v. Price, 2 Nott & McC. 328, where Mr. Justice Huger, in delivering the opinion of the court, said that the point had been repeatedly decided; O'Neall v. Abney, 2 Baily, 317; Wilson v. Huggins, 11 Rich. Law, 410; Cook v. Cook, 24 S. C. 204. This rule is also recognized in the court of equity, as may be seen by reference to the case of Boggs v. Reid, which, though an equity case, is reported in the appendix to 3 Rich. Law, at page 450. So, also, it seems to be the well-settled rule elsewhere; for it is said in 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) at page 932 of that very valuable work: "The rule is well settled that an executory contract of an executor or administrator, if made on a new and independent consideration, moving between the promisee and the executor or administrator as promisor, is his personal contract, and does not, in the absence of authority given by statute or by the will of the decedent, bind the estate, though the consideration moving from the promisee is such that the executor or administrator could properly have paid from the assets, and been allowed for on the settlement of his accounts. So inflexible is the rule denying to personal representatives the power to bind by any original contract the estates committed to their charge, that its application is not affected by the fact that the contract was made or the debt incurred for the benefit of the estate,"—citing quite an array of authorities. I may add, however, that notwithstanding this well-settled rule a court of equity, in a proper case, where an executor has paid an obligation contracted by him for the benefit of the estate, will allow him credit for the amount so paid, although no action could be maintained against him as executor to enforce the payment of such obligation, though this is scarcely pertinent to the present inquiry.

Now, if an executor or administrator has no power to fasten upon the estate which he represents any liability by contract, either express or implied, even though such contract may be entered into for the benefit of the estate, how much stronger is the reason for holding that an executor has no power to fix upon the estate placed in his charge any liability for any tort that he may commit, and hence that no action based upon a tort committed by him can be maintained against him as executor, for that would be imposing upon the estate a liability for his own wrongful act. This view is supported by authority. See 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) at page 942, where it is said: "Executors and administrators can create no liability against the estates represented by them by any tortious or wrongful act. Their torts are their individual acts, for which the only remedy of the person injured is against them individually, and the rule is the same whether the injury results from intentional wrong or negligence." On the next page of the same volume, under subdivision 17, treating of the liability of an executor or administrator for taking property of third persons, I find the following language: "If an executor or administrator, as such, receives money or takes possession of property to which the estate has no right, he is liable to an action by the real owner for its recovery. The authorities are uniform in holding this, and they generally hold that he incurs personal liability; but there is some diversity as to whether his liability is only personal, or whether he also becomes liable in his representative capacity. The English courts, adhering to the principle that an executor or administrator has no power to create any new liability on the estate, hold that he becomes liable in his individual capacity alone, though the money or property is applied to the purposes of the estate; and some of the decisions in the United States are to the same effect,"—citing cases from the states of Alabama, Arkansas, Iowa, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. The writer of the article in the Encylopædia then proceeds to say: "But other authorities have adopted a more equitable rule, and hold that, if an executor or administrator has applied to the use of the estate money or proceeds of property belonging to third persons, he is liable in his representative capacity, and that the person injured may elect whether he will hold the executor or administrator liable personally or in his representative capacity." The cases of Ford v. Caldwell, 3 Hill, 248, and Huff v. Watkins, 20 S. C. 477, seem to indicate that the courts of this state are disposed to hold what the writer in the Encyclopædia calls the "more equitable doctrine,"—that, where the estate of a decedent has received benefit from the use of money or property not rightfully belonging to it, an action ex contractu, but not an action ex delicto, may be maintained against the executor or administrator, as the case may be, in his representative capacity, for the recovery of the amount to which the estate has thus been benefited. This, it seems to me, is the true and logical doctrine, but that in no case can an action ex delicto be maintained against executor or administrator in his representative character. If the tort upon which such an action is founded was committed by the decedent, then it dies with him. Chaplin v. Barrett, 12 Rich. Law, 284; Huff v. Watkins, 20 S. C. 477. But, if the tort was committed by the executor or administrator, then the action can only be brought against him in his individual, and not in his representative, capacity; for, as is said in the foregoing quotation from the Encyclopædia, "their torts are their individual acts, for which the only remedy of the person injured is against them individually." In this connection it may be noted that the case of Rose v. Cash, 58 Ind. 278, relied upon by the appellant, is one of the many cases from Indiana cited to sustain the doctrine laid down in the Encyclopædia, cited above, from which I infer that the action in that case was brought against the defendant in his individual, and not in his representative, capacity, and that what the court really held was that he would be liable, "whether he claim as owner, agent, administrator, trustee, custodian, or in any other capacity," if he tortiously withheld the possession of the property sued for from the real owner. But as I have not, at present, access to that case, this is a mere inference from the fact that I find it cited in the Encyclopædia to sustain a doctrine contrary to that for which it is cited in the argument of the counsel for appellant. The case of Middleton's Ex'rs v. Robinson, 1 Bay, 58, likewise cited by appellant's counsel, has no application to this case. That was a special action on the case, brought by the executors, for the value of certain cattle taken from the plantation of testator in his lifetime. There was also a count in the declaration for money had and received. The court sustained the action upon two grounds: First, because, by the terms of the statute of 4 Edw. III. c. 7, executors were expressly allowed to sue for trespass in taking away the property of a testator in his lifetime; second, because the tort might be waived, and the action proceed in assumpsit, under the count for money had and received. But it will be observed that the statute of 4 Edw., now incorporated in Rev. St. 1893, as section 2319, only gives the right to executors to sue trespassers, but does not give any right to third persons to sue executors for trespasses or other torts, and we know of no statute which confers any such right. As to the second ground, it only proceeds upon the well-settled doctrine that there are cases in which the tort may be waived, and the action proceed, upon proper allegations, as an action ex contractu, as was properly allowed in that case, under the count in the declaration for money had and received, which rests upon an implied assumpsit. But in the case now under consideration the action is not brought by an executor against an alleged trespasser upon the property of his testator (which is the only case provided for by the statute of Edward), but the action is brought against an executor for an alleged tort committed by him, and there is no pretense that the tort has been waived. It is plain, therefore, that the case cited by appellant has no application to the present case. It seems to me that it would not only be anomalous, but illogical, to hold that while an administrator or executor cannot be sued in his representative capacity on a contract made by him, and not by his intestate or testator, as the case may be, whereby a new debt or liability may be fastened upon the estate which he represents, yet he may be sued in his representative capacity for a tort committed by him, with which his testator or intestate had nothing whatever to do and is in no way responsible for, and thus a new liability may be fixed upon the estate which he represents. Such a doctrine would not only be anomalous and illogical, but would tend to prejudice, perhaps to destroy, the interests of those beneficially interested—oftentimes minors—in the estates of decedents.

In the present case no wrong whatever is imputed to defendant's testator, and, on the contrary, appellant, in his argument, distinctly repudiates any intention to make such an imputation. The action is based upon a tort committed by the defendant since the death of his testator, in wrongfully withholding the possession of the chattel sued for from the alleged rightful owner; and for that he can only be held liable in his individual, and not in his representative, capacity. It is not difficult to conceive of a case in which no wrong could be imputed to the testator in taking and retaining the possession of the chattel in dispute, and yet the person who may unlawfully withhold the possession of such chattel from the rightful owner would be guilty of a wrong in so doing. For example, if the testator was entitled to a life interest in the chattel, with remainder over to the plaintiff, there could be no possible wrong on the part of the testator in taking and retaining the possession of such chattel during his lifetime. But if after his death any person, be he executor or administrator or a third person, should unlawfully withhold the possession of the chattel from the person entitled in remainder, then the wrong done is that of such person, for which he would be liable in his individual, and not in his representative, capacity. If it should be said that it would be a hard case upon the executor if he should be held individually responsible in a case like the one supposed, the answer is obvious. The court of equity would, in a proper case, and upon a proper showing that the executor had acted in good faith, allow him credit for whatever he had been required to pay in an honest effort to protect the interests of the estate committed to his charge. It is everyday practice to allow an executor, upon his accounting, credits for amounts paid out by him for counsel fees and other proper expenses incurred by him in the management of the estate, upon contracts for which he is responsible in his individual, and not in his representative, capacity, whenever the court is satisfied that such obligations have been incurred in good faith for the benefit of the estate. I think, therefore, that there was no error upon the part of the circuit court in holding that this action could not be maintained against the defendant in his representative capacity, but that the action should have been brought against the defendant individually. This view being conclusive of the case, there was no error in holding that it was not necessary to pass upon appellant's exceptions.

STATE v. ROSS.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 7, 1900.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—DISPENSARY LAW—VIOLATION—INSTRUCTIONS—QUESTION FOR JURY—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

1. On a prosecution for violation of the dispensary law, whether defendant was a manufacturer of liquor was a question for the jury.
2. On a prosecution for violation of the dispensary law, an instruction that if defendant's place contained the paraphernalia for making liquor, and defendant was engaged in the manufacture of it, he was guilty, was proper.
3. An instruction in no respect prejudicial to defendant cannot be urged as ground for reversal on appeal.
4. An instruction leaving an inference to be drawn by the jury from facts undisputed and uncontradicted by evidence in the case is not prejudicial error.
5. On a prosecution for violation of the dispensary law, an instruction that the law says no man shall keep a place where liquor is to be manufactured is not erroneous, as misleading, since the words "is to be" would be understood to mean after the enactment of such law.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Spartanburg county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Ralph Carson, for appellant. Mr. Sease, for the State.

GARY, A. J. The record contains the following statement of facts: "The appellant, Joseph Ross, and one James Ballard were indicted jointly for violation of the dispensary law. The indictment contained two counts. The first charged the sale of contraband liquor. The second count in the indictment, omitting the formal parts, was as follows: 'Did willfully and unlawfully keep and maintain a place where alcoholic liquors were sold, bartered, and given away, and where persons were permitted for the purpose of drinking alcoholic liquors as a beverage, and where alcoholic liquors were kept for sale, barter, and delivery, and where alcoholic liquors were manufactured; thereby then and there keeping and maintaining a common nuisance, against the form of the statute.'" Two witnesses testified in behalf of the state as to sales made to them by the defendant Ross at his dwelling. One of said witnesses testified as follows: "Q. Do you know the defendants, Ross and Ballard? A. Yes; I saw them that morning when we went up there. It was one morning in August. I don't remember what morning it was. Q. Tell us about all you saw that morning. A. I went up there in the night, and found the still place, with some eight or nine stands of beer (I think it was eight or nine stands), and we went back up the hill and lay there until daylight. Somebody came past about daylight and went down towards the still, and went on down there. We got there. We saw there wasn't anybody there at that time, but Mr. Howie and myself hid by the branch, and Mr. Floyd went down that branch, and it wasn't long until Mr. Ross and Mr. Ballard came. One of them had an ax on his shoulder, and the other a barrel, or keg, rather. One of them, my recollection is, went to making up some mud, and the other cleaning out an old furnace; and we closed in on them and arrested them, cut down the stands of beer, and brought them on to Spartanburg. Q. Do you know anything about the process of distilling liquor? A. No, sir; nothing only what I have learned since I have been a state constable. Q. In what stage of manufacture is it when you have got the beer there? A. They say when it gets real sour it is ready for making. Q. How far is that from the defendant Ross' dwelling house? A. It is, I suppose, two or three hundred yards." The other witness testified to having taken a still out of an old house 50 or 70 yards away from the still house where defendants were arrested. After his honor had charged the jury, the record shows that the following took place: "Mr. Carson: Will you let me state my request to charge? I stated it, but your honor did not charge it. By the Court: You ought to have handed it up beforehand. Mr. Carson: My request was this: That, in order to convict the defendants of maintaining a place where liquor was manufactured, the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the liquor was manufactured there. By the Court: I charge you that, gentlemen. If you have any doubt in your minds, under the testimony in this case, that this was a place where liquor was manufactured, why, then, acquit the defendants. But, if you take all the facts and circumstances surrounding the case, and they satisfy you beyond a reasonable doubt that it was the place where the liquor was manufactured, then your verdict, if you think they are guilty, should be 'Guilty.' As I told you before, the facts and circumstances are entirely for you. If the necessary paraphernalia was there to make liquor, and you think those parties were the parties that had it there, and they were engaged in this business, then you can convict them. If you think there was sour mash there, and low middlings, and things of that sort, it is for you to say what they were there for,—whether to make liquor or what. That is for you." The jury found the defendant Ross guilty on both counts of the indictment, and he was sentenced to pay a fine of $250, or to labor for nine months on the public works of the county. The defendant appealed upon the following exceptions: "Because it is respectfully submitted that the presiding judge erred in charging the jury as follows: (1) 'It is for you to say whether or not, under the circumstances of this case, these parties were manufacturers of liquor.' (2) 'Was the paraphernalia there to make liquor? If you are satisfied in this case that at this place was the paraphernalia to make liquor, and satisfied under the testimony as to what the process for making liquor is, and satisfied that the defendants were engaged in the manufacture of it, then you can find them guilty.' (3) In that he charged upon the facts, in charging the jury as set out in exception 2 above. (4) Because his honor charged upon the facts, in charging the jury as follows: 'If the necessary paraphernalia was there to make liquor, and you think these parties were the parties that had it there, and they were engaged in this business, then you can convict them. If you think there was sour mash there, and low middlings, and things of that sort, it is for you to say what they were there for,—whether to make liquor or not.' (5) In charging that it was for the jury to determine the purpose to which the defendants intended to put the sour mash and low middlings found on the premises. (6) His honor erred in charging the jury as set out in exceptions 2 and 4, in that he made direct reference to the testimony, and stated to the jury, from the testimony they could draw inferences as to the guilt of the defendants. (7) His honor erred in charging the jury as follows: 'The law also says that no man shall keep a place where liquor is to be manufactured, bartered, exchanged, or given away.'"

The first exception is too general, but, waiving this objection, it cannot be sustained, as it cannot be contended for a moment that the court could determine whether the parties were manufacturers of liquors. The second exception fails to specify any particular error, but, waiving this objection, it cannot be sustained, as all questions of fact were properly left to the consideration of the jury. The third exception cannot be sustained, as the question propounded by the presiding judge was in no respect prejudicial to the appellant, and all questions of fact were left to be determined by the jury. The fourth exception cannot be sustained, for the presiding judge left to the jury the inference to be drawn from facts about which there seemed to be no dispute, as the appellant offered no testimony, and also whether such facts existed. While a circuit judge may commit error of law in asking if certain facts existed, there is no prejudicial error in this case. The fifth exception cannot be sustained, for reasons hereinbefore mentioned. The same can be said of the sixth exception. The seventh exception must be overruled, as the presiding judge, in using the words "is to be," evidently meant after the enactment of the law under which the appellant was indicted. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BARKSDALE v. CITY OF LAURENS.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — REPAIRING OF STREETS—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — ACTION — TRIAL — EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY—NONSUIT.

1. Rev. St. § 1582, provides that: "Any person who shall receive bodily injury or damages in his person or property through a defect in any street, causeway, bridge or public way, or by reason of defect or mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation within the limits of such town, may recover, in an action against the same, the amount of actual damages sustained by him by reason thereof. If any such defect in a street, causeway, or bridge existed before such injury or damage occurred, such damage shall not be recovered by the person so injured, if his load exceeded the ordinary weight: provided, that such corporation shall not be liable unless said defect was occasioned by its neglect or mismanagement: provided, further, such person has not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his or her own negligent act or negligently contributed thereto." Held, that these provisions are germane to the title, "An act providing for a right of action against a municipal corporation for damages sustained by reason of defects in the repair of streets, sidewalks and bridges within the limits of such municipal corporation;" and hence the act is not in conflict with Const. art. 3, § 17, providing that the subject of every act shall be expressed in the title.

2. Rev. St. § 1582, giving a right of action against cities for injuries sustained "by reason of defects or mismanagement of anything under control of the corporation," is broad enough to include an action for injuries sustained by an employé of the city by reason of defendant's mismanagement of a steam roller while repairing its streets.

3. The servants of defendant city were engaged in grading a road at the point of its intersection with Main street. A plow was attached in front of a steam roller, and the mouth of the road entering Main street was being plowed by starting some distance up the road, and drawing the plow by means of the steam roller backing down and partially across Main street, when the man holding the plow would signal the engineer to stop. Plaintiff, a boy 14 years of age, was employed to carry water to the workmen, and on the occasion of the accident mounted the steam roller from the rear, as he was in the habit of doing, gave the engineer some water, and was going down, when his foot was caught between the roller and the embankment and crushed. The roller had never before been driven against the embankment, but was accustomed to stop about 30 feet therefrom. The engineer knew that plaintiff had mounted from the rear and would descend there, and the man holding the plow had twice signaled the engineer to stop before the embankment was reached, but the latter had failed to do so. Held sufficient to make a prima facie case against defendant.

4. Under Rev. St. § 1582, giving an action to persons injured by reason of a city's mismanagement of anything under its control, providing such person has not in any way brought about such injury by his own negligent act or negligently contributed thereto, it was necessary for plaintiff in an action for injuries to show, as part of his case, that he had not been guilty of contributory negligence, and where he failed to do so it was proper to grant a nonsuit.

5. In an action for injuries, the evidence was that plaintiff, an intelligent boy, past 14 years of age, was employed by defendant to carry water to its workmen; that the workmen were engaged in grading a street with a steam roller, that plaintiff mounted the roller from the rear to furnish water to the engineer; that the roller was backing towards an embankment, and had already backed beyond its usual distance; that there were steps on the side of the roller by which plaintiff might have dismounted in safety, but instead he chose to dismount at the rear, and in doing so suffered the injuries for which damages were sought. Held sufficient to show contributory negligence barring plaintiff's recovery.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; O. W. Buchanan, Judge.

Action by W. Oliver Barksdale, by guardian ad litem, against the city of Laurens, for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, while in the employment of defendant, by reason of defendant's negligence in the management of a steam roller while repairing its streets. From a judgment of nonsuit, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. B. Dial, for appellant. F. P. McGowan and W. R. Richey, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, a minor of the age of 14 years, while in the employment of defendant, by reason of alleged negligence in the management of a steam roller while repairing the streets of Laurens, whereby plaintiff's foot and leg were caught between the roller and an embankment on the side of the street, mashed, and injured. The appeal is from an order of nonsuit. The motion for nonsuit was based upon the following grounds: "(1) Because the legislature has not given such right of action as that relied on by the plaintiff. (2) Because there is no evidence showing or tending to show that the plaintiff's injury was caused by any negligence of the city of Laurens or of its employés, or by reason of any defect in a street of the said city suffered to exist by any negligence of said city. (3) Because there is no evidence showing or tending to show that the plaintiff's injury was brought about not by his own negligence, or that he did not negligently contribute thereto. (4) Because, if the injury was caused by the negligence of any person other than the plaintiff himself, it was the negligence of a fellow servant, for which the defendant is in no way liable." The order of nonsuit does not indicate the ground upon which it is vested. The exceptions thereto assign error as follows: "(1) Because the circuit judge erred in holding that the act of 1892 under which this action was brought was unconstitutional. (2) Because he erred in not holding that said act was broad enough to cover cases such as the evidence made out in this case. (3) Because he erred in not holding that the defendant was guilty of neglect and mismanagement in repairing its streets, and of operating its machinery in repairing the same. (4) Because he erred in not holding that the plaintiff had made out his case, and that the injury was not brought about by his negligent act, or that he negligently contributed thereto. (5) Because he erred in holding that the injury was caused by plaintiff and his fellow servants. (6) Because he erred in not holding that contributory negligence was a question of defense. (7) Because he erred in granting the motion of nonsuit, and in not allowing the case to go to the jury."

The action was brought under the act of 1892 (21 St. at Large, p. 91), now section 1582 of the Revised Statutes, which provides: "Any person who shall receive bodily injury or damages in his person or property through a defect in any street, causeway, bridge or public way, or by reason of defect or mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation within the limits of such town, may recover, in an action against the same, the amount of actual damages sustained by him by reason thereof. If any such defect in a street, causeway, or bridge existed before such injury or damage occurred, such damage shall not be recovered by the person so injured, if his load exceeded the ordinary weight: provided, that said corporation shall not be liable unless said defect was occasioned by its neglect or mismanagement: provided, further, such person has not in any way brought about such injury or damage by his or her own negligent act or negligently contributed thereto." The title of said act of 1892 is, "An act providing for a right of action against a municipal corporation for damages sustained by reason of defects in the repair of streets, sidewalks and bridges within the limits of such municipal corporation." This act was construed in the case of Dunn v. Town of Barnwell, 43 S. C. 401, 21 S. E. 315, wherein the court held that the term "mismanagement," as used in the clause, "or by reason of defect or mismanagement of anything under control of the corporation," meant mismanagement in making repairs on the street, so that the corporation should be held liable not only for neglect in making the repairs of the streets, but also for mismanagement of anything under the control of the corporation in making such repairs. Thus construed, the provisions in the body of the act are germane to the subject expressed in the title, and therefore the act is not in conflict with article 3, § 17, of the constitution, which provides that "every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." We are also of opinion that the terms of the act, "by reason of defect or mismanagement of anything under control of the corporation," are broad enough to include mismanagement of a steam roller under control of the municipality, and while being used in repairing its streets. The plaintiff's action being within the terms of a valid act, a nonsuit on the first ground would not be proper.

There was no evidence tending to show that plaintiff's injury was caused by any negligence of the city of Laurens, by reason of any defect in a street of said city, or by reason of any defect in the steam roller, or by reason of negligence in the selection of an engineer for said machine. The action, however, was not based on such negligence, but on the negligent management or the mismanagement of the steam roller. On this point we think there was some evidence tending to show mismanagement of the roller by the engineer in charge. It appears that at the time of the injury the city of Laurens, having partially graded down Main street, was grading down, also, a road or street entering Main, at the place of junction. Opposite this point was an embankment on Main street some four feet high. A large plow was attached to the front of the steam roller by a chain, and the mouth of the road entering Main street was being plowed down by starting the plow some distance up said road, and drawing the same by means of the steam roller backing partially across Main street and towards said embankment. The man holding the plow would signal the engineer in charge of the roller to stop when about to reach the place where the plow was to stop, and, after the roller was at a standstill, would loosen the plow and drag it back to the beginning point; and the roller would then return, to be again attached to the plow. The plaintiff, a lad of 14 years, was employed by the city to carry water to the men at work on the street, including the said engineer and plowman. On this occasion plaintiff mounted the steam roller from the rear, as he had done before with the knowledge of the engineer, gave the engineer some water, and was in the act of getting off when his foot was caught between the roller and the embankment, and crushed into the embankment and injured. The width of the street and the length of the roller, with the chain and plow attached, were not clearly shown; but there was evidence that the roller had never before been driven against the embankment, but was accustomed to stop about 80 feet before reaching the embankment. The man holding the plow, although not seeing the plaintiff, signaled the engineer to stop at the usual stopping place, and, seeing the roller going further, signaled again, but the roller continued to back towards the embankment. There was some evidence that the engineer knew that plaintiff had mounted the roller from the rear, and would descend there. There was no evidence that the machine was defective and beyond control of the engineer. Assuming that there was some evidence tending to show mismanagement of the steam roller by the engineer in charge, it is contended by respondent, in support of the nonsuit, that under the statute it was incumbent on plaintiff not only to show injury through mismanagement of the steam roller, but it was also incumbent on him to show that such injury was not brought about in any way by his contributory negligence. In the contention we agree with respondent. While, in ordinary actions for negligence, contributory negligence by the plaintiff is a matter of defense, and is not available on a motion for nonsuit, yet in this action under the statute it is necessary for plaintiff, as a part of his case, to show that his own negligence did not contribute to the injury; for that is one of the conditions of his right of action against the municipality, which depends wholly upon the statute. Hence, if the evidence on the part of plaintiff does not tend to negative contributory negligence on his part, a nonsuit is proper. The undisputed evidence was that plaintiff, who was an intelligent youth, past 14 years, knew that the roller was provided with steps on the side, where he could have dismounted in safety, and that he saw the roller was backing beyond the usual place, towards the embankment, and nevertheless attempted to get off between the moving roller and the embankment, so near to the embankment that while his right foot was on the ground his left foot was caught between the roller and the embankment. The evidence, instead of negativing contributory negligence, established it. On this ground, we think the nonsuit sustainable. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider the fourth ground of the motion for nonsuit,—whether the doctrine of fellow servant, which exempts the master from liability when the injury results from the negligence of a fellow servant in the same general department of labor, has any application to this action, which is wholly statutory. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

STATE v. COUNCIL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—LARCENY—FORMER JEOPARDY.

Where one is indicted for stealing property of W., and on trial it is proved that the property belonged to A., and under the direction of the court the jury renders a verdict of not guilty, defendant is not placed in jeopardy, so as to bar a prosecution under another indictment charging him with stealing the same property, belonging to A.

Appeal from general sessions circuit court of Sumter county; J. C. Klugh, Judge.

Robert Council was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

L. D. Jennings, for appellant. John S. Wilson, for the State.

POPE, J. The defendant was tried under an indictment containing two counts,—one for burglary, and the other for petit larceny. In the second count he was charged with stealing six fowls, valued at $1.50, the property of William T. Edens. At the trial it was proved that the six fowls were the property of Mrs. Annie J. Edens. Under the direction of his honor, Judge Benet, the jury rendered a verdict of not guilty. At another term of court an indictment was preferred charging the defendant with having been guilty of larceny in stealing six fowls, valued at $1.50, the property of Mrs. Annie J. Edens. The defendant interposed in his defense a formal plea of former acquittal of this charge, which was not allowed by the circuit judge. On his trial he was found guilty and sentenced. He now appeals to this court.

The sole question raised is that it was the same crime of which he had been acquitted that he was again put on trial for committing, and that, such being the case, he was constitutionally free from such second trial. Of course, if it was the same offense on both trials, it was reversible error. But was it the same crime? In the case of State v. Copeland, 46 S. C. 13, 23 S. E. 980, this court held that as the crime of arson was against possession, rather than ownership, of property, property which was subject to the charge of statutory arson might have been alleged in the indictment in the name of the owner himself, or the legal possessor of the property, and an indictment was good which had alleged the property destroyed as that of the man in possession. The defendant was acquitted because the name of the owner did not appear in the indictment. Afterwards a new indictment was framed, charging the crime as against the owner, to which a plea of former acquittal was interposed. This court sustained such plea. But in the case at bar the true owner's name must appear in the indictment, to sustain an indictment for larceny. When the name of another than the true owner is used, the prosecution must fail, as this case did in the first instance, because in law the defendant did not take, steal, and carry away William T. Edens' property. A verdict of not guilty was obliged to be rendered when it appeared in evidence that the property stolen was not of the goods and chattels of William T. Edens. However, when it appeared in the indictment that the defendant was indicted for stealing

Mrs. Annie Edens' property, then a new offense was presented. The circuit judge committed no error in overruling the plea of former acquittal. The conviction must stand. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

JOHNSON v. FRANKLIN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 2, 1900.)

DEEDS—CANCELLATION—VALIDITY—FRAUD—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.

A married woman, in whose name a deed to property had been placed on purchase thereof by her husband (she having furnished part of the purchase price), died intestate and childless. Plaintiffs, inheriting an interest in her property, after having fully explained to them the manner in which she acquired the property, each executed quitclaim deeds of their interest to her husband, after obtaining the advice of other relatives. Held, on proceedings to cancel the deeds, that the execution thereof was not obtained by the fraud or false representations of the husband, and hence they were not subject to cancellation on that ground.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; R. C. Watts, Judge.

Suits by E. Olivia Johnson and R. E. McGill against Charles E. Franklin for the cancellation of deeds. From decrees entered on the report of a referee in favor of defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Duncan & Sanders and Ferguson & Featherstone, for appellants. N. B. Dial, for respondent.

POPE, J. The complaint in the two cases above named, each for itself, set out that on the death of Mrs. Martha E. Franklin, intestate, about the year 1896, she was childless, and that her estate fell to her heirs at law, to wit, one-half to her husband, Charles E. Franklin, and the remaining one-half was divisible into five shares, to wit, one-fifth of one-half in James E. Davis, her brother; one-fifth of one-half in her sister Sallie McGill; one-fifth of one-half in Rachel McGill; one-fifth of one-half in the plaintiff E. Olivia Johnson, as the sub heir at law of Mrs. Margaret Moore, deceased, who was a sister of said Martha E. Franklin; and the remaining one-fifth of one-half in Johnnie White and Fannie White, as the sub heirs at law of Mrs. Caroline White, deceased, who was a sister of Mrs. Martha E. Franklin,—and that at the death of the said Mrs. Martha E. Franklin she was seised, as of fee, of 263 acres of land, known as the Underwood and part of the Mary Holland tracts, in Hunter's township, in Laurens county, S. C., and also 3½ acres of land in the town of Clinton, S. C., which said lands vested in the heirs at law previously named; that the defendant, Charles E. Franklin, by false and fraudulent representations induced each of these plaintiffs, without any consideration, to execute and deliver to the said defendant their respective deeds for, all and singular, the aforesaid real estate, by falsely and fraudulently representing to the plaintiffs that the land covered by the said deeds was not land in which the plaintiffs owned any interest, and that said defendant, Charles E. Franklin, kept from the knowledge of such plaintiff that each one of them did own an interest in said lands, thereby misleading and deceiving the plaintiffs, so that each one executed a deed of the said lands to the defendant. The prayer of the petition was that the defendant be required to deliver up said deeds for cancellation, and to account for the shares of any lands sold after the execution of this deed. The defendant, by his answer in each case, admitted all the allegations of the complaint, except as to the absolute ownership of said lands by his wife, Mrs. Martha E. Franklin, and also except any charge of fraud by him practiced or committed in obtaining a deed from each plaintiff to her interest in all the lands to which his wife had the legal title at her death. By an order of court, the testimony was taken by C. D. Barksdale, as special referee. When the cause came on for a hearing before Judge Watts, the testimony and pleadings were relied upon, but the circuit judge held in unqualified terms that Charles E. Franklin had practiced no fraud of any character whatsoever upon the two plaintiffs. On the contrary, he held that these plaintiffs were not minors, lunatics, or idiots, nor was Charles E. Franklin their trustee, and that he neither lied to them in obtaining the two deeds made to him by the plaintiffs, nor did he suppress any facts in reference to the matter. Further, the circuit judge found, and so held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to have said deeds canceled, but he required, in the exercise of his discretion, sitting as a chancellor, that the defendant should pay a part of the costs. The plaintiffs now appeal on the following grounds: "(1) Because the circuit judge erred in finding as a fact that defendant, Franklin, did not obtain the quitclaim deeds by false and fraudulent representations. (2) Because he erred in finding as a fact that the plaintiffs parted with their interests in the lands described in the complaint after being fully informed as to their rights in the premises. (3) Because he erred in finding that all the property was paid for by the defendant, and that the plaintiffs, prompted by a generous impulse, after the matter was fully explained to them, readily gave him the quitclaim asked for, but were afterwards induced by their brother to bring these actions. (4) Because he erred in holding that Franklin did not lie to them in obtaining these deeds, nor suppress any facts. (5) Because he erred in holding that the said deeds were not obtained by defendant by false and fraudulent misrepresentations, without consideration, and therefore null and void."

The duty rests upon the appellants to show to us that the preponderance of the testimony is in favor of the plaintiffs' version of these transactions. The money received by Mrs. Martha E. Franklin was just before the war of 1861 and 1865, during the war, and a little sum in the year 1867. At these dates all these moneys were covered by the marital rights of Charles E. Franklin. It is not shown that during the past 20 years Mrs. Martha E. Franklin had a dollar to pay for these lands. Nobody knew these facts better than Mrs. McGill, for she was Mrs. Franklin's sister. Her husband, the defendant, Charles E. Franklin, although not in debt, but openly before all the world, had the titles to these lands made out in his wife's name. They had but one child, a boy. The love of his mother for this her only child was shown in expending what money she had on his education, but five years ago he passed from this earth, and his mother endured the separation but for a few years, when she joined him. It was perfectly proper for these plaintiffs to execute these quitclaim deeds. No doubt, as the circuit judge suggests, these lawsuits were suggested by J. A. Davis, who required Franklin to pay him $300 before he would execute his quitclaim deed to these lands. Franklin's testimony is clear and explicit, showing that these ladies signed the deeds in question after a full explanation from him as to how Mrs. Martha E. Franklin had obtained a title to these lands in the first instance. It is apparent from the testimony that the deeds were not signed in a corner, so to speak, for Mrs. Johnson was living with her son-in-law, and he accompanied her to the magistrate's office where she signed the deed. Mrs. R. E. McGill and her husband, A. McGill, talked the matter over with Mrs. Franklin before she signed the deed. What haste there may have appeared on the part of Charles E. Franklin to obtain these deeds may be explained by his anxiety to hold Mr. Copeland to his offer of $3,000 for land that cost only $500 when purchased by Franklin. Fraud is a serious charge, it is a terrible charge, and all authorities concur in requiring proof before it is sustained. We are like the circuit judge; we cannot blast this man's character upon the testimony here adduced. These exceptions must be overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed in each of the actions here heard together, and that the clerk of this court do send down a remittitur in each of the causes.

WILLIAMS v. GRIFFIN et al.

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—SALES—TITLE—BILL OF SALE—CHATTEL MORTGAGE—EVIDENCE—IMPEACHMENT.

Where, on trial in claim and delivery, defendant offered in evidence a bill of sale executed by plaintiff, conveying to him personal property claimed, it was error to exclude testimony that such bill of sale was in fact a mortgage executed to secure an agricultural lien which had been fully paid, since the title to the property was in issue, and such testimony was competent to impeach the title shown by the bill of sale.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Barnwell county; G. W. Gage, Judge.

Action by Jim Williams against J. O. Griffin and another. Cross appeals from an order directing a verdict in favor of the defendants, enjoining execution of the judgment thereon, and allowing plaintiff to file a reply. Reversed.

Davis & Best, for plaintiff. J. Ham Kirkland and Bates & Simms, for defendants.

POPE, J. Jim Williams, as plaintiff, brought his action in claim and delivery for certain personal property, which he alleged was his property, and which he alleged the defendants had wrongfully taken from his possession. The answer denied all the allegations of the complaint, and set up that the three mules in question, namely, "Jim," "Bill," and "Julia," became the property of the defendant J. O. Griffin under a bill of sale for said mules executed by the plaintiff, and which mules were taken from the possession of said Jim Williams by the defendant J. F. Breland through a power of attorney from said J. O. Griffin executed under the power contained in said bill of sale. The cause came on for trial before his honor, Judge Gage, and a jury. Plaintiff offered testimony of the allegations of his complaint. The defendant offered proof of the execution of the bill of sale, and then closed. Thereupon plaintiff offered testimony tending to show that the alleged bill of sale was really a mortgage written on the same day and on the same paper upon which a lien on crops to secure agricultural supplies, for $150, was given by the plaintiff to defendant J. O. Griffin. The circuit judge, upon the objection of the defendant to such testimony, ruled it incompetent, and, further, held that he would direct a verdict for defendant, but allow the plaintiff to file a reply setting up that the instrument introduced by the defendant, while on its face it appeared to be a bill of sale, was in fact a mortgage to secure the same $150 covered by the lien on plaintiff's crops, and which said mortgage was fully paid. All these things were embodied in an order. Thus the jury, directed by the circuit judge, rendered a verdict for defendant for $150. The plaintiff filed his reply, but both sides to the suit appealed from the order of Judge Gage.

If this court should hold the ruling of the circuit judge as to the admissibility of plaintiff's testimony directed to showing the bill of sale a mortgage, and that the debt it secured had been fully paid, to be error, then the whole order and verdict would be set aside, and a new trial ordered; thus rendering useless the other issues. Now, as to the action of claim and delivery, it is nothing but the old common-law action in replevin. It is, in its trial, subject to the same rules as to testimony as any other action. Of course, title to property is in issue. This being so, any testimony bearing directly on title of the property in question is competent. If the paper in question is a bill of sale, why the plaintiff must go out of court. If, however, the instrument, although in form a bill of sale, is really a mortgage, and that mortgage has been fully paid (we mean, of course, the debt intended to be secured by the mortgage has been fully paid), why should not this testimony to show this last state of facts be perfectly competent? Is it not the most natural mode of upsetting defendant's pretensive title? As was suggested by plaintiff (appellant) on his argument in this court in Amaker v. New, 33 S. C. 28, 11 S. E. 386, 8 L. R. A. 687: "True, too, the action in the court below was not in terms to vacate defendant's deed; but still plaintiff's claim depends upon vacating that deed. It is set up by defendant in opposition to plaintiff's deed, and the plaintiff attacks it on the ground of fraud, and he must sustain his attack, or his claim fails." In the case at bar plaintiff claims that the defendant is endeavoring to practice a fraud upon him by relying upon an instrument as a subsisting bill of sale, when such instrument is only a mortgage, and the debt intended to be secured thereby has been fully paid. It would certainly seem, if testimony impugning a title deed to land on the ground of fraud, in reply to defendant's testimony setting up such deed, is admissible, such testimony, in reply to defendant's testimony setting up a bill of sale of three mules on the ground of fraud, should be competent also. When we use the word "fraud," it need not mean anything else than constructive fraud, and not moral fraud. We think, therefore, that the circuit judge was in error in excluding plaintiff's testimony tending to upset this bill of sale; and this, having caused the circuit judge to direct a verdict for defendant, will cause a new trial. It is the judgment of this court that the ruling of the circuit judge as to the testimony complained of as being excluded was erroneous, and that the verdict of the jury ordered by him, and also his order of injunction and for amendment of the pleadings, be vacated, and the action be remitted to the circuit court for a new trial.

WALTON v. GAIRDNER et al.
WEED v. SAME.

EXECUTORS—COMMISSIONS—COMPENSATION.

1. An executor who, under authority given him in the will, discharges a general legacy by the delivery of stocks or bonds, is not entitled to commissions under section 3484 of the Civil Code, which provides that an executor shall have a commission "on all sums of money received by him on account of the estate," and "on all sums paid out by him, either to debts, legacies, or distributees."

2. The turning over by an executor of stocks and bonds in discharge of a general legacy is not a "delivering over of property in kind," within the meaning of section 3487 of the Civil Code, which authorizes the ordinary to allow compensation for the latter service.

3. Whether such a delivery of stocks and bonds by an executor is an "extraordinary service," for which the ordinary may allow compensation under the provisions of section 3489 of the Civil Code, is not now decided.

Error from superior court, Richmond county; E. L. Brinson, Judge.

In the matter of the discharge of general legacies to Gairdner and others in relation to commissions and compensation. Maurice Walton, executor, and E. G. Weed as executor and individually, bring error. Modified.

J. T. Olive and Hamilton Phinizy, for plaintiffs in error. Jos. B. & Bryan Cumming, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. When a will containing a large number of general legacies provides that the executors may "pay general legacies in money, or in stocks or bonds, as cash, at their fair market value," what compensation is allowed by law to the executors when they elect to pay general legacies in stocks or bonds? "At common law the rule is well settled, both in the courts of equity and in the courts of law, that an executor or an administrator is not entitled to any compensation for his personal trouble and loss of time in the performance of his duties." 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1277; Schouler, Ex'rs & Adm'rs, § 545. The reason given for this rule is that in England the executor or administrator was entitled to the residue of the estate, and was in this way supposed to be compensated for the time and labor of administration. Crossw. Ex'rs & Adm'rs, § 545. The right of the executor to be compensated for his "personal trouble and loss of time" in attending to the business of the estate represented by him is therefore to be determined by reference to the statutes of this state. He is entitled to compensation only to the extent that there are statutes in existence providing for such compensation. By section 3484 of the Civil Code it is provided that an executor or administrator "shall have a commission of two and one-half per cent. on all sums of money received by him on account of the estate (except money loaned by him and repaid to him), and a like commission on all sums paid out by him, either to debts, legacies, or distributees." This provision, as well as all provisions providing for compensation of executors or administrators, being in derogation of the common law, must be construed strictly; and therefore "stocks or bonds" which were in the possession of the testator at the time of his death, and thus came into possession of his executor, are in no sense "sums of money received by him on account of the estate," and such stocks or bonds, when delivered to a legatee under the will in discharge of a general legacy, are not "sums paid out by him."

2. While the Code declares that no commission shall be paid to any administrator or executor "for delivering over of any property in kind," it provides that the ordinary may allow reasonable compensation for such services, not exceeding 3 per cent. on the appraised value. Civ. Code, § 3487. The turning over by an executor of stocks or bonds in discharge of a general legacy is not a delivering over of property in kind, within the meaning of that provision of the law. Property of an estate, both personalty and realty, may be, under certain conditions, divided in kind between those entitled to it. Id. § 3479 et seq. When the property of an estate is so divided in kind, the value of each portion is appraised by persons appointed for that purpose, and the "appraised value" referred to in the section providing for compensation for delivering over of property in kind relates to such appraisement. Possibly, a delivery by an executor of a specific legacy, either of personal property or of real estate, might be a delivery in kind, within the meaning of this section, but it is not necessary in the present case to determine this question. The delivery by an executor of stocks or bonds in discharge of a general legacy is not a delivery in kind, within the meaning of the law declaring that the ordinary may allow reasonable compensation for that service.

3. Section 3489 of the Civil Code provides that, "in other cases of extraordinary services, extra compensation may be allowed by the ordinary." Whether the service for which in the present case the executors seek compensation is an "extraordinary" service, and whether the compensation provided for in the section just quoted is extra in the sense of being in addition to compensation for a service already provided for by law, or whether it is extra in the sense of being compensation for some service for which no compensation is provided, we will not now undertake to decide. If the executors in the present case are entitled to compensation at all, it is under the provisions of the section last referred to. The executors asked for commissions. The judge held that they were not entitled to commissions, but that they could apply to the ordinary for compensation for delivering property in kind. So far as the judge held that the executors were not entitled to commissions, his decision was correct; but his ruling that the payment by the executors of general legacies in stocks or bonds was a delivering over of property in kind, within the meaning of section 3487, Id., is, we think, erroneous, and to this extent his judgment is reversed. Judgment affirmed in part, and in part reversed. All the justices concurring.

ATLANTA CONSOL. ST. RY. CO. v. CITY OF ATLANTA.

CITY IMPROVEMENTS—PAVING—LIABILITY OF STREET RAILWAY.

1. The act of October 10, 1891 (Acts 1890–91, vol. 2, p. 457), is the only source from which the mayor and general council of Atlanta can, in a case like the present one, derive power to charge a street-railroad company with a portion of the original cost of paving when it lays its tracks upon a street which has already been thus improved.

2. Under this act it is incumbent upon the mayor and general council, before granting a street-railroad company permission to lay its tracks on a paved street, to fix the amount of compensation which will be required of it; and, when no amount has been thus fixed, no demand can be made against the company after the tracks have been laid, either in behalf of the city or of abutting property owners, for the cost of pavement.

3. Where the mayor and general council granted such a railroad company permission to lay its tracks on a paved street, expressly stipulating that no charge for paving should be made against the company, the general council could not thereafter, under the provisions of the act above cited, enforce, by execution or otherwise, a claim against the company for any portion of the original cost of laying the paving in that street.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; John C. Reed, Judge pro hac.

Action by the city of Atlanta against the Atlanta Consolidated Street-Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. On levy of execution, defendant filed an affidavit of illegality. Verdict for plaintiff in execution, and the street-railway company brings error. Reversed.

Geo. Westmoreland, for plaintiff in error. J. A. Anderson and J. T. Pendleton, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. In 1893 the street-railway company applied to the city council of Atlanta for permission to lay its tracks upon a portion of Smith street. At the date of this application, Smith street had been paved and improved under the provisions of the city charter authorizing streets to be improved, and a portion of the expense of such improvements to be assessed against abutting property owners. The city council granted the permission, in a resolution which, among other things, declared that no charge should be made against the street-railway company, on account of the city or abutting property owners, for the payment of any part of the expense of the improvements which had already been made on Smith street. After this permission had been granted, the street-railway company laid its tracks upon the street in question, and proceeded to operate its railway thereon. Subsequently the city council caused an execution to be issued against the street-railway company for a sum which was alleged to be the amount due to the abutting property owners for its pro rata of the expense of the improvements on Smith street. The street-railway company interposed an affidavit of illegality, setting up that the execution was proceeding against it illegally; and, the issue thus raised coming on for trial, the court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in execution, and to this judgment the street-railway company excepted.

It was insisted in the argument here that the judgment was erroneous for the reason that the city of Atlanta had no authority to issue an execution to enforce a claim of the character involved in the present case. It was replied to this argument that no question was raised in the affidavit of illegality as to the authority of the city to issue the execution; the sole question therein raised being that the execution, no matter whether issued legally or illegally, was proceeding illegally. Under the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to determine either whether the question is properly before us, or whether the city had the authority to enforce the claim by execution. We do not think the city had power to enforce the claim for which the execution was issued against the street-railway company either by execution or in any other way. In order to decide the controlling question involved in the present case, it becomes necessary to make a brief review of the different acts conferring upon the city of Atlanta the power to improve the streets of the city, so far as these acts have any bearing upon the authority of the city to make assessments against street-railway companies. The act of September 3, 1881 (Acts 1880–81, p. 358; Code Atlanta 1899, §§ 138–140), provided that the city council might, under certain conditions, improve the streets of the city, and assess a certain proportion of the expense of such improvements against the abutting property owners, and, if there was a street-railroad company having its tracks upon the street so improved, such company should be required to improve in the manner that the street was improved the width of its tracks, and for three feet on each side thereof. This act further provided that the assessment against abutting property owners should be collected by execution to be issued by the city clerk. The act of October 12, 1885 (Acts 1884–85, p. 416), provided that, if the street-railroad company should fail to improve the street in the time and manner prescribed, the city might cause the work to be done, and enforce the collection of the cost of such work against the street-railroad company in the manner prescribed in the act of 1881 for collections of assessments against abutting property. The act of December 24, 1886 (Acts 1886, p. 239), provided that, whenever the public interests may require, the city council may by ordinance "assess any railroad or street company * * * to improve the street," and do part or all of such work, as right and justice may dictate, whether such work be petitioned for or not, and the mode of procedure, and remedies to enforce the same, shall be those provided for street and sewer improvement in other cases provided by law and the ordinances of the city. The act of October 10, 1891 (Acts 1890–91, vol. 2, p. 457; Code Atlanta 1899, § 143 et seq.), provided that: "When street railroad tracks are laid in said city on a street which has already been paved or permanently improved, and upon which said company has no track, said city may require such contribution or payment to said city for said city and the owners of abutting property, at the time of laying such tracks, on account of the paving or pavement improvement of any such street, as the mayor and general council of said city may deem proper (but such amount shall not be greater than in cases provided for under section I of this act [which required street-railroad companies, under certain conditions, to pave between the rails of each line of track, and for four inches outside thereof]). Said city may regulate and enforce the payment or collection of such amount of contribution, and may require payment of same before consent granted to lay such tracks, and may grant consent conditional on such payment thereafter. Such street railroad company shall be liable for its pro rata of the costs to repave when the same is done according to law." The execution in the present case was issued for the purpose of enforcing a demand which the city claimed to have against the street-railway company for the benefit of the abutting property owners on Smith street under the provisions of the act of 1891, just quoted. An examination of the execution and the itemized bill attached thereto is all that is necessary to make it clear that the city council, in issuing the execution, was attempting to proceed under the act just referred to. That this was true was practically conceded in the argument here. Counsel for the railway company contended that, as that company had laid its tracks upon Smith street upon the faith of the statement in the resolution permitting it so to do without charge for any part of the improvement which had been made on the street, the city authorities were estopped from claiming anything against it. On the other hand, it was claimed by counsel for the city that so much of the ordinance as attempted to relieve the railway company from the payment of a proper proportion of the expense incurred by the property owners in improving the street was ultra vires and void, for the reason that, while the city authorities had a discretion as to the amount that should be charged the street-railway company for permission to lay its tracks upon the improved street, the law imperatively required that at least some amount should be charged. The city council either had authority to allow the railway company to lay its tracks upon the street without charge, or it had not that right. If it had the right, of course it had no power, after the railway company had acted upon the resolution granting it permission to lay its tracks without charge, to call upon the company for any amount, either as due itself or the abutting property owners. If it did not have the right to give the permission to lay its tracks without requiring that at least some part of the sum which had been expended by the property owners for paving that part of the street which the railway company sought to occupy should be paid, then the grant to the railway company of permission to lay its tracks without this requirement would seem to be void. In either view, there was not in the present case any attempt on the part of the city, either before or at the time permission was given the company to lay its tracks, to fix an amount which should be paid to the abutting property owners, under the provisions of the act of 1891, as a condition precedent to the laying of the tracks of the company upon the street. If the city council had no right to grant the permission without demanding something, then it will not be pretended that the grant was made under the provisions of the act of 1891. The grant not having been made under authority of that act, of course, after the grant had been acted on, and the street occupied, it is not within the power of the council to retrace its steps, and make an assessment against the company for its occupation of the street, when the law requires that the assessment should be made before the right to occupy the street is granted. Construing the act of 1891 as contended for by counsel for the city,—that it requires that some amount should have been charged,—the act clearly requires that that amount shall be fixed and determined before the right to occupy the street is granted. It is true that payment of the amount so fixed may be deferred, but the act is imperative that the amount must be fixed before that privilege is granted. It is not pretended in the present case that this was done, and therefore the city council cannot enforce payment of the amount claimed by it, either by execution or in any other way. Whether the grant to occupy the street without the payment of any amount would be void for want of authority in the city council to make such grant, and what would be the rights of the city council or of the abutting property owners in that event, are questions not raised in the present record, and will not now be decided.

It was contended in the argument that, as the grant contained a provision that it should be subject to any ordinance that might be thereafter passed by the city council, the claim in the present case could be sustained as being one founded upon an ordinance, duly passed, requiring the street-railway company to pay the amount specified in the execution to the abutting property owners. This contention cannot be sustained, for two reasons: First, the claim sought to be enforced is, as has been seen, under a resolution purporting to be passed under authority of the act of 1891, and there is nothing in the record to indicate that in making the assessment in the present case the city council were attempting to carry into effect the authority reserved by them to pass other ordinances affecting the rights of the railway company in Smith street; and, second, for the reason that there is no authority in the charter of Atlanta for the city council to make an assessment against street-railway companies for the benefit of abutting property owners, except in the act of 1891. Although the right to pass ordinances referring to the railway company was expressly reserved, and the company expressly agreed to abide by the provision of such ordinances, this would not confer power to pass an ordinance which was not authorized by the charter. What has just been said distinguishes this case from that of City of Atlanta v. Gate City St. R. Co., 80 Ga. 276, 4 S. E. 269. In that case the agreement of the railroad company was to comply with ordinances then of force, or that might thereafter be adopted, relative to the company in question, and the ordinance passed in that case under authority of this stipulation was one which the city had charter power to pass.

Under the facts as they appeared at the trial, the judge should have dismissed the levy, and the direction of a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in execution was erroneous. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

HUNNICUTT & BELLINGRATH CO. v. VAN HOOSE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 13, 1900.)

BUILDING CONTRACT — DIVISIBILITY — ABANDONMENT — CONTRACT PRICE — RIGHTS OF OWNER—LIABILITY TO MATERIAL MAN.

1. When, by the terms of a contract, one agrees to furnish all material and labor for the construction of a building, and to turn over the same in a finished state to another, on payment of a stipulated price, such a contract is an entire one, and is not to be held as divisible because it contains a stipulation that when the building has arrived at a certain stage of completion the owner may suspend further work, and that if he elects to do so a stated sum is to be the compensation for the labor done and material furnished. When, in such a case, a building had progressed to the stage last indicated, and the contractor abandoned the work against the will of the owner, the gross sum fixed as the price for completing the entire work is the true "contract price," and not the sum contemplated to be paid in the event the owner suspended the work at a period before completion.

2. The statute which required the owner who gave out a contract for the erection of a building on his land to retain 25 per cent. of the contract price, for the benefit of laborers and material men, did not prevent such owner from making partial payments to the contractor from time to time as the work progressed, provided the aggregate of such payments did not exceed 75 per cent. of such contract price; and if, before the completion of the building according to the contract, the contractor abandoned the work and left the building uncompleted, it was the right of the owner to take possession of the same and complete it. If, in doing so, the amount required for completion, when added to the sums properly paid to the contractor, exceeded the original contract price, such owner was not liable to a material man for any part thereof.

Fish, J., dissenting.

Error from superior court, Hall county; R. B. Russell, Judge.

Action by the Hunnicutt & Bellingrath Company against A. W. Van Hoose and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Arnold & Arnold and Dean & Hobbs, for plaintiff in error. H. H. Perry, J. C. Boone, and G. H. Prior, for defendants in error.

LITTLE, J. The Hunnicutt & Bellingrath Company instituted an action against Van Hoose & Pearce, in which they allege that the defendants owned certain land in the city of Gainesville, and that in the spring of 1896 such owners entered into a contract with G. W. Foote, who was a contractor, to erect on said land a large building, to be known as an "auditorium," and agreed with Foote to pay him the sum of $14,200 for said building complete. It is further alleged that such contract was in two parts; that is, that when certain portions of the work were done the owners were to pay Foote $10,000, and if the remainder was completed the remaining sum of $4,200 was to be paid. The petitioner further alleged that it did certain work on, and furnished certain material for, the building, under a contract with Foote, to wit, that it furnished all the galvanized iron, tin, slate work, and skylight for the building, for which Foote agreed to pay it $1,148, which was a fair market price for the same; that $400 of said sum has been paid, leaving an indebtedness of $748 to the petitioner for said work and material. It is further alleged that, after the contract had been entered into between the owners and Foote, the latter commenced the work, and did finish the building substantially so far as to have the brick walls put up, and all stone, terra cotta, galvanized iron, etc., pertaining to the exterior work, so as to be entitled to the payment of the first-named amount of $10,000; and that thereupon the owners did pay to Foote the full amount of $10,000, without reserving 25 per cent. of said contract price, and without requiring any affidavit from the contractor, and without obtaining the consent of the petitioner; that at this point Foote abandoned his contract without completing the building according to the stipulations; and that the owners thereupon undertook to complete the building themselves, and did expend thereon the full sum of $14,200, including the sum paid to Foote, and did, therefore, use on said building and the completion thereof the full amount of the contract price, without reserving any sum whatever, and in this manner they obtained from petitioner said material and labor, and have now no sum of money held back and reserved to pay for the same. They pray a judgment against the owners of the property for the amount due them for labor performed and material furnished in the construction of the building as set out. Attached to the petition is a copy of the contract entered into between Van Hoose & Pearce (signing as the Georgia Female Seminary) and Foote for the construction of the building. It is dated April 1, 1896; and by its terms Foote undertook, in consideration of the sum of $14,200, to build, finish, and deliver on or before September 1, 1896, a building for a conservatory of music, according to specifications made a part of the contract, and to provide all labor and materials of every kind for the completion and finishing of said work. Van Hoose & Pearce undertook, on their part, for the faithful performance of the terms of the contract, to pay to Foote the sum of $14,200 in the following manner: To pay on Saturday of each week during construction a sufficient amount to meet the pay roll of the laborers for the week, and on the first day of each month a sufficient amount to cover 75 per cent. of the labor and material actually in the building. The last installment was to be paid in 30 days after the work was fully completed and accepted by the owner, free from all claims by lien or other attachments. It is further provided that if the contractor should at any time during the progress of the work refuse or neglect to supply and furnish a sufficiency of material or workmen, or cause any unreasonable neglect or suspense of the work, or fail or refuse to comply with any of the articles of this agreement, the owners should have the right and power to enter and take possession of the premises and provide material and workmen sufficient to finish the work, and the expense of so doing should be deducted from the amount of the contract. A stipulation is made in the following language: "It is mutually agreed between the parties of the first and second parts that in consideration of ten thousand dollars the party of the first part is to complete all brick walls; put in all stone, terra cotta, galvanized iron, all O. S. doors, all windows, sash, floor linings, iron columns, and all necessary partitions; to lay all floor linings; and everything pertaining to exterior work, except stone steps,—and that when this much of the building is completed the work may be suspended until such time as the party of the second part may decide to finish the building. If work is suspended for more than thirty days, the twenty-five per cent. held back by the party of the second part shall become payable by the party of the first part turning over above-described work free from lien or other attachment." To this petition the defendants filed a general demurrer, which on the hearing was sustained, and the petition dismissed. To this ruling of the court the plaintiff in error excepted.

1. This action was based on the provisions of sections 2802 and 2803 of the Civil Code, which, in effect, provide that every person who shall give out a contract for the construction of any house shall retain 25 per cent. of the contract price until the contractor shall submit to such person an affidavit that all debts incurred for material and labor in constructing the house have been paid, or that the persons to whom such debts are due have consented to the payment of said 25 per cent., and that, if any person shall pay said 25 per cent. of the contract price of the house without requiring the affidavit, he shall be liable, to the extent of 25 per cent. of said contract price, to any material man or laborer for material furnished or work done for said contractor in constructing said house. These sections were repealed by the act approved December 18, 1897, and are not now in force. The plaintiff claims that its rights accrued under their provisions before such repeal. Hence, it becomes necessary to pass on the questions made. It was contended for the plaintiff that, under the provisions of the Code which we have recited, it was the legal duty of the defendants in error to retain 25 per cent. of $10,000, because, under a proper construction of the contract, this sum was to be paid to the contractor, separate and apart, for the completion of certain particular parts of the building. It is also contended that inasmuch as the defendants in error paid to the contractor $10,000 of the contract price at a certain stage of the work, and, after the abandonment of his contract by Foote, used the remaining part of the full contract price in completing the building, they thereby became liable for labor and material on the building, to the extent of 25 per cent. of $14,200, because that sum was the entire contract price. Two questions, therefore, are material to be considered: First. Is the contract which was entered into by the parties an entire or divisible one? Second. What legal obligations, as to the retention of a part of the contract price, were imposed upon the owner who gave out a contract for the construction of a building on his land while these provisions of the Code were in force? And we shall address ourselves to these questions, in their order.

Section 3643 of the Civil Code, which is but a reaffirmation of the common law, declares that a contract may be either entire or severable; that, if it is entire, the whole contract stands or falls together; that, if it be severable, the failure of a distinct part does not void the remainder; and that the character of the contract is to be determined by the intention of the parties. Referring to the contract now under consideration, we find that it was the purpose and intention of the parties, as expressed by its terms, that an entire and completed building, to be known as an "auditorium," should be constructed, in a certain way and of specified materials, by a given day, and delivered to the owners; that this contract included all the work necessary for its completion, and the furnishing of all the material which entered into a finished building; and that the consideration to be paid for the building complete was $14,200. After clearly expressing the intention of the parties to have and make a completed building, and clearly stipulating what price should be paid for the same, it appears that they further agreed that for the construction and finishing of the building to a certain extent, which was clearly defined, the owners should only be obligated to pay the sum of $10,000, and that when "this much of the building is completed the work may be suspended until such time as the party of the second part may decide to finish the building." There is no stipulation that the work shall be suspended at that point in its construction, but that it may be; but in no event could it be suspended longer than the party of the second part (that is to say, the defendants in error) "may decide to finish it." So that it would seem, from a fair interpretation of the language used, that the right to have the work suspended at the point indicated rested with the owners, and that no option was given to the contractor to do less than to complete the building; and, unless the owners chose to suspend the work, the stipulation that $10,000 should be the agreed price for the particular parts of the work named did not go into effect. Clearly, this provision was incorporated for two purposes,—to give the owners the right to suspend the construction of the building when it had reached a certain stage, and to fix the compensation which the owners should pay to the contractor if they decided to suspend the work at that period of the construction. But in no event, fairly construed, does the contract contemplate that the contractor shall of his own volition stop the work until the building has been fully completed. It must follow, if this is the meaning of the contract, that it is an entire one,—that is, for a finished building,—with the right reserved to the owners to suspend further prosecution of the work, and accept and pay for the building, when it had been brought to a certain stage of completion. Unless such right was exercised, the stipulation granting it is without effect, and, in the absence of the exercise of this right, the agreement of the parties obligates the one to complete and turn over the building according to the plans and specifications, and the other to pay therefor the price of $14,200. The petition does not allege that the owners exercised the right they had to stop the erection of the building before its full completion, but, on the contrary, it explicitly alleges the fact to be that when the building reached a certain stage the contractor abandoned the work; and, as negativing that such was done with the consent of the owners, it alleges that they, after such abandonment, used the remainder of the contract price not paid over in finishing the building. So that, taken as a whole, the contract, under the allegations of the petition, bound the contractor to complete the building for a stipulated price of $14,200. See Freeman v. Campbell, 22 Ga. 184.

2. For the benefit of laborers doing work on, and persons furnishing materials for, buildings erected on the land of another, this statute rendered the owner of the land liable for 25 per cent. of the contract price, unless he should have first ascertained, in the manner prescribed by the statute, that the claims of laborers and material men for improving his property had been paid. But, while thus protecting the debt of the laborer and the person furnishing the material for his building, the statute, fairly construed, did not mean to entirely ignore the rights of the owner. This court, in the case of Gross v. Butler, 72 Ga. 187, and also in other cases, has ruled that the statute which created a lien on the property of an owner in favor of one who furnished materials to the contractor for the erection of a house thereon was in derogation of the common law, and its requirements must be strictly followed. It is true that there is no assertion of a lien in this case, but the object of the statute was to give an extraordinary right to laborers and material men in securing their debts, and the principle involved is practically the same. It must be borne in mind that there is no privity of contract, ordinarily, between the material man and the owner. The contractual relations which exist are between the owner and the one who undertakes to furnish all the necessary material at his own expense, and erect a building on the land of another for a stipulated price; but in order to protect the one, whose labor improves his land, and the other, whose material enters into the construction of permanent improvements thereon, the law placed a burden on the owner of the land, but it was not meant to work in an unreasonable or oppressive manner. It required that, of the contract price which he had agreed to pay for the work and material by which his building is constructed, he should retain 25 per cent. from the hands of the contractor until satisfied in a particular manner that the debts for labor and material had been paid. It does not mean that the owner might not from time to time, to meet the wants of the contractor and to suit his own convenience, make payments as the work progressed. Nor did the statute require that 25 per cent. of earnings for work actually done in the progress of the building should be withheld. This court, in the case of McAuliffe v. Bailie, 89 Ga. 856, 15 S. E. 474, ruled that under it partial payments might be made to a contractor engaged in the work of erecting a house, to any extent, provided that the amount of such partial payments made did not aggregate more than 75 per cent. of the total contract price. It is stipulated in the contract between the parties to this case that on Saturday of each week during the construction of the building the defendants should pay to the contractor a sufficient sum, as part of the contract price, to meet the pay roll of the laborers who were engaged in the work on the building for the week, and also that on the 1st day of each month they should pay an amount sufficient to cover 75 per cent. of the labor and material actually in the building. The petition alleges that the contractor commenced the work, and did finish the building, substantially, so far as to have the walls put up, and all stone, terra cotta, galvanized iron, etc., pertaining to the exterior work, done, and that the owners, when this much of the contract had been complied with, had paid to the contractor the sum of $10,000. This, we think, they were authorized to do; for, under the authority of the McAuliffe Case, supra, they were authorized to make partial payments in any manner they desired, and could not be held liable if such partial payments did not exceed 75 per cent. of the contract price. The statute did not contemplate that such payments might not be made, nor did it, in any event, require that any sum should be retained in excess of 25 per cent. of the contract price. It can make no difference how and to what extent advancements were made to the contractor, so that, on final settlement, the owner had in his hands 25 per cent. of the amount which he agreed to pay for the construction of the building. This court, in the case of Royal v. McPhail, 97 Ga. 457, 25 S. E. 512, in construing the statute under consideration, ruled that no owner of real estate, who contracts for the erection thereon of any building, is, in any event, liable, in the aggregate, to material men, laborers, or others furnishing material, labor, or other thing for any of the purposes mentioned, for more than 25 per cent. of the contract price which said owner has agreed to pay his contractor for the building in question. So that, taking the sum of $14,200 as being the contract price which the defendants in error agreed to pay to Foote for the construction of the building, the owners, without violating the provisions of the statute, were at liberty to pay, as the work progressed, so much and any part of the contract price, as they saw fit, provided such payments did not aggregate more than 75 per cent. of such price; and, as a matter of law, it must be ruled that the defendants in error, in such payments, aggregating $10,000, did not exceed the limit prescribed.

But it is contended that, inasmuch as the building was in fact completed, under a fair construction of the statute, notwithstanding the contractor abandoned the work, the owners must be held liable for labor and material to the extent of 25 per cent. of the amount originally agreed to be paid. We do not think so. Necessarily, to a certain extent, at least, the contract for the erection of the house must be considered, in fixing the rights, respectively, of the owners and the material men. When the statute provided that the owner should be liable, to the extent of 25 per cent. of the contract price, to material men and laborers, it necessarily meant that he was liable when the contractor had performed the work which he agreed to do; for otherwise the statute would become an instrument of oppression, and a means of working gross injustice. The words are that he shall retain 25 per cent. of the contract price, and it meant that he should retain it from the contractor; that is, that he should not pay him over the full contract price, when? Necessarily, when the work had been finished and the contract has been executed according to its terms by the contractor, because the contract price did not become due until the work was completed. The compilers of the American and English Encyclopedia of Law (volume 15, 1st Ed., p. 51) declare that a subcontractor's remedy is limited in its extent by the terms of the original contract between the owner and contractor; citing Dunn v. Rankin, 27 Ohio St. 132; Miller v. Whitelaw, 28 Mo. App. 639. And Mr. Boisot, in his work on Mechanics' Liens (section 85), says, "Where a contractor abandons the work at a time when there is nothing due him according to the contract, and the building is not completed under the contract, the subcontractors and material men in the second degree have, according to the majority of the decisions, no liens," for which proposition he cites Beecher v. Schuback, 4 Misc. Rep. 54, 23 N. Y. Supp. 604; Larkin v. McMullin (N. Y. App.) 24 N. E. 447; Hollister v. Mott, 132 N. Y. 18, 29 N. E. 1108; Fenno v. Hannan, 57 Hun, 585, 10 N. Y. Supp. 408; Dingley v. Greene, 54 Cal. 335. It is expressly stipulated in the contract under consideration that if the contractor shall fail or neglect to supply a sufficiency of material or workmen, or cause any unreasonable neglect or suspension of the work, or fail or refuse to comply with any of the articles of this agreement, the owner shall have the right to enter upon and take possession of the premises, and provide material and workmen sufficient to finish the work, and the expenses of the same shall be deducted from the amount of the contract; and it seems that was exactly what was done in this case. Foote, the contractor, abandoned the work, and at the time he abandoned it there was, under the facts shown, no amount due him; and such abandonment was without the consent of the owners, who afterwards, under the contract, took possession and finished the building. It has been ruled that, where such a provision was incorporated in a contract, the failure of the contractor to complete the work does not prevent the lien of a subcontractor from attaching to the balance due after the owner's completion of the work, because in that case the building is in fact completed under the contract. See Blakeslee v. Fisher (Sup.) 21 N. Y. Supp. 217; Van Clief v. Van Vechten, 130 N. Y. 571, 29 N. E. 1017. Mr. Boisot, however, further, in section 65, says that in such case the cost of completing the work is to be deducted from the contract price, in order to ascertain the amount up to which the subcontractors may claim liens, and if such deductions, together with payments previously made to the contractor, equal or exceed the entire contract price, then, of course, the subcontractors and material men have no lien, since there is nothing due under the contract; citing Ferguson v. Burk, 4 E. D. Smith, 760; Jewell v. Paron, 94 Mich. 83, 53 N. W. 951; Dudley v. Jones, 77 Tex. 69, 14 S. W. 335.

Taking, then, the allegations in the petition, and construing the contract according to the intention of the parties, and giving to the statute a fair construction, we must rule that no error was committed by the trial judge in sustaining the demurrer to the petition. In such a case the material man must be remitted to his remedy against the contractor with whom he originally dealt. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring, except FISH, J., dissenting.

FISH, J. (dissenting). Prior to the repeal of sections 2802 and 2803 of the Civil Code, one who gave out a contract for the construction of a building, and who failed to retain 25 per cent. of the contract price thereof until the contractor should submit to him an affidavit that all debts incurred for material in the construction of the building had been paid, or that the persons to whom the debts for material were owed had consented to the payment of such per cent., was liable, to the extent of 25 per cent. of the contract price, to a material man for material furnished to the contractor in constructing the building, although the contract contained a stipulation to the effect that, when the building should have progressed to a certain stage towards completion, the owner might suspend further work thereon, and, should he elect so to do, then a stated sum should be the compensation of the contractor for the work done and material furnished up to that time, and notwithstanding the fact that, when the work of construction had reached the stage mentioned, the contractor abandoned it without the consent of the owner

MILLS v. GEER et al.

EJECTMENT—IMPROVEMENTS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—MESNE PROFITS—SET-OFF—GUARDIAN—SALE OF WARD'S LAND.

1. Under the act of December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, pp. 79–81), in a suit to recover land, the defendant, who has bona fide possession of such land under adverse claim of title, may plead as a set-off the value of all permanent improvements bona fide placed thereon by himself, or other bona fide claimants under whom he asserts title, notwithstanding such improvements may have been made before the passage of the act. In case the legal title is found to be in the plaintiff, and it should further be found that the value of such improvements at the time of the trial exceeds the mesne profits, while plaintiff is entitled to a verdict in his favor for the land, the defendant is also entitled to a recovery for the amount of excess of the value of such improvements over the mesne profits. The act, thus applied, is not unconstitutional on account of being retroactive or ex post facto, or on account of its interfering with any vested right of the owner of the land.

2. Where plaintiffs in such an action have been in possession of or enjoyed the rents, issues, and profits from lands of the defendant, which they had received in lieu of the lands involved in the suit, the latter has a right to plead such benefits derived by plaintiffs as a set-off to their claim for mesne profits against him.

3. Prior to the act of 1889, embodied in Civ. Code, § 2545, a judge of the superior court had no authority to pass an order in vacation authorizing a guardian to sell or exchange the lands of his ward for reinvestment; and a deed made by the guardian, in pursuance of such an order, to a purchaser, was void.

4. A defendant in an action for the recovery of land, who claims credit for improvements made by his predecessor, is likewise liable for all mesne profits chargeable to such predecessor; otherwise, if the defendant claims credit only for such improvements as he himself placed upon the land since his possession.

Lumpkin, P. J., dissenting from ruling announced in first headnote.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Calhoun county; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by Claud W. and Steven B. Geer against Elijah Mills. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. J. Beck and W. C. Worrill, for plaintiff in error. R. H. Powell & Son, for defendants in error.

LEWIS, J. Claud W. and Steven B. Geer brought complaint for land in Calhoun superior court against Elijah Mills. The tract involved in the suit was 107¾ acres, known as the "Geer Home Place," and plaintiffs claimed a one-half undivided interest therein as heirs at law of P. F. and L. M. Geer. Suit was for the recovery of this interest, and mesne profits of the land, alleged to be of the yearly value of $400. To this petition the defendant filed an answer, the important portions of which are embodied in amendments, in substance, as follows: On August 19, 1886, R. R. Blocker, as guardian of plaintiffs and their four brothers (it seems, he was duly appointed guardian after the death of their parents), presented to Hon. B. B. Bower, judge of the superior courts of the Albany circuit, his petition asking leave to exchange certain lands in Calhoun county, Ga., embracing the land sued for in this case, belonging to his wards, and in his possession and control as such guardian, for certain lands in Early county, Ga., owned by A. S. Mills. Upon the hearing of this application, on September 14, 1886, the judge granted an order authorizing the exchange prayed for. It seems, this order was granted in vacation. On September 20, 1886, a conveyance was made by said guardian, by virtue of the order granted by the judge, of certain tracts of land, among which was the one involved in this suit. In pursuance of the same order, A. S. Mills on the same date conveyed to the guardian, for the use of his wards, certain lands in Early county, Ga., amounting to about 500 acres. After the execution of the deeds, A. S. Mills went into the possession of the lands conveyed to him; and Blocker, guardian for plaintiffs and his other wards, took possession of the lands in Early county conveyed to him by Mills, and held possession of the same for the use and benefit of his wards until he died, and during that time received and used the rents, profits, and income from the lands for the use and benefit of plaintiffs and the other wards. After the appointment of the guardian, two of the wards (Walter and Ralph Geer) died, which left but four remaining heirs of the estate. These, including plaintiffs, continued in possession of all the lands in Early county conveyed by Mills to Blocker, their guardian, for some time. Two of them (Charles and Willie) after becoming of age sold and transferred their interest in the lands in Early county to certain purchasers. A. S. Mills conveyed the land involved in this suit to the defendant, Elijah Mills, executing to him a warranty deed to the same, and put him in possession thereof. The lands conveyed by Mills to the guardian for the benefit of his wards are alleged in the answer to have been of more value than the lands conveyed by the guardian to Mills; that the defendant had paid the purchaser from the guardian full value of the land in controversy; that this purchaser, A. S. Mills, accepted the conveyance from the guardian in good faith, believing he was getting a good title thereto, and defendant purchased the land in dispute in the best of faith, believing he was getting the best of title thereto. After A. S. Mills got the land in Calhoun county, he made large and valuable improvements thereon, and enhanced its value in the sum of $1,000, and defendant made on it, since his purchase, improvements of the value of $300, so that the land embraced in the suit was by these improvements enhanced in value to the aggregate amount of $1,300. The land in Early county conveyed to the guardian for his wards was in good condition for cultivation at the time of the conveyance,—woodland, well timbered, and timber valuable; 250 to 300 acres in good condition for cultivation. It had on it a comfortable dwelling, good tenant house, a good crib and stables, and a gin house, and was worth for rent at the time it was delivered to the guardian $250 to $300 per year. After the conveyance to Mills, and especially since the death of the guardian, this land had been greatly neglected; the buildings and improvements had not been kept in repair; gin house and other buildings torn down and removed, and those remaining allowed by neglect to go to decay; a large part of the timber cut from the land and sold, plaintiffs and their two brothers having received the benefits of such sale. Plaintiffs, before filing their suit, never made any offer to A. S. Mills to restore to him the possession of his said lands, but continued to hold the same, that it was their purpose not only to try to recover from defendant the land sued for, but also to try to hold the land that was conveyed by said A. S. Mills to their guardian. By reason of the sale of a large part of the lands conveyed by Mills to Blocker, guardian, in trust for plaintiffs and their brothers, it was charged that plaintiffs could not restore Mills to his former position. Attached to the answer was an itemized statement of improvements placed by the defendant and his predecessor in title on the land conveyed to Mills by the guardian. The answer prayed, first, that the sale and conveyance of the land sued for by Blocker, guardian, to the plaintiffs and their brothers, be confirmed, and plaintiffs be enjoined from prosecuting suit against the defendant, Elijah Mills, or from recovering said land; that, should it be held that plaintiffs have a right to recover, they first be required to account for the rents and profits from said lands in Early county conveyed by A. S. Mills to the guardian, and also that they be first required to pay to defendant the value of the improvements made upon the land sued for. Then follows a prayer for general relief. Plaintiffs below demurred to the above amended plea of the defendant upon general grounds, and this demurrer was sustained by the court, except as to the twelfth paragraph of the plea, reciting the fact that before filing the suit plaintiffs had made no offer to restore to A. S. Mills possession of his lands deeded by him to their guardian; and the court also struck the second prayer of the plea, in so far as it prayed that the value of improvements made by defendant in excess of the mesne profits be made a charge against the premises in dispute in the event it should be determined that plaintiffs had title to the land sued for. To this judgment of the court the defendant duly filed his exceptions pendente lite, and assigns error thereon in his bill of exceptions. The case then proceeded to trial before a jury, and they returned a verdict for the plaintiffs for the land in dispute, and for the sum of $93.75, rents and mesne profits therefrom. Defendant moved for a new trial, and assigns error on the judgment of the court overruling the same, on each and every ground.

1. There can be no question but that the act of December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, pp. 79–81), was intended to apply not only to improvements that might thereafter be erected upon land by bona fide purchasers thereof, but also to all such improvements of the character contemplated by the act which might have been erected by such defendant, or those under whom he claims, prior to its passage. In fact, the very first section of the act refers in express words to "all cases where an action has been brought for the recovery of land." Its terms, therefore, were applicable not only to suits for the recovery of land thereafter brought, but also to such suits as were pending in court at the time of the passage of the act, and necessarily referred to past as well as future improvements. In the case we are now considering, however, the suit was brought after the passage of the act, and hence it is unnecessary to discuss what would have been the effect had the suit been pending at the time of the passage of the act. While some courts seem to have made distinctions in this particular, we must confess that we can see no difference in principle whether it was pending when the act was passed, or brought soon after its passage. The main question is whether the act is unconstitutional on account of its being an ex post facto or retroactive law. There is no question about the act being retroactive in its effect, and it may be contended that it is violative of article 1, par. 2, § 3, of the constitution of Georgia, embodied in Civ. Code, § 5730; and especially to that provision therein prohibiting the passage of retroactive laws. It cannot be said, however, on account of this provision in the constitution, that the general assembly of Georgia is utterly powerless to enact any valid retrospective legislation. Under repeated rulings of this court, made since the adoption of the constitution of 1877, and having direct reference to this provision in that constitution, validity has been given to legislation retroactive in its effect. We deem it important in this connection only to cite the case of Pritchard v. Railroad Co., 87 Ga. 294, 13 S. E. 493, 14 L. R. A. 721, where it was held that: "An action against a railroad company for personal injuries, pending when the act of November 12, 1889, amending section 2967 of the Code, was passed, was not abated by the death of the plaintiff; nor is that act, as applicable to actions pending at the time of its passage, unconstitutional." Justice Lumpkin, in his opinion in that case, on page 297, 87 Ga., page 494, 13 S. E., and page 723, 14 L. R. A., says: "The constitution of 1865 forbade the passage of 'retroactive laws, injuriously affecting any right of the citizen.' No provision against retroactive legislation appears in the constitution of 1868. That of 1877 forbids the passage of a 'retroactive law.' Construing together the above constitutional provisions in connection with the section of the Code cited, we take it that they all amount to substantially the same thing, and mean that retroactive laws which do not injuriously affect any right of the citizen (that is to say, laws curing defects in the remedy, or confirming rights already existing, or adding to the means of securing and enforcing the same) may be passed." Sustaining the views of the court in that case, Justice Lumpkin cites a number of authorities. It is not an open question, therefore, in this court, as to what is really meant by the constitutional inhibition against retroactive laws in Georgia. That instrument simply strikes at such retrospective legislation as injuriously affects some substantial right of the citizen. Bacon v. Mayor, etc., 105 Ga. 62, 31 S. E. 127.

But it is contended by counsel for defendants in error that the act of December 21, 1897 (Acts 1897, pp. 79–81), in so far as it applies to pre-existing causes of action, is invalid. It is insisted that plaintiffs' right to recover mesne profits with the land, and their rights to recover the land, without further offset on account of improvements than the extent of mesne profits, were at the time of the passage of the act vested rights. The controlling question, then, in this case, is whether the act in question deprives the plaintiffs seeking to recover land on a perfect title of any vested or substantial right by the defense therein allowed the defendant touching improvements placed by him or his predecessors in title, in good faith, upon the land. To determine this question, we will, in this connection, notice what provision the act makes. The first section of the act declares that, "in all cases where an action has been brought for the recovery of land, the defendant who has bona fide possession of such land under adverse claim of title may set off the value of all permanent improvements bona fide placed thereon by himself or other bona fide claimants under whom he claims, and in case the legal title to the land is found to be in the plaintiff, if the value of such improvements at the time of the trial exceeds the mesne profits, the jury may render a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the land and in favor of the defendant for the amount of the excess of the value of said improvements over the mesne profits." The act then goes on to provide that the verdict shall also find the value of the land itself at the time of the trial, and gives the plaintiff the right to recover the premises by paying the defendant the excess of the value of the improvements over the mesne profits, and, in the event that he fails to do so within the time fixed by the court, the defendant shall have the right to pay the plaintiff the value of the land and the mesne profits found by the jury. The act further provides other equitable and just remedies to guard against any wrong to either party, and, among them, a commissioner may be appointed by the court, and the proceeds of the sale of the land may be divided between plaintiff and defendant in the ratio that the value of the land bears to the excess in value of the improvements over the mesne profits. We simply recite some of these provisions of the act, with a view of showing in this connection its general scope and purpose. There can be no question, from reading and studying the entire act, that the purpose of the legislature was to do equal and exact justice between the parties in all cases contemplated by the provisions of the act. Now, what right of the owner of land is there that can be devested by enforcing the provisions of this law? It is a matter that may be regarded now as almost an elementary principle, in the construction of constitutional law upon the subject of retroactive legislation, that it does not refer to those remedies adopted by a legislative body for the purpose of providing a rule to secure for its citizens the enjoyment of some natural right, equitable and just in itself, but which they were not able to enforce on account of defects in the law, or its omission to provide the relief necessary to secure such right. It is true that this opens a broad field for the exercise of judicial discretion and power, for many cases may arise in which there is no positive written rule from the lawmaking power that can give the court any substantial aid in arriving at a just conclusion. But this is unavoidable. It is obliged to happen, in some instances, that in construing constitutional provisions, expressed in general terms, touching the rights of the citizen, there is no criterion to go by, except a natural sense of right and justice, and no relief can be had to redress a wong or to enforce a right, save to appeal to the enlightened conscience of an impartial judiciary. Courts cannot be too cautious to see that ex post facto or retroactive laws shall not devest any citizen of a real right, and they should be equally as cautious in declaring an act of the general assembly null and void when it seeks to redress a wrong, and to apply the remedy it presents not only to future, but to past, transactions. The relief provided by the act of 1897 was for those who held property in good faith, honestly believing that they had acquired a good title thereto, and who, upon the faith of such belief, had spent their money and labor in improving the property. Prior to the act of 1897, for want of remedial legislation in this particular, an innocent person might purchase a vacant piece of property, of scarcely any appreciable value, place thereon permanent and substantial improvements, enhancing its value a thousand fold,—yea, he might spend thereon his time and labor and means, and even the accumulated fortune of a lifetime in such improvements,—and yet the owner, who had delayed asserting his rights until the property had thus been enhanced in value, could reap the fortune placed upon it, and turn the purchaser out a pauper. Neither equity nor natural justice can recognize such a right in one to reap the reward of the labor, services, and fortune of another without paying therefor any compensation whatever. It would be revolting to educated reason and shocking to an enlightened conscience. We may have stated above an extreme case, but, in a sense, they are extreme cases to which the act was intended to apply. We are aware of nothing in the decisions of this court, or in the judicial opinions of any of its members, from which can be even inferred a denial of such a natural equity as that which this act of 1897 undertakes to protect.

For years the decisions of this court touching the right of a bona fide claimant to land, who did not have the legal title thereto, for compensation on account of valuable, permanent, and substantial improvements he had placed thereon, seemed to waver in the balance, not upon the idea of any want of such natural equity or of any natural right the owner had in such a case to take the improvements without paying for them, but upon the idea of a want of any remedy provided by the law for a defendant to recover for such improvements in ordinary suits at law for land. Finally, in the case of Dudley v. Johnson, 102 Ga. 1, 29 S. E. 50, the question was clearly and definitely settled by this court. It was there decided that: "Neither in an action of ejectment nor in complaint for land can a defendant set off the value of improvements placed thereon by him, to an amount beyond the sum which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover by way of mesne profits; nor can a defendant in such a case, upon an equitable answer, recover against a plaintiff the value of improvements in good faith placed upon the premises by such defendant, and have the same, by equitable decree against the owner, made a charge upon the premises on which they are placed, and from which the defendant is evicted under a judgment rendered against him in such suit." There is no intimation, either in the decision or in the opinion of that case, against the natural equities of the defendant under the circumstances, nor is there any intimation that, if the action had been a proceeding in equity by the plaintiff, the defendant might not, under equitable principles, have obtained the relief sought. As Justice Atkinson says in the opinion on page 5, 102 Ga., and page 51, 29 S. E.: "The plaintiffs were not seeking the aid of a court of equity, but sued upon their strictly legal rights. They were, therefore, not required, upon equitable principles to make any concession to the defendants." On page 8, 102 Ga., and page 53, 29 S. E., at the conclusion of the opinion, he says: "The general assembly, by making provision upon this subject, will be presumed to have settled the policy of the state with respect to the allowance for improvements; and it should be left to the wisdom and discretion of that body to say whether rights, in addition to those stated in the sections of the Code above referred to, should be conferred upon persons who enter, whether in good or bad faith, upon the property of another, and make valuable improvements thereon." Upon this suggestion it would seem that the legislature has acted by the passage of the act of 1897; and we are now to determine whether we will give that act validity and force according to the true legislative intent when it was passed. An early case on this subject, touching the relative rights of the owner and tenant in relation to improvements put by the latter upon the premises, is the case of Bright v. Boyd, 1 Story, 478, Fed. Cas. No. 1,875. As that case has been relied on and cited to a considerable extent by courts of last resort in various states of the Union, we will be justified in quoting to some extent from the learned opinion of Justice Story therein. On page 494, 1 Story, he says: "The other question, as to the right of the purchaser, bona fide and for a valuable consideration, to compensation for permanent improvements made upon the estate, which have greatly enhanced its value under a title which turns out defective, he having no notice of the defect, is one upon which, looking to the authorities, I should be inclined to pause. Upon the general principle of courts of equity, acting ex æquo et bono, I own that there does not seem to me any just ground to doubt that compensation, under such circumstances, ought to be allowed to the full amount of the enhanced value, upon the maxim of the common law, 'Nemo debet locupletari ex alterius incommodo.'" Again, on page 495, seeming to recognize that there was no direct authority upon the subject, he says: "Now, if there be no authority against the doctrine, I confess that I should be most reluctant to be the first judge to lead to such a decision. It appears to me, speaking with all deference to other opinions, that the denial of all compensation to such a bona fide purchaser in such a case, where he has manifestly added to the permanent value of an estate by his meliorations and improvements, without the slightest suspicion of any infirmity in his own title, is contrary to the first principles of equity. Take the case of a vacant lot in a city, where a bona fide purchaser builds a house thereon, enhancing the value of the estate to ten times the original value of the land, under a title apparently perfect and complete; is it reasonable or just that in such a case the true owner should recover and possess the whole, without any compensation whatever to the bona fide purchaser? To me it seems manifestly unjust and inequitable thus to appropriate to one man the property and money of another, who is in no default. The argument, I am aware, is that the moment the house is built it belongs to the owner of the land, by mere operation of law, and that he may certainly possess and enjoy his own. But this is merely stating the technical rule of law by which the true owner seeks to hold what, in a just sense, he never had the slightest title to; that is, the house. It is not answering the objection, but merely and dryly stating that the law so holds. But then, admitting this to be so, does it not furnish a strong ground why equity should interpose and grant relief? I have ventured to suggest that the claim of the bona fide purchaser, under such circumstances, is founded in equity. I think it founded in the highest equity, and in this view of the matter I am supported by the positive dictates of the Roman law. The passage already cited shows it to be founded in the clearest natural equity. 'Jure naturæ æquum est.'" The writer goes on, in his learned opinion, to state that it was a grave mistake, sometimes made, that the Roman law merely confined its equity or remedial justice on this subject to a mere reduction from the amount of the rents and profits of the land; and he further states that the like principle has been embodied into the law of the modern nations which have derived their jurisprudence from the Roman law, and it was "recognized in France, and enforced by Pothier, with his accustomed strong sense of equity and general justice and urgent reasoning," and that it was also recognized in the law of Scotland. The supreme court of Missouri, in treating of the justice and validity of such laws, uses the following language, by Brace, J., in the case of Stump v. Hornback, 94 Mo. 80, 6 S. W. 358: "The object was not to deprive him [the owner] of his land, with or without his consent, or the possession of it, but simply to withhold the possession until he paid the occupying claimant the value such claimant had added to the land by his improvements. The law said to the owner: 'You have sought the assistance of the law to enable you to recover your land from another, who in good faith believed it was his, and in such faith has enhanced the value of your property. Now you shall have possession of it, but not until you yourself have done "that justice which the law loveth," and paid that enhanced value to him who hath earned it.'"

In the case of Saunders v. Wilson, 19 Tex. 194, it was decided that a statute of that state "which secures to possessors of real property, in good faith, reimbursement from the true owner for permanent and valuable improvements made on the property by the former, [is] consistent with equity and the civil law, and not inconsistent with the constitution." On page 196, in the opinion in that case, it is declared: "But the provision that a defendant, a possessor in good faith, through whose capital and toil the land has received a great accession in value, should receive full compensation for permanent and valuable improvements, is liable to no objection, either on constitutional grounds, or on those of sound policy or fair and honest dealing between man and man." On page 199 it is observed that this doctrine of reimbursement by the owner for expense of improvements made by the possessor in good faith "was recognized in Roman jurisprudence, the great fountain of most of the modern law of the civilized world; that it is sanctioned to a great extent in equity, and, in the opinion of Justice Story, should go the whole length of the remedial justice administered under our statute." See same subject thoroughly and ably discussed in Ross v. Irving, 14 Ill. 171, 177; Griswold v. Bragg, 48 Conn. 577–581. In the case of Pacquette v. Pickness, 19 Wis. 219, the constitutionality of a similar act of the legislature of that state was called in question. One ground of the attack made upon the act was that it was in conflict with section 10, art. 1, of the constitution of the United States, which, among other things, declares that no state shall pass any ex post facto law, and that it was also contrary to a provision in the constitution of the state of Wisconsin. Downer, J., in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, on page 222, says: "We are of opinion that the 'Improvement Act,' so called, is constitutional. It is based upon the broad principles of equity, and, if properly administered, will give to each party his rights. Similar acts have been in force in many of the states for more than half a century, and have been so uniformly held constitutional that we consider ourselves bound by the great weight of authority in their favor." In the case of Whitney v. Richardson, 31 Vt. 300–310, it appeared that a betterment act in that state which related to compensation for improvements placed in good faith upon land restricted its operation to those who entered before the passage of the act. That was a suit for betterments upon lands recovered by the defendants of the plaintiff in a previous action of ejectment. It appeared that at the time of the plaintiff's entry the existing act could not apply to him, on account of the restriction above referred to, and it was contended that he could not, therefore, avail himself of its benefits by virtue of the fact that the restriction had been removed after his entry. It was decided in that case that, though no law allowing a recovery for betterments existed at the time of his entry, yet the acts passed subsequently gave him a right to such recovery. There was an act in force in Massachusetts that provided, among other things, that "where any action has been or may be commenced for the recovery of lands, which the tenant holds by virtue of a possession and improvement, and of which he, or those under whom he claims, have had the actual possession for six years or more, the jury, at the request of the tenant, shall find the value of the improvements, and also, upon the requisition of the defendant, shall find the value of the tenements, if they have not been improved." The act in its other portions has provisions very similar to our act of 1897 touching the compensation of the defendant for such improvements. It will be observed that that act by its terms applied to any action, not only including suits thereafter to be brought, but such as were pending at the time of the passage of the act. The validity of that act was sustained in the case of Bacon v. Callender, 6 Mass. 303. For the terms of the act, see page 306. On page 308 of that volume the court says: "The demandant has not contested the constitutionality of this statute, so far as may affect actions sued after its passage, but denies it as affecting actions pending at that time. We see no ground for this distinction, and if it were competent for the legislature to make these provisions, to affect actions after to be commenced, the same provisions might apply with equal authority to actions then pending." Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, devotes considerable space to a discussion of this identical question. On page 475 he says: "But cases may sometimes present themselves in which improvements actually made by one man upon the land of another, even though against the will of the owner, ought, on grounds of strict equity, to constitute a charge upon the land improved. If they have been made in good faith, and under reasonable expectation on the part of the person making them that he was to reap the benefit of them, and if the owner has stood by and suffered them to be made, but afterwards has recovered the land and appropriated the improvements, it would seem that there must exist against him at least a strong equitable claim for reimbursement of the expenditures, and perhaps no sufficient reason why provision should not be made by law for their recovery." After a review of some of the decisions bearing upon the subject, the learned author reaches the following conclusion (page 478: "Betterment laws, then, recognize the existence of an equitable right, and give a remedy for its enforcement where none had existed before. It is true that they make a man pay for improvements which he has not directed to be made, but this legislation presents no feature of officious interference by the government with private property. The improvements have been made by one person in good faith, and are now to be appropriated by another. The parties cannot be placed in statu quo, and the statute accomplishes justice, as nearly as the circumstances of the case will admit, when it compels the owner of the land, who, if he declines to sell, must necessarily appropriate the betterments made by another, to pay the value to the person at whose expense they have been made. The case is peculiar, but a statute cannot be void, as an unconstitutional interference with private property, which adjusts the equities of the parties as nearly as possible according to natural justice."

A number of authorities bearing upon this subject and trending in the same direction might be cited, for we have by no means above undertaken to exhaust authority on the subject. It is true that in all the cases cited the rules of law touching retroactive legislation are not involved, but all the authorities are directly in point on the proposition that the act of the general assembly under consideration does not affect any vested or substantial right of the owner of property, is not an interference with private property, and is remedial in its nature, for the purpose of enforcing natural right and equity; and under the construction of this court as to what is meant by "retroactive legislation," in our constitution, we think it clearly follows, both from reason and authority, that the act of 1897 does not fall within any inhibition prescribed by the organic law of this state. In some of the cases cited it will be seen that betterment acts similar to the Georgia law of 1897 have been considered and held valid, notwithstanding constitutional provisions touching retrospective or ex post facto laws, and have been held not to be unconstitutional because made applicable to suits pending at the time of their passage. In other cases cited that question is not directly involved. For instance, in Texas, it seems the act under consideration had been in force many years before the pendency of that suit. But it does not follow that even these authorities are not in point, though the states in which the decisions were rendered should have no constitutional inhibition against retroactive legislation; for, if the principle decided by those courts is correct, then the character of legislation we are now considering does not affect any right of the owner of land. If this be true, then, under previous decisions of this court, the act in question is not in any manner retroactive, in the constitutional sense of that word. It impairs the obligation of no contract. It destroys no vested right. It is not an unauthorized interference with private property. It seeks to do right and to prevent wrong. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the plaintiff in error is entitled to go before the jury on the question of the value of improvements placed upon the land by himself and predecessor in title, and that he is entitled to a verdict at least to the amount that such permanent improvements had really enhanced the value of the land. Should the jury find that this amount exceeds the mesne profits, then it would be their duty to find a verdict in favor of the defendant for the amount of such excess. If the pleadings of plaintiff in error in this case be true, not to apply above rule would be a peculiar hardship and injustice to him, and an unconscionable advantage to the other parties; for, after greatly deteriorating in value the land received, they purpose now to give it up, and take such land, greatly enhanced in value by permanent improvements, without contributing one cent for such increase in worth.

2. A part of the answer that seems to have been stricken by the order of the court in sustaining the demurrer related to the rents, issues, and profits realized by the plaintiffs from the lands they had acquired in lieu of the land sued for in this case; and it was prayed in the answer that, should it be held the plaintiffs had a right to recover, they should first be required to account for the rents and profits from the land in Early county, as well as for the value of the improvements upon the land in suit. We think there was error in sustaining the demurrer, also, to this portion of the answer. Whatever benefits the plaintiffs derived from the land exchanged for that involved in this suit, either though their guardian, or by themselves after his death, would clearly be a proper subject-matter of set-off against the rents and mesne profits which they claim in the land sued for, whether the profits they derived from the Mills land were rents, or proceeds of the sales of timber or turpentine upon the place. This right of the defendant would seem to be the more patent, if, as a result of their profits in timber, etc., a serious diminution in the value of the land had been caused. Much of the answer gives a detailed history of how the defendant acquired title to the premises in dispute. This is not improper in an answer in such a case, for the reason that it might throw light upon the bona fides of his possession and claim of title, and tend to show that he was in such a position as to claim the improvements under the act of 1897. We therefore think the demurrer should not have been sustained as to any of these allegations. That portion of the answer, however, asking for a confirmation of the conveyance made by plaintiffs' guardian to A. S. Mills, and the conveyance made by him to the guardian, was properly stricken, for the reasons which we will hereinafter assign. The above disposes of the questions raised by the exceptions filed pendente lite to the judgment of the court sustaining the demurrer to defendant's answer, and also disposes of some of the grounds in the motion for a new trial.

3. It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that the title under which he claims the land sued for originated from an exchange of lands between his grantor and the guardian of defendants in error, made in pursuance of an order of the judge of the superior court authorizing the exchange, and that it was rather in the nature of an investment than a sale of the ward's property. It is further contended that at the time this order was granted the judge of the superior court had authority to authorize guardians to invest the funds of their wards in land, and to pass upon applications for such purpose either in term time or vacation. Civ. Code, § 3432, is cited as authority for this position. It provides: "Guardians, trustees, executors and administrators are authorized to invest any funds held by them as such guardians, trustees, executors and administrators, in lands: provided, an order to that effect be first obtained from the judge of the superior court who is authorized to consider and pass upon such applications, either in term time or vacation." Civ. Code, § 3180, which relates to investments by a trustee holding trust funds in stocks, bonds, or other securities issued by this state, is also cited. This section provides: "Any other investments of trust funds must be made under an order of the superior court, either in term, or granted by the judge in vacation, or else at the risk of the trustee." It is true, these sections of the Code were the law of this state before the guardian obtained his order to sell or exchange lands of his ward for the lands embraced in this suit. For the same sections, see Code 1882, §§ 2330, 2541, which are copied in the present Code. It appears in the record that, in the petition to the judge of the superior court to obtain this order, the guardian applied for a guardian ad litem to be appointed for the wards; that such a guardian was appointed, accepted the appointment, was directed to investigate and see if it was to the interest of the wards that the exchange should be made; and that he made a report thereon indorsing the same. While there is some force in the contention of counsel in claiming that this was not a sale, strictly speaking, of the wards' property, but was rather in the nature of an investment, as a matter of law, we do not think that either section applies to a case of this character. The sections relate to an investment of funds in the hands of guardians, etc., and do not, by their terms, have any reference to exchanging real estate belonging to minors for other realty. Such a disposition of property of minors is as much a sale thereof as it would be to convey the same for money to be invested in other land; the only difference being that in one case money is paid to the ward for land, and in the other case land is paid for land. But we do not think this an open question in this court. In Pughsley v. Pughsley, 75 Ga. 95, it appears that land was conveyed in fee simple to a woman and her children. It was held that upon application of the woman for herself and minor children, and upon the appointment of a guardian ad litem, the chancellor could not pass an order at chambers authorizing the sale of the land and reinvestment of the fund; that the decree in vacation ordering the sale was void, and the title of the children was not devested thereby. See, also, Rogers v. Pace, 75 Ga. 436–438, where it was decided, "The judges of the superior courts of this state can do no act nor grant any decree in vacation unless it be authorized by statute." In the case of McDonald v. McCall, 91 Ga. 304, 18 S. E. 157, it appears that a devise was made in 1858 to a named person and to a married granddaughter of testatrix; the share going to the granddaughter to be held by the husband in trust for her for life, and at her death to be divided between her children. It was decided in that case that a conveyance made by the trustee in 1860 under an order of the chancellor granted in vacation passed no title, save as to the life estate of the granddaughter, and would be no obstacle to a recovery of the premises by her children after her death. In Crawford v. Broomhead, 97 Ga. 614, 25 S. E. 487, it was decided, "Prior to the passage of the act of November 11, 1889, relating to sales of the estates of wards for reinvestment, * * * the ordinary had jurisdiction and authority to grant to a guardian of a minor child an order authorizing the guardian to sell unproductive real estate belonging to the ward, for the purpose of reinvesting the proceeds of the sale in other and productive property." Chief Justice Simmons, in his opinion, on page 617, 97 Ga., and page 489, 25 S. E., advances the idea that prior to the passage of the act of 1889 the power of authorizing the sale or disposition of a ward's real estate for the purpose of reinvestment was in the ordinary, exclusively; that applications for the sale of property of wards were uniformly made to the ordinary, and passed upon by him. He states: "By the act of 1889 the legislature, in its wisdom, took away from the ordinary the power to grant orders for the sale of the property of wards for this purpose, and conferred it upon the judges of the superior courts; being, doubtless, of the opinion that the latter would exercise better judgment and discretion than had been exercised by some of the ordinaries in regard to this matter. Whatever may have been the reason, it is clear that this power now rests exclusively in the judges of the superior courts, and it is also clear to our minds that prior to the act of 1889 the power was vested in the ordinaries." It is argued by counsel for plaintiff in error that the plaintiffs below were not in a position to repudiate the exchange of lands in this case that took place under the order of court; for the reason that they cannot put him in his former position as to the ownership of the land conveyed to their guardian, as two of plaintiffs' brothers have disposed of their interest in the lands to other parties. This cannot affect the rights of these plaintiffs, for it is not charged that they ever made any disposition of their interest for which they are suing in this action. It is unquestionably true that they, though minors, could not continue to hold their interest in the land purchased by their guardian from Mills, and at the same time recover their interest in the estate unlawfully sold by the guardian to Mills. It is also true that the possession, use, and enjoyment of the property, bought by their guardian from Mills under the order of court, by these wards, after they arrived at age, could be construed into a ratification of the contract of exchange. But, under the record, these do not seem to be important questions to consider. While they were set up in the answer of the defendant below, yet it appears from the record that when the judge entered up judgment upon the verdict of the jury he recited therein that plaintiffs expressly disclaimed any intention to hold the lands in Early county deeded by A. S. Mills to R. R. Blocker, guardian, in 1886, and he ordered that that conveyance be canceled. We do not mean to say, however, that if, before this trial, either of the plaintiffs, after arriving of age, had gone into possession of this land, and used the same, or enjoyed the rents, issues, and profits therefrom, the jury could not have construed this into such a ratification of the exchange made by the guardian and Mills as would bind that plaintiff and prevent his recovery in this case.

4. One ground of complaint made in the motion for a new trial is that the court erred in charging the jury as follows: "Consider all the evidence in the case, both for the plaintiffs and defendant, and determine what would be a fair market value for the rents of that place from the time the defendant and his father, or from the time that A. S. Mills, went into possession of it. Determine what would be a fair average rental per year from the time they were actually in possession of the land,—occupied and used it." It is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error that that charge was erroneous, as defendant could be made chargeable with mesne profits only for such time as he held possession. This would be true if the defendant was claiming compensation only for such improvements as he placed upon the premises; for, as decided in Gardner v. Grannis, 57 Ga. 540: "A defendant in ejectment is not liable for mesne profits taken, prior to his own entry, by those under whom he claims; but if, in accounting for the profits chargeable to himself, he claims credit for improvements made by his predecessors, such improvements must first answer for the profits taken by those who erected them." See, also, Willimgham v. Long, 47 Ga. 540, where it was held: "A defendant in ejectment who has in good faith claimed title to the premises may set off against the rents not only his own improvements, but he may claim, also, the value of the improvements of those under whom he claims, with warranty, in so far as said improvements exceed in value the rents for which said warrantors were liable." It seems, in the present case, this defendant not only in his answer claimed compensation for improvements he placed upon the land after he purchased, but also for improvements placed there by his grantor. We think he had a right to do so; for the presumption is that when he bought there was also estimated in the valuation of the land the improvements that had been placed thereon, and that he paid for them also; but if he seeks to recover for improvements erected by others, of course, they are liable to be reduced by the profits realized by those who erected them, as decided in the case above cited. We think, therefore, there was no error in the charge of the court excepted to in the tenth ground of the amended motion for a new trial.

There are several grounds in the motion relating to newly-discovered evidence, which, of course, are unnecessary for us to consider, as the case goes back for a new trial, and the parties will have ample opportunity of procuring this testimony at another hearing. The above, we think, covers all the questions in the motion of any merit. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

LUMPKIN, P. J. I concur in the judgment of reversal because of the error dealt with in the second headnote, and in the corresponding division of the preceding opinion. I also assent to the propositions laid down in the third and fourth headnotes, but dissent from the ruling announced in the first headnote. In so far as the improvement act of 1897 undertakes to deal with the subject of compensating bona fide purchasers of realty whose titles fail for improvements made after its passage, it may be wise, beneficial, and constitutional. To this extent, and to this extent only, so far as I have been able to ascertain, do most of the authorities, including some of those cited by Mr. Justice Lewis, go. In so far as this act relates to improvements made before its passage, I cannot help regarding it as retroactive legislation injuriously affecting vested rights. It cannot be questioned that before the enactment of this statute the owner of land could recover it from one who had made improvements thereon in the honest belief that his title was good, without becoming liable to the defendant on account of such improvements, further than to submit to his right to set off the value thereof against the plaintiff's claim for mesne profits. That this was the settled law and policy of this state is left absolutely free from doubt by the decision of this court in Dudley v. Johnson, 102 Ga. 1, 29 S. E. 50. It was there distinctly and unequivocally held that: "Neither in an action of ejectment nor in complaint for land can a defendant set off the value of improvements placed thereon by him, to an amount beyond the sum which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover by way of mesne profits; nor can a defendant in such a case, upon an equitable answer, recover against a plaintiff the value of improvements in good faith placed upon the premises by such defendant, and have the same, by equitable decree against the owner, made a charge upon the premises on which they are placed, and from which the defendant is evicted under a judgment rendered against him in such suit." The ruling announced in the language just quoted would, but for the act of 1897, surely be decisive of the alleged right of the defendant to claim compensation for improvements "beyond the sum which the 'plaintiffs' would be entitled to recover by way of mesne profits." Indeed, with that act out of the way, it must be conceded that the point ruled on in the Dudley Case would be identically the same as that with which we are now dealing in the case before us. I cannot devest myself of the conviction that this act gives to defendants in actions for land a new cause of action,—one which they did not have before. It certainly gives them a right to recover of plaintiffs money which they could not have recovered but for the act. I say "recover," because allowing a set-off is, in substance, allowing a recovery. If subjecting one to a liability which could not previously be set up against him does not injuriously affect his rights, I am unable to see why it does not. This case belongs, I think, to an altogether different class from that of Pritchard v. Railroad Co., 87 Ga. 294, 13 S. E. 493, 14 L. R. A. 721. There it was held that a good existing right of action which would have abated upon the death of the plaintiff was saved by an act passed during the pendency of the suit, and that this act, even as applied to actions pending at the time of its passage, was not unconstitutional. The act under consideration in that case created no new cause of action. It merely kept alive good causes of action which would in certain contingencies have abated. The court, in effect, held that the defendant had no vested right to have a perfectly lawful demand against him destroyed, and an action therefor abated, merely by reason of the plaintiff's death before obtaining judgment. The act of 1889 discussed in that case was purely one relating to procedure, and I cited authorities to prove that "a law which merely alters the procedure may with perfect propriety be made applicable to past as well as future transactions." The act of 1897, as above stated, brought into existence a new class of demands, and provided for their enforcement. It went far beyond making mere changes in procedure and practice.

Want of time, arising from the great pressure of other official work, forbids that I should attempt to enter upon a more extended discussion of this very important question. I will therefore add nothing more, except to suggest that, in endeavoring to apply the "great principles of equity and natural justice" for the protection of purchasers who have made improvements on land not belonging to them, under the honest but mistaken belief that it did, there is danger of running contrary to these same great principles in permitting innocent defendants to "improve out of their property" plaintiffs equally innocent,—such, for example, as minors, who did not, by standing by and seeing the improvements made, or for any other reason, become, either in justice or equity, liable to such a loss.

RAGLAND v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—MANSLAUGHTER—SELF-DEFENSE.

1. It is not, without a request to do so, obligatory on the judge presiding in the trial of a criminal case to give in charge to the jury the law applicable to a theory of the defense raised alone by the statement of the accused. Yet, when a given charge is directed to a theory raised by the defendant's statement, it should fully and distinctly cover the theory so raised. (a) Whether an advance by one man armed with a stick on another in the nighttime, and declining to stop when called on to do so, constitute circumstances equivalent to an assault, so as to authorize a homicide to be reduced to voluntary manslaughter, is a question for the jury.

2. One may lawfully kill another who is attempting by violence or surprise to commit a felony on his person, and this is true whatever may be the grade of the attempted felony. It is therefore error, after correctly charging that a bare fear of the offense is not sufficient to justify the killing, but that it must appear that the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be committed on his person, and that the party killing really acted under the influence of these fears, and not in a spirit of revenge, for the judge to add, "So, to a person killing in his defense, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that in order to save his own life the killing of the other was absolutely necessary," etc. The language quoted is the law of justifiable homicide in cases of mutual combat only, and has no connection whatever with the law of homicide to prevent the commission of a felony on the person of the slayer.

Error from superior court, Clayton county; J. S. Candler, Judge.

John Ragland was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

John B. Hutcheson and John D. Humphries, for plaintiff in error. W. T. Kimsey, Sol. Gen., and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

LITTLE, J. Ragland was indicted for the murder of Blessett by shooting him with a pistol, which, it is alleged, was committed in the county of Clayton on February 1, 1900. The accused was convicted and sentenced to be hanged. He made a motion for a new trial on a number of grounds, which was overruled, and he excepted. Such portions of the evidence as are necessary to be referred to are stated in the opinion. The first three grounds are those usually found in motions for new trial under the practice which has grown up in this state,—that is, "that the verdict is contrary to evidence, and without evidence to support it; that the verdict is decidedly and strongly against the weight of the evidence; that it is contrary to law and the principles of justice and equity." When the first of these grounds appears in a motion, it seems that the insertion of the two latter are certainly unnecessary and could readily be omitted. These stereotyped grounds appear, without any good reason, in almost every motion for a new trial we are called on to consider. All others which seek to attack the verdict in a general way might well be omitted, without endangering the case of the plaintiff in error in this regard; and it may not be amiss, in this connection, to observe that, especially in a criminal case, a ground of the motion that a verdict "is contrary to the principles of justice and equity," is altogether superfluous. The justice which one charged with crime is entitled to invoke is the law of the land. He has no equity. His guilt or innocence must be determined by the evidence for and against him. So far as this record discloses, there was no eyewitness to the shooting which resulted in the death of Blessett; and as to what transpired at the time of the shooting the jury was left to determine from the statement made by the deceased after he was shot, and the statement and admissions of the accused. It appears from the testimony of the father of the deceased: That the younger members of his household had been out to a party that night, and had returned home, where he was. That about 1 o'clock the same night his deceased son came home and told him that he was shot. Witness sent for a physician. He had a conversation with his son before he went for the physician, and repeatedly during the week which he lived afterwards. The statement made in these conversations was that the accused shot deceased in the road, at or near a certain oak tree, as he was coming out of a gate; that the accused called to him and said, "Stop there," and in return he called, saying, "Hello, John;" that accused again said "Stop," and then shot him. The deceased further stated in his conversation to this witness that after he was shot he spoke to the accused, and the accused said to him, "God damn you! Why didn't you speak?" The tree and gate referred to in the statement of the deceased, the witness testified, were about 60 or 70 yards from his (the witness') house, and about 50 yards from Fannie McIntosh's house, in Clayton county. The statement made on his trial by the accused was to the effect that he was at a supper at a certain church; that the deceased and quite a number of other persons were there; that after the supper he went home with a girl named Fannie McIntosh; that after arriving at her house he pulled off his shoes and remained there some time; that he was induced to pull off his shoes by request of the McIntosh woman, she giving as a reason that deceased would speak about his presence at her house; that when he left he walked out of the house without his shoes, and, going down the steps on the west side of the house, he discovered a man in the corner of the chimney, about 15 feet from him; that he immediately called and asked who it was; that the person hailed did not speak, but walked directly towards him, and accused said that he again hailed him, and told the man walking towards him to stop and not come on him; that the man had a stick in his hand; that the accused walked back and called to him the third time, "If you don't stop, I will shoot you;" that he was going backwards at this time, and became entangled in the overhanging limb of a tree, and, not knowing the purpose of the advance on him, he shot "through fright and fear." Fannie McIntosh testified that the shooting did not occur where the accused said that it did; that she heard the report of a gun somewhere from 10 to 20 minutes after the accused left her house; that it was out towards the gate. Other evidence was introduced on the part of the state, which, because of the rulings we make on the charges of the court excepted to, it is not necessary should be set out in detail; and, as the plaintiff in error is to be tried again, we do not pass on the evidence.

1. It is alleged that the court, after charging the law of manslaughter as found in the Code, erred in giving the following charge: "In all cases where a homicide is proven, to reduce that homicide from murder to voluntary manslaughter there must be some actual assault upon the person killing; that is, there must be more than the mere walking towards the person. There must be some actual assault; that is, there must be some attack, some attempt to do a violent injury on the person of another. There must be some actual assault upon the person killing, or there must be an attempt by the person killed to commit a serious personal injury on the person killing, or other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion, and to exclude all idea of deliberation or malice, either express or implied." It is evident that the trial judge, in giving these instructions to the jury, had reference to the statement of the accused, when he used the words that "there must be more than the mere walking towards the person." We recognize the rule that, unless properly requested, a charge on the law raised alone by the statement of the prisoner is not obligatory on the part of the trial judge in giving instructions to the jury. In very many cases this should be done, and the present is, in our opinion, one of those cases, because the verdict was, in a great measure, to be based on the statements made by the deceased after he was shot, and the account that the accused gave of the facts of the homicide in his statement to the jury. Some of these statements of the deceased were at least of doubtful admissibility, either as dying declarations or as part of the res gestæ of the homicide, and at best the evidence as to the facts of the homicide consisted of statement against statement. While we have no disposition to criticise the rule above stated, yet, when the judge of his own motion undertakes to charge the law arising on a state of facts as given by the accused in his statement, the charge so given must be correct law, and applicable to the theory of the defense made by the accused in his statement. Under this view, it must be determined that the charge complained of was error, for the reasons:

First, it is not a sound legal proposition; second, it is not a correct application of the law to the theory of the defense raised by the statement. Under our Criminal Code (section 65), three different conditions are legally sufficient to authorize a jury to reduce a homicide from murder to voluntary manslaughter: If the deceased made an actual assault upon the accused, or if the deceased attempted to commit a serious personal injury on the accused, or when there are other equivalent circumstances to justify the excitement of passion, the grade of the homicide may be reduced to voluntary manslaughter. It will be noted that the instruction given was that there must be more than the mere walking towards the person, to reduce the homicide from murder to voluntary manslaughter. It is not necessary that there be some actual assault, some attack, some attempt to do a violent injury on the person killing, in order to reduce the offense. If there are other equivalent circumstances to justify the passion, the offense may be reduced. What these equivalent circumstances are is to be adjudged by the jury; and we apprehend that weight and significance would, or not, be attached to the fact of such walking towards the accused, according to the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time. For instance, if the jury were to believe that a rapid advance by one man, armed with a stick, upon another, indicated an intention to do the latter some serious bodily harm when he should have arrived at a point sufficiently near, they might well determine these circumstances to be the equivalent of an assault on the person being advanced upon. Certainly the jury would have been fully authorized, if they believed the statement of the accused, to find that the circumstances detailed were the equivalent of an assault, and indicated on the part of the person advancing an intention to commit a serious personal injury on the accused. The reference by the judge to the prisoner's statement, as set out in the motion, did not really present the defense outlined by him. The accused stated that in the darkness of the night he discovered a man within 15 feet of him, standing and (inferentially) waiting for his approach; that the person so waiting there advanced upon him with a stick, and would not stop when warned to do so. Such a state of facts would raise in the mind of a very reasonable man a belief that an attack was to be made upon him, and, when the person being advanced on shoots and kills the person advancing under these circumstances, a principle of law applies which is essentially distinct from that which is applicable where one shoots and kills another who is merely walking towards him. There may not be one word of truth in the statement. Whether there is not, we are not called on to say, but the point is that, when the trial judge instructed the jury that the mere walking by the deceased towards the accused was not sufficient to reduce the homicide from murder to voluntary manslaughter, he only partially covered the theory of the defense raised by the statement; and, in our opinion, if the charge on the subject of voluntary manslaughter was intended to meet the theory of the defendant, as it evidently was, it should have gone further, and given the accused the benefit of the law applicable to the theory as it was really raised by his statement.

2. Complaint is made that after charging the jury that it was justifiable homicide to kill another in self-defense, or in defense of habitation, property, or person against one who manifestly intends or endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a felony on either, and then charging the law in relation to the character of the fears of such felony sufficient to justify the killing, the court added in this connection the following: "So, to a person killing in his defense, it must appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that, in order to save his own life, the killing of the other was absolutely necessary; and it must appear, also, that the person killed was the assailant, and that the slayer had really and in good faith endeavored to decline any further struggle before the mortal blow was given." This charge is error. It is justifiable homicide, under our law, for one to kill another who is manifestly intending or endeavoring by violence or surprise to commit a felony on his person, and this is true without regard to the grade of felony; and it is not a correct proposition of law that, when one kills another to prevent the commission of a felony on his person, the danger must be so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that in order to save his own life the killing of the other was necessary. On the contrary, it is only necessary to be shown that the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that such felony was about to be committed upon him, in order to justify the homicide. Otherwise, a woman killed a man to prevent the rape of her person, or one who slew a burglar to prevent the burglary of his home, would not be justifiable. In neither of these cases is the life of the slayer involved, but in each a felony was about to be committed. A person in this state may kill another for other purposes than to save his own life, and be justified, if he do so to prevent any felony from being committed on his habitation, person, or property. His defense is complete when to a jury it appears that the circumstances were sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that a felony was about to be committed, and that he killed to prevent its commission. The latter part of the charge, as given, applies only to cases of homicide where the parties had previously been engaged in mutual combat. Powell v. State, 101 Ga. 9, 29 S. E. 309; Stubbs v. State (Ga.) 36 S. E. 200. It is doubtless true that the presiding judge recognized these distinctions, but inasmuch as the two principles enunciated in his charge are directly coupled together, without a distinction having been drawn, the jury might have understood from the charge as set out in the ground of the motion that, while it was justifiable for one to kill another to prevent the commission of a felony on his person, it must at the same time appear that the danger was so urgent and pressing at the time of the killing that it was necessary for the slayer to take the life of the deceased in order to save his own life. This is not, and has never been, the law. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

SIMMONS v. THORNTON.

PAYMENT—EVIDENCE.

That a particular and specified indebtedness to an administrator has been paid cannot be shown merely by introducing in evidence checks drawn by the debtor upon a bank, with its stamp of payment thereon, which were payable to the order of the person filling the office of administrator, in his own name and right, and indorsed by him both individually and in his representative capacity. Such checks, without some evidence connecting them with the indebtedness in question, would, at most, afford proof only of the fact that the debtor had made payments to the payee named in the checks, and would not show to what account they were applied or intended to be applied.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; A. E. Calhoun, Judge.

Action by E. H. Thornton, administrator, against C. J. Simmons. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Arnold & Arnold and Simmons & Corrigan, for plaintiff in error. S. N. Evins and E. R. Black, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, P. J. The plaintiff in error, C. J. Simmons, became indebted to P. J. McNamara, as administrator of the estate of M. Lynch, deceased, for money which Simmons had collected as an attorney, and which McNamara permitted him to retain as a loan. McNamara died, and E. H. Thornton became administrator de bonis non of Lynch's estate. As such he brought an action against Simmons for the money above mentioned, and "upon the trial of said case the defendant admitted the plaintiff's account in evidence without proof, assuming the burden of showing that the debt had been paid off." For the purpose of so doing, Simmons tendered in evidence several checks, drawn by himself on the Exchange Bank of Atlanta, "payable to the order of P. J. McNamara." Each of these checks was indorsed: "P. J. McNamara. M. Lynch Estate, by P. J. McNamara, Administrator,"—and on each was a stamp showing that it had been paid by the bank. The plaintiff objected to the admission of these checks on the ground that they did not show that they were to be applied as payments on the alleged debt of the plaintiff. The court sustained the objection, excluded the checks from evidence, and directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff; no proof being offered by the defendant "connecting these checks with the plaintiff's debt." The only error of which the bill of exceptions complains is the action of the court in not permitting the checks to be introduced in evidence.

The position of the plaintiff in error is that these checks, without more, afforded prima facie evidence of payments by him to McNamara upon the debt for the collection of which the present action was brought. There was, as above indicated, no evidence tending to show any connection between the checks and this debt, and it is manifest from the recitals in the bill of exceptions that Simmons had none to offer. He could not himself testify as a witness, because of the fact that McNamara was dead. The naked question therefore is, were these checks, in and of themselves and without further proof, admissible in evidence to show partial payments by Simmons on his particular debt to the estate of M. Lynch which Thornton as its representative is now seeking to collect? We think not. In the first place, the checks were made payable to the order of McNamara individually, which would seem to indicate that they were given in discharge of some obligation on the part of Simmons to McNamara in his own right. Without more, the natural inference would therefore be that the money which the latter received on these checks belonged to him, and not to the estate which he represented. The indorsement, "M. Lynch Estate, by P. J. McNamara, Administrator," which appeared on each of the checks, might well and plausibly be accounted for on the theory that McNamara, being himself indebted to the estate of Lynch, intended in this manner to transfer to it, in settlement of its demands against him, the funds belonging to him for which the checks called; but, even if the fact that he entered this indorsement upon them can be treated as an admission by him that he really received the checks in his representative capacity, such an indorsement certainly does not amount to an admission that the proceeds of the checks were to be applied to the satisfaction of the particular debt to compel payment of which the action was instituted. For aught that appears, Simmons may have been indebted to Lynch's estate upon divers other and entirely distinct demands, in satisfaction of one or more of which these checks may have been given.

It is insisted, however, that, as the plaintiff did not contend that Simmons ever owed McNamara or the estate of Lynch any debt other than that sued upon, the checks were admissible to show payment of that identical debt. The reply is that no obligation rested upon the plaintiff of presenting any such contention, or attempting to sustain it by proof; but it was incumbent on the defendant, he having assumed the burden of proof, to show affirmatively, by competent and satisfactory evidence, that he had, as matter of fact, paid the very demand which was the foundation of the plaintiff's action. This, for the reasons above stated, Simmons could not accomplish by merely introducing evidence the only effect of which was to show that he had paid to the representative of Lynch's estate so much money. To this extent, and no further, the proof afforded by the checks went; and as there was no evidence connecting them in any way with the debt declared upon, and none offered for this purpose, excluding them was clearly not erroneous. Apparently, this is a very hard case on Simmons; but, as is obvious, the hardship arises simply by reason of the fact that, under the law, he was, on account of the death of McNamara, disqualified from testifying as a witness in his own behalf. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

TURNER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 11, 1900.)

CRIMINAL LAW—LARCENY—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL—JUROR—DISQUALIFICATION—RECENT POSSESSION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the finding that the defendant was guilty of the larceny with which he was charged.

2. After a verdict of guilty has been rendered in a criminal case, and application made for a new trial, the verdict should not be set aside on the ground that one of the jurors who tried the case, and who qualified himself on his voir dire, was, because of bias or prejudice against the defendant, disqualified, when only one witness testifies to facts tending to show that the disqualification existed. In such a case the oath of the juror that he had no prejudice or bias is not overcome by the simple oath of one other person detailing facts from which such disqualification might be inferred. There must, in order to set aside a verdict on this ground, be other affirmative evidence, or at least extrinsic circumstances shown, before the falsity of the oath taken by the juror when he entered upon the consideration of the case is sufficiently shown to authorize the grant of a new trial on this ground.

3. In order that recent possession may be considered as a circumstance from which the guilt of one who is charged with a larceny may be inferred, it must be clearly shown that the goods found in the possession of the accused had been in fact stolen. But, when a larceny has been clearly shown to have been committed, a charge to the jury that "it would be necessary for you to find that the thing alleged to have been stolen was so recently in his possession immediately after the theft was alleged to have been committed, and was in his possession with his knowledge and consent," does not necessarily require that the verdict should be set aside. While the use of the word "alleged" was not, in this connection, strictly appropriate, the fact that the larceny was clearly proven was of itself sufficient to prevent the jury from being misled by the charge in question.

4. There was no error in the admission of evidence, nor in the charge or failure to charge, of which complaint is made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Glynn county; Joseph W. Bennett, Judge.

Alfred Turner was convicted of larceny, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Courtland Symms and S. R. Atkinson, for plaintiff in error. John W. Bennett, Sol. Gen., and D. W. Krauss, for the State.

LITTLE, J. Turner was indicted for the offense of simple larceny; the property which he was charged with stealing being a brindle cow of the value of $50, belonging to Mrs. McCullough. He pleaded not guilty, and on the issue formed a verdict of guilty was rendered against him. He made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted. His conviction rested on circumstantial evidence, and for the purposes of this decision no part of the evidence adduced is necessary to be reported, in order that the points decided may be understood, except that which hereafter appears.
